All our heights and depths of shame."

After the "war-cry" had been sung, without the omission of a word, Mr. Cook spoke on "Gen. Booth and the Salvation Army." He said that he rejoiced in the success of Gen. Booth and his autocratic methods, distasteful as they may appear to democratic Americans. He then described what had been accomplished by these methods, and said that there was with it no compromising with the doctrines of the orthodox Church. It was the army's staunch approval and defence of Orthodoxy that changed the attitude of the churches toward it. The doors of many of the churches are now opened to the members of the Salvation Army, and they are no longer hooted through the streets by mobs.

At the conclusion of the address Mr. Cook put to Gen. Booth some questions of church dogma to prove the strict Orthodoxy of the Salvation Army, all of which were most satisfactorily answered, judging by the applause. But there was a perfect storm of approval when, in reply to an inquiry about what he believed regarding hell, he said: "If you were to take hell out of our doctrine, the Salvation Army would soon disappear. It is the hell we preach, certain and everlasting, that brings people to our fold. If it wasn't for the hell, we could never get them."

I do not quote these passages to criticise Gen. Booth, nor the methods of the Salvation Army warfare. The multitude of Christian people who still have no sympathy or interest in these methods are willing to pass them by, and honor the moral hero who has accomplished so much good among the poor and degraded in the great cities of England and America. I wish to call attention to two or three points. First, Joseph Cook's contribution of the "war-cry" to the Salvation Army,—the tone and spirit of it, as indicated by the stanza here quoted:—

All our heights and depths of shame."

Our great expert on agnostic theology seems to have had some doubts as to the propriety of singing this fourth stanza in church, or, at least, he feared that others might have. Still, it was sung "without the omission of a word." After uttering this war-cry, the army would naturally be inclined to wreak vengeance upon the "wolves" with fire and sword, after the manner of the holy wars of history.

Mr. Cook next proceeds to describe Gen. Booth's accomplishments, and to approve his "autocratic methods," assuring his audience that the success of the army was due to their uncompromising adherence to the doctrines of the orthodox Church. By this he meant the doctrines of John Calvin and Jonathan Edwards. Any modification of their creed is, in his view, rank heresy. And, to cap the climax, he put Gen. Booth under public examination on the dogmas of his Church; and he found him a very docile disciple, and thoroughly orthodox! All his questions were "most satisfactorily answered." And, when he came to the orthodox hell, the General's answer raised "a perfect storm of approval." The General said: "If you were to take hell out of our doctrine, the Salvation Army would soon disappear. It is the hell we preach, certain and everlasting, that brings people to our fold. If it were not for the hell, we could never get them."

This emphatic answer on the "hell" question seems to have given entire satisfaction to Mr. Cook and many of his audience, presumed to be mostly made up of ministers! But this is a monstrous assumption, that the principal motive to a godly life is the fear of a future hell. Is this the gospel given to his children by our loving Father, and proclaimed by the merciful and forgiving Saviour, who spent his life in winning men to righteousness by his own inspiring example and persuasive words, and who declared, "If I be lifted up, I will draw all men to myself?" It is a doctrine of the dark ages, of a bigoted priesthood, and of an ignorant and unthinking people.

The Orthodoxy of the last decade of the nineteenth century has discarded it.

CONVENTION MORALS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I want to say a concluding word respecting the question of "Convention Morals." I thoroughly agree with my friend Chadwick that he has not threshed out a single grain of wheat, and I think the dust he has raised has tended to obscure his own ethical vision. In this matter, as I have said before, I am willing to be judged by the most honorable men in this country who have ever worked with political parties. My contention is this: that, when a man becomes a delegate to a political convention, he has given a universally understood pledge to abide by the decision of that convention. When he finds that he cannot honorably and conscientiously keep that pledge, it is his duty to openly "bolt" that convention. Mr. Curtis did not do that. He remained a member of the National Convention of 1884, not only making no attempt to prevent Mr. Blaine's nomination from being declared unanimous, but, presumably, voting for Gen. Logan. Mr. Chadwick inferentially explains his conduct by saying that he was not "histrionic"! But a man like Mr. Curtis should not be kept from a plain duty by the fear of being judged "histrionic." Let me tell how we do such things in Missouri. Several years after the war the re-enfranchisement of the rebels was a burning question in the Republican party of the State. At one convention the Stalwarts, who opposed the restoration of those who had been in rebellion, nominated a gentleman for governor. The moment the nomination was assured a gentleman from St. Louis arose and said: "Gentlemen, the time has come, in my judgment, for the Republican party to bury the past. All who agree with me will assemble in the adjoining chamber." And the "bolting" members nominated and elected Gratz Brown as an independent candidate. That was a fair and just way for a man to retain his political independence. Now, I want to publicly challenge my friend Chadwick's statement that Mr. Curtis had practically outlined his course in advance, and that those who made him a delegate did so with their eyes open. Mr. Curtis was his personal friend and parishioner; and he, doubtless, is personally acquainted with many of those who voted for Mr. Curtis, and some who served with him as delegates. I ask him to publish a statement made by any of these gentlemen clearly presenting the fact that they knew, anticipated, or expected that Mr. Curtis would take the course he did, and that they felt as free as he to take precisely the same course. Mr. Chadwick opines that Senator Hoar, had he been a member of the convention that nominated Gen. Butler, would have felt free to have followed Mr. Curtis's example in making an ex post facto bolt, presumably expecting to retain his standing in the Republican party. As the Scripture says, Mr. Hoar is "of age": he can speak for himself. But I venture to say that no man who holds this doctrine would present his own name to a party convention. The freedom of a party man is, of necessity, a qualified freedom. He believes that great political ends may be better secured by the use of party organization than by any other method. And, therefore, while his party continues to promote the great ends for which it was created, he cheerfully submits to the discipline which makes party organization possible. Mr. Chadwick and myself want to be absolutely independent, so we do not go into party conventions. I am sure I have declared the doctrine of Lincoln, Sumner, Wilson, Cleveland, and John Andrew. I have no doubt that I have just as certainly indicated the doctrine of Senator Hoar, John D. Long, and Mr. Russell, whose political vision is as clear and whose political ethics are as exacting, as those of Mr. Curtis.

Mr. Chadwick's ethics keep Dr. Briggs and men of his quality inside the orthodox churches. These gentlemen know that the doctrines they hold are in shining contrast to the declarations of the Confession of Faith. They remain in the Presbyterian Church because their withdrawal would be a declaration of the Church's narrowness and lack of intellectual liberty. But the Confession of Faith determines the limits of that religious liberty. Men cannot be Presbyterians and rationalists at the same time. They ought not to profess a creed they do not hold, even if they have the laudable desire to change it for the better. The Presbyterian and the party man stand upon a common footing. If Mr. Curtis was right, then every free trader, Populist, free-silver man, and socialist could go into a national Republican convention with the secret purpose of striving to defeat the party if they failed to secure recognition in the platform. JOHN SNYDER.

POLITICAL MORALS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I am much obliged to Mr. Snyder for his criticism, seeing that it has procured us Gov. Chamberlain's letter; and I am much obliged to Gov. Chamberlain for his testimony that Mr. Snyder's doctrine is not even good political morality. Gov. Chamberlain writes of Mr. Curtis's "delay in bolting the Chicago nomination." Substantially, he bolted it in advance. He was on record against it in such a way that no one who knew him imagined he would support it. He never wavered for a moment after the nomination was made. I had myself a letter from him, immediately on his return, that was as clearly expressive of his purpose as words could make it. But when, in addition to bolting the Chicago nomination, it came to supporting Mr. Cleveland's candidacy, that was a different and much harder matter, because he had loved the Republican party so much,—as few men have ever loved it; and it was only after much deliberation and the most urgent solicitation of his friends that he assumed the leadership of the Independent party. But when, years afterward, I asked him if he had ever doubted the wisdom of his course, he said, "Never for one moment."

As for "unmitigable," it is evident that Gov. Chamberlain has not the Century Dictionary. He will find it there, also in Shakespeare. But the word is none of mine. I wrote "immitigable," and the compositor altered the first syllable for the worse. We have our favorite words, and "immitigable" is one of mine. But, if one has a favorite word or phrase, something is pretty sure to happen to it in the printer's hands. Moore should have added this item to his "tree or flower" and "dear gazelle."

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM BY WHITTIER.

CHRISTMAS DAY, 25, 12 MO., 1860.

TO M. R. H.

[The poem below was written by John G. Whittier to Miss Mary R. Hudson in acknowledgment of a little floral harp and amaranth wreath sent for the picture of his mother. It has not been published before.]

I thank thee, and I thank the kindly angels
Who gave the thought to thee,
And lent their skill to braid the amaranth blossoms
And twine the harp for me.

Grateful, but with a sense of undeserving
That shames all pride away,
I add another to the dear God's mercies,
And bow my head and pray

That in the land once far off, now so near us,
The quiet, opening land
Whose voices call us, whose still waters mirror
White robe and beckoning hand,

Where life is love, and giving and receiving Flow in perpetual round,
The floral harp and wreath of amaranth blossoms
Transfigured may be found.

THE BODILY RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

BY REV. H. A. MILES.

In reading any of the books in the vast library on this subject, every one must have wished for a dispassionate and trustworthy guide who had lived through the related scenes.

We want some other than the well-known reporters. It is evident that their minds were disturbed by hopes and fears. They give fragmentary and incoherent accounts. The attempt has often been made to adjust these to an indubitable history. No one has succeeded. It may long remain hopeless. It is the sphinx of the New Testament narrative. A traditional explanation has been formulated into creeds; but these rest upon the impressions of bewildered and frightened men,—“stunned and confounded,” as Milman says.

It is not a little surprising that, while we are so often directed to them, we are less frequently referred to Jesus himself. Can we have a better interpreter? No one was more self-possessed. No one knew so well both what had taken place and what was to be the end of his earthly career. No one was more free from every undue bias. Whose words may we trust, if not his? A transcript of his mind must settle all questions. And such a transcript we may find if we dismiss the old belief, not yet rejected, about the infallibility of a record made by those far inferior to him.

In trying to show how this general subject appears to some at the present day, two pivotal questions deserve study. Does it appear that Jesus had, before his crucifixion, any anticipation that he was to return from the tomb? Does it appear that he had, after his affirmed bodily resurrection, any consciousness that he had died?

On this first point all will recall his repeated affirmations that his crucifixion would terminate his earthly existence. “I go to the Father, and ye shall see me no more.” “Now I am no more with you.” “I am no more in the world.” Omitting other quotations, one more sentence may be added: “I leave the world, and go to my Father.”

Is it easy to find language more plain and decisive? Does it exclude the idea of any further life on earth? These words do not stand alone. He had hours of the tenderest affection. The heart then overflows. It will have irrepressible utterance. Can we detect a struggle to keep anything back?

When he comforted his friends who were overwhelmed at the thought of a departure which all believed was to be final, could he have refused one hint that in a few hours he would meet them victorious and rejoicing? Might not the anguish of Gethsemane have been mitigated by the thought that, after a brief sleep, he would awake triumphant? When his mother stood at the cross, why not a word to her of the infinite consolation which one syllable might have given? When in his solemn prayer he said, “I have finished the work thou gavest me to do,” how could he say this if he knew that the crowning part of that work, according to the popular theology, had not then been done?

The moral consistency of his words and of his entire conduct will be obvious. If it be thought that he might have masked his emotions, into what do we convert the most transparent character ever known in history?

It is sometimes claimed that he must have foreseen his bodily resurrection, as the disciples repeatedly declared that they had received from him the words that he would rise on “the third day.” It is no reflection upon their character, it is what was perhaps unavoidable, that this hint of a rising should later—for it was not understood before, and was indeed an after-thought—have peculiar prominence with them, should subsequently be often quoted, and perhaps too frequently be ascribed to Jesus, if only through mortification at their own previous failure to comprehend its meaning.

Every careful reader of the Scriptures knows that the expressions “the third day,” “after three days,” “a few days,” “some days,” were then often used loosely, like the word “several” with us, denoting not a specific, but a short time. If Jesus foresaw a mighty reaction of his spirit soon beginning after his disappearance, this may have been all that the indefinite phrase “three days” really meant to him. Evidently, he did foresee that reaction. “And I, if I be lifted up [crucified], will draw all men unto me.” With him there may not have been the slightest allusion to a bodily resurrection. Why should we thrust upon him a contradiction of his plainest words?

The reporters seized hold of the literal meaning. Their mistake is explicable, if unfounded. But how could they think of the legacy which, aided by the subsequent theory of a verbal infallibility, they bequeathed to the ages?

A few words on the second question,—Did Jesus have a consciousness of having died? Who has not noticed that we look in vain for any allusion to what it is supposed he had experienced? There is not one word about the great mystery of death. Jesus prior to the crucifixion and Jesus after the crucifixion does not seem to be the same person. Where are the inspiring lessons that filled every day of the former period? In the latter period we enter into a region of shadows. Is there any illuminating light reflected from the alleged passage through death?

One thing appears very clear. Those who wrote the last portion of the biography had no master to follow, no superior wisdom to guide. They were left to their own understanding. Nor is there a higher demonstration of who was the light and the wisdom of their life, when we see this lapse to the level of the disciples' minds the moment that he was withdrawn.

It is sometimes asked, What is the value of the testimony of those who said that they had seen Jesus after he left the sepulchre? The sincere but simple-minded men knew nothing of the fact that powerful emotions sometimes affect the sight in a way as vividly as do outward and palpable objects. Only in modern times has this psychological truth been established. It was unknown of old. It is not fully known even now, in all its conditions and limitations.

But it has been undeniably demonstrated in judicial investigations, where a person much talked of is mistakenly seen in his familiar walk or chair. How often have bereaved affections seen the departed whose dear image has floated before their vision! All this has happened in a thousand cases. Why not be just to the sacred writers, and allow to them an explanation so often accorded to others? Their conduct, at least, proves how overmastering was their love.

None but a few of the first disciples had ocular demonstration of a corporeal resurrection; and, of these few, it is distinctly stated that “some doubted.” Is it wrong for us to doubt?

How was it that such a resurrection of Jesus came to be, in spite of Saint Paul, the peculiar and prominent part of the Christian faith? There is no room here for historical details. What potent motives urged to this belief? In it were condensed all disputes about religion. An admission settled everything. It was the first point to be presented. It was preached continually. Nothing so much excited curiosity and wonder. It called forth passionate rhetoric. The old Church Fathers wrote voluminously in its defence. In time, art with picturesque power came to its aid. The Passion Plays gave it distinctness and permanence. Poetry hallowed it in verse. The millennium craze taught that armies of saints would arise from their graves to fight the battles of the Lord. This was followed by the madness of the Crusades, identifying thoughts of a bodily resurrection with the sepulchre for which all Christendom fought. The Protestant Reformation effected little change in the old church creeds.

Behold the track “spotted” through the long forest of the dark ages where the trees were mostly overrun by parasitic growths.

OLD BOTTLES AND NEW.

BY REV. R. R. SHIPPEN.

The bottles were not imperishable glass, but wine-skins, as the revised version more correctly translates, easily spoiling and needing to be renewed. Theology and ritual are perishing wine-skin bottles, that must be changed to hold the sacred wine of religion, every season fresh and new. Many good people are struggling to preserve their old wine-skin bottles of theology that are fast spoiling; while advancing intelligence is happily preparing new and better ones to hold the wine of the life eternal.

Fletcher of Montrose once said, “If I could not make the songs of a nation, I care not who would make their laws,” or “their creeds,” he might have added. Creeds of John Calvin, or Westminster Confession, or Catechism, are very dry reading. People cease to care for them, and the rising generation knows little about them. Hymns that people love to sing far better represent their real thought. Hymns of a hundred years ago, compared with those of to-day, far better than creeds, show the changing theology of old bottles and new into which is put the sacred wine of divine life.

Since the days of Luther the four great hymn-writers of the old theology have been Watts, Doddridge, Wesley, and Montgomery. Wesley was the most quickening, with fervent spirituality; Watts, easily chief in majestic grandeur. Born in Southampton, England, in 1674, Watts in early manhood took charge of a church in London, where he lived till his death in 1748, at the age of seventy-four. While he published something of theology, his chief life-work was writing hymns, the best of which are in the hymn-books of all our churches. The Encyclopædia Britannica reports him to have been more liberal than the prevailing Calvinism of his time; and he is reported to have grown more genial and liberal as he grew older. His hymns are full of life and fire; and they vividly embody the theology of his day. Here are a few specimens:—

Contempt is poured upon man as a vile worm of the dust.

Lord, what is man, that worthless thing,
Akin to dust and worms?

Great God, how infinite art thou!
What worthless worms are we!

Again and again is declared the death of Deity:—

Alas! and did my Saviour bleed?
And did my Sovereign die?

Well might the sun in darkness hide,
And shut his glories in,
When God, the mighty Maker, died
For man the creature's sin!

The wrath, vengeance, and fury of Deity are terrifically portrayed:—

Terrible God, who reign'st on high,
How awful is thy thundering hand!
The fiery bolts, how fierce they fly!
Nor can all earth or hell withstand.

This Sodom felt, and feels it still,
And roars beneath the eternal load;
With endless burnings who can dwell?
Or bear the fury of a God?

Very cheerful and entertaining is all this, surely, showing the superior faith of the good old times as against these degenerate days of inquiry and progress. The old faith has even lingered while the new bottles are preparing. Is it imagined that this volume was a dusty relic of the past, rescued from the rubbish of some antiquarian bookstore? It is a hymn-book printed in Boston in 1855, not as a curiosity, but for the use of New England churches, and within twenty years was used as the regular hymn-book in a church in Concord, Mass., even within sight of the home of Ralph Waldo Emerson. From it we take also this grand old hymn of the days of faith, likewise written by Watts:—

HELL! OR, THE VENGEANCE OF GOD.

With holy fear and humble song,
The dreadful God our souls adore;
Reverence and awe become the tongue
That speaks the terrors of his power.

Far in the deep, where darkness dwells,
The land of horror and despair,
Justice has built a dismal hell,
And laid her stores of vengeance there.

Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
And darts, to inflict immortal pains,
Dyed in the blood of damned souls.

There Satan, the first sinner, lies,
And roars and bites his iron bands;
In vain the rebel strives to rise,
Crushed by the weight of both his hands.

The guilty ghosts of Adam's race
Shriek out, and howl beneath thy rod;
Once they could scorn a Saviour's grace,
But they incensed a dreadful God.

Tremble, my soul, and kiss the Son;
Sinner, obey thy Saviour's call;
Else your damnation hastens on,
And hell gapes wide to wait your fall.

Is not that grand, gloomy, and peculiar?
It seems to need the musical setting of Wagner's “Götterdämmerung,” with all the great orchestra and chorus of Bayreuth,— trumpets, trombones, and kettle-drums,—to do it justice. Do you imagine religion dying out because that sort of bottle is broken and abandoned?

In the advance of intelligence, many good people are troubled lest the foundations of religion and the church are giving way, and chaos coming. What is this new thought? God, a living, loving Father, best friend of all souls in all worlds. Jesus, best representative of God, and spiritual leader of mankind. Man, God's own child, capable of all things good, learning to walk and talk, and live and sing divinely. Man, our brother, to be treated as we would treat Christ himself, religion thus taking up the note of humanity and brotherly love. Life, a great school, where experience under divine tuition educates us in true religion and fits us for the skies. True religion, a life conforming to God's law and will as seen in nature and the Bible. Destiny, a planting and harvesting. This world, a good world to live in, the kingdom of God here and now, and the life eternal begun here, carried up and on forever.

The popular hymns of to-day indicate the new bottles of theology into which is put the fresh wine of the divine life. The latest edition of the Methodist Hymnal contains about forty hymns by seventeen different Unitarian authors. The Century Company publishes a hymn-book, used in the Church of the Covenant of this city, and in churches of all sects, of which more than half a million copies have been sold, in which are fifty hymns by thirty different Unitarian authors. Two favorite hymns, “In the Cross of Christ I glory” and “Watchman, tell us of the Night,” are by the Unitarian, Dr. Bowring, of England. Two of the most beautiful of all Christmas hymns, “Calm, on the Listening Ear of Night,” and “Listen to the Angels sing,” are by Rev. E. H. Sears, late pastor of the Unitarian church of Weston, Mass. The most popular hymn of all Christendom to-day, “Nearer, my God, to thee,” was written by Sarah Flower Adams, member of the Unitarian church of Rev. W. J. Fox in London.

A hymn-book recently prepared for the use of Trinity Church, Glasgow, Scotland, by its own minister, Rev. John Hunter, contains hymns by more than fifty well-known Unitarians, with fewer hymns by Watts, Wesley, Doddridge, and Montgomery than by our Unitarian brothers, Longfellow, Hosmer, Chadwick, and Savage. As a sign of the times, old bottles of hymnology displaced by new ones, and a testimony of the people fast learning to sing the new theology, most remarkable is this very charming new collection of "Hymns of Faith and Hope." Very remarkable and suggestive is its exact record, which is this: of the old school, four hymns by Watts, four by Doddridge, six by Wesley, eight by Montgomery; per contra, of the new school, twenty-six by Whittier, twenty-two by Samuel Longfellow, seventeen by F. L. Hosmer, nine by Gaskell, eight by Furness, seven by James F. Clarke, five each by Chadwick, Gannett, and Savage, and besides these a great list of other Unitarian preachers,—Bulfinch, Hedge, Sears, and others.

The old bottles, like the above quoted, on "Hell! or, the Vengeance of God," are being broken and thrown away; while the fresh hymn-books of all sects are singing of God's love, as in this lovely new hymn by Rev. F. L. Hosmer, minister of the Second Unitarian Church of St. Louis:—

Father, to thee we look in all our sorrow,
Thou art the fountain whence our healing flows;
Dark though the night, joy cometh with the morrow;
Safely they rest who on thy love repose.

When fond hopes fail and skies are dark before us,
When the vain cares that vex our life increase,
Comes with its calm the thought that thou art o'er us;
And we grow quiet, folded in thy peace.

Naught shall affright us, on thy goodness leaning;
Low in the heart Faith singeth still her song;
Chastened by pain, we learn life's deeper meaning,
And in our weakness thou dost make us strong.

Patient, O heart, though heavy be thy sorrow!
Be not cast down, disquieted in vain;
Yet shalt thou praise him when these darkened furrows,
Where now he plougheth, wave with golden grain.

A WINTER EXCURSION.

The snow-shoe section of the Appalachian Club is in the habit of having a winter trip to the mountains when the snow is in the right condition for gliding over it with shoes of thongs stretched over a light wood frame. This excursion took place between the 16th and the 26th of February, and the point for rendezvous was beautiful Fryeburg on the western border of Maine. About fifty men and women—none of them very young, and many with heads silvery as the winter hilltops—made up the group that gathered round the great fireplace after the delightful drive of eight miles from Conway to Fryeburg,—a ride long to be remembered for the vision of the noble mountains robed in snow and gleaming in the sunshine, as well as for the sparkle of fun and flash of wit in the long sledges, which flew merrily over the well-rolled road.

Perhaps half of the persons assembled are always to be found on these winter excursions, but there were enough new-comers to be initiated into the delights of snow-shoeing. A genial spirit of good comradeship pervades the club, and those who know how are ever ready to teach those who do not; and, though there is little sentimentality about these extremely practical men and women, there is a chivalrous guardianship of the inexperienced. A quick, strong hand is always ready to pull up the unfortunate who has slipped down; and willing arms to carry extra wraps are never wanting. One finds congenial friends at every turn, the law, the gospel, and the healing profession having their representatives among literary, scientific, and pedagogic experts. The chain that holds this conglomerate together, like the rope that ties the Alpine tourist to his fellows, is the love of Nature, and joy in invading her dominions when to many she seems the foe of man. But how we misjudge Nature, just as we misjudge people, when we see them only at a distance!

Had the fortunate Appalachians timed their visit to the mountains ten days earlier, when the mercury had dropped twenty-eight degrees toward the bottom of the tube, and the snow, in sharp, needlelike crystals, was blowing over the hills, it might not have been so delightful as those sunny hours when any sort of a wrap was a burden, and hoods and caps were tied to belts, and, with uncovered heads, bare hands, and no outside jacket, the snow-shoers wound up the slopes of Mount Tom, and basked in the sunshine at the top as though it were June instead of February. It was hard to believe that it was winter, in spite of the unsullied fields of snow that sparkled in every direction as far as the eye could see, unbroken save by the forests and the distant homes, unstained by dust or smoke, untracked save here and there by the foot-steps of squirrels, rabbits, and deer. So recently had the last pretty creatures passed that the bushes where they had browsed still showed the freshness of the broken twigs. No sound broke the restful silence save the whirr of a startled partridge in its flight and the song of the chickadee-dee. It was hard to believe, sitting in the golden sunshine at peace with all the world, with that glorious panorama of snowy mountain and quiet village far below, so still,

"Dear God! the very houses seem asleep," that trade was thundering on in the great city, and that through grimy slush electric cars were rattling and curses and blows were mercilessly falling on thousands of poor horses as they tried to draw heavily laden sleds over half-bare roads and iron tracks. Every nerve thrilled with the sense of exquisite release from the tortures of winter in the city, the lungs inhaled a purer air, the heart throbbed with renewed vigor at the unaccustomed exertion, and the soul drank in new inspiration and courage for the hard things of life. There was wisdom in the old pagans who put their temples on the high places.

The week's outing embraced the ascent of all the hills in the immediate vicinity of Fryeburg; the climbing of Kearsarge; a trip through the Notch, and the ascent of Willard; walks over the intervalles, and up and down the winding Saco River; and various long drives in the fur-lined sledges. The weather was all that could be desired, and the views were matchless.

Evenings saw the group safe indoors, assembled in the roomy parlor for song, tableaux, or charades, and on Sunday night to hear the reading of that inimitable sermon by William C. Gannett, written, one might think, especially for such an occasion, "The Treasures of the Snow." It went with the hearers through the week, and not a day passed that some one did not refer to this or that point of the sermon which was illustrated before those who had eyes to see.

The week has fled, melted like the snow over which we found our way; but its influence abides and goes on to ever better things, as the melting snow creates the brooks which water the earth and make it glad. Hardly one of the scores who scaled those snowy heights and descended into those shining valleys but carries away the riches of new friendships, the memories of glad converse, a gallery of beautiful landscapes in his soul, fresh life in his veins, and the feeling of gladness and peace that comes "To him who in the love of Nature holds Communion with her visible forms."

I. C. B.

A SUPERFLUOUS DENOMINATION.

BY REV. D. M. WILSON, SUPERINTENDENT FOR NEW ENGLAND.

"The time has gone by for the establishment of a separate Unitarian denomination." So expostulated a doctor of divinity of the Trinitarian branch of our Congregational Church when regarding some of our missionary efforts. That utterance, joined in by not a few of his school, is enough to bring us to a stand-still, lost in thought, like Socrates, upon the very origins and destinies of things. Is it so, that we are not as yet a denomination? Are we, in all labors for church extension, fighting against the stars in their courses? Why he spoke these words we see at once. He meant to convey the idea that his denomination and some of the other denominations are become liberal enough to satisfy all reasonable aspirations after expansion, progress, freedom, truth. And, in a degree, is he not right? Is not that liberalism in Orthodoxy the one obstacle we have to contend with in fostering new Unitarian churches? In pulpit after pulpit throughout all the evangelical denominations "mere morality" is preached,—a Christianity clear of all dubious creed elements. And the lay people of progressive minds are satisfied, the deacons are silent, even Unitarians are content, if the "new Orthodoxy" is tempered with a pleasant social atmosphere. Many Congregationalist clergymen openly court the approval of Unitarians and Universalists. One of them responded "Neither can I" to a Unitarian lady who said she could not accept the creed of his church; and still another explains away his creed by saying it has a certain symbolical or historical value, but no present practical import. Some of them cannot be too plain and pronounced in their rejection of the old theology. Indeed, not a few have declared to Unitarian friends that they would be happier and do better work in our communion than in their own denomination. Such, no doubt, would unite with us if we gave them a little encouragement; but we have already welcomed so many we hardly know where to find congregations for them all. As a matter of fact, there are ministers preaching in evangelical pulpits to-day who have applied for our fellowship, and are only waiting for an intimation from us to give up their charge and work in the field where their heart is. "Sire, it is not a revolt: it is a revolution."

As lovers of pure religion and of our kind, we cannot but rejoice at the grateful modification of theology in all denominations. Who can be jealous because, even with no warrant from creed or convention, their preachers are preaching the great thoughts of the times, and yielding themselves to the spirit of God presently working in the progress, the wider knowledge, the sweeter moralities of our day? Glad must we be that pulpits aforetime flaming and fuliginous with divine wrath and human torment are now radiant with the beams of all-conquering infinite Love. We will count it all gain if evangelical ministers are proclaiming salvation by character, are resting upon reason in religion, and are displaying the helpful humanity of the Master. This, to be sure, is our work; but their doing of it does not argue that the time for establishing a separate Unitarian denomination has passed away. Rather is it evidence that the hour has struck when all who have outgrown irrational traditions and erroneous principles should unite honestly and openly in that free church of God, call it what you will, whose religion, grandly simple, is love to God and love to man,—the religion of Jesus. What has passed away for these liberal orthodox ministers is really the possibility of building up their denomination on the old platform, be it called Plymouth Rock or what not; and their advocacy of the larger freedom and grander truth only bears witness again to the stability of the position long since occupied by Unitarians. Yet see how unceremoniously they treat us! At first it was asserted we were not Christians, and so most injuriously superfluous; and now that they have accepted our principles and ideas they inform us our occupation's gone.

But is it true? Does not this assertion rest upon the misconception that Unitarianism is mainly a protest? A protest, however important, may be quite temporal. And Unitarians did protest, most clearly and insistently protest, against unreason and unrighteousness in religion; but their soul's strength was in religion, and in the protest only for the sake of religion. Tradition, creed, and counsel were all contemned, all swept aside, that God might be enjoyed intimately and entirely, and humanity assisted now and here. The protest, quite effectual, is passing into silent astonishment of the compromises of "Orthodoxy"; and more than ever the desire is for religion, for participation in that Infinite Life as highest conceived by man. A church for the pure enjoyment of God and the service of man is the object of our hopes and affections. It is the ideal church,—permanent, stable; the church of the future,—free, fearless, progressive, and victorious. And after orthodox or evangelical churches have reformed and informed themselves; after they have accepted the present revelation of God in its fulness, and have ceased to be afraid of science, distrustful of scholarship, timid of what is natural, doubtful of the power of Infinite Love,—then they will be what Unitarian churches are now,—no more, no less. They are drifting over the course already deliberately sailed by Unitarians. What name they will make or take when they attain the free waters where we float we cannot conjecture; but we like to think they will say no word of superseding us in loyal service to God or search for truth, but that they will gladly recognize there is here a sisterhood of stately ships, divinely appointed to discover a new world in religion.

Not yet, however, has liberalism in Orthodoxy so far advanced that the assumption of the place and work of Unitarian churches is, rightly, even to be thought of. If all is true that is told us, it would appear that among the most independent ministers of that school there is fear to breathe the freest breath and proclaim the fullest truth. All who leave the other communions to seek our fellowship declare that peace is to be had only by the exercise of a "masterly reticence." Some who would speak out, peace or no peace, avow themselves worn out by "the tyranny of the majority." The time for establishing a separate Unitarian denomination gone by! Whither, in that event, would these eager spirits, and others of the laity like them, flee, in order to fulfil "the deep commandment, dimmer or clearer, of our whole being to be free"? More of such, as knowledge grows, will burst their bonds; for the frank, honest, fearless spirit of Puritan and Covenanter is not dead in the church of their descendants. And, if there were no liberal denomination for them to enter, they would make one.

There is no great hardship, some may think, in these men staying where they are. "Let them continue in their own church," is the frequent adjuration, "and reform it from within." Do not miss the significance involved in the pressing of this point. A church which needs reforming so much cannot, surely, be quite up to the level of our Unitarian churches. Then, as to the efficacy of this reforming-from-within-the-party principle, much might be said. History and present experience both show that ecclesiastical bodies are ruled and guided by the heavy mass of conservative sentiment and opinion. No relief for advancing souls presents itself but in breaking away and forming other communions. Read the letter lately issued by bishops of the Episcopalian Church, and then reflect how futile has been the effort of liberal souls to influence the controlling mediocrity of that denomination. Yes, and reflect that men we know of, who do not believe what the bishops enforce, will dumbly acquiesce, and smother their own thoughts.

That suggests another particular in which the liberal men of evangelical churches are not competent to assume the mission of Unitarians. These liberals, while freely expressing their advanced opinions in small ministerial coteries, find that in the large conventions of their denomination the mass of conservatism is so heavy that they cannot nerve themselves to lift their voice. No effort is made to change the creeds, no word is uttered against the crude interpretations and principles of a dead past. So, while there are evangelical churches here and there which in freedom and breadth seem to rival Unitarian churches, they, nevertheless, are arrayed under banners which display unmodified the symbols of a dark and ignorant theology. How, with such standards contradicting their Sunday's sermon, can these liberal evangelicals appeal to the "emancipated" who now outnumber the church-goers? Will those who have been driven from the churches by preachers who consistently presented the irrational doctrines of their denomination be won back by other preachers who interpret them vaguely, but dare not abolish them? Surely, in the appeal to the great unchurched, Unitarians and Universalists, too, have the advantage in simplicity, consistency, fearlessness, and absolute loyalty to the literal and latest truth. And what a field is here for us! With perfect freedom to employ the divine fulness of this age in presenting a religion essential to the grand human instincts, we ought to bring multitudes to the conscious reverence of the Universal Love, and to the unselfish service of our common brotherhood.

This brings me to the practical application. With the spirit of the age for us in its scholarship and ideals, with a denomination united closely by the harmonious action and flow of feeling of the Saratoga Conference, but one thing remains to complete our equipment as a living and expanding denomination; and that is a large body of devoted ministers. In years past how often did we pray for such! And now our prayer has been granted. The ranks of high-spirited and zealous young men from our divinity schools have been swelled doubly, perhaps trebly, by earnest and well-furnished men from other denominations. Never have we been so well supplied. Actually, we have been compelled to raise the repelling hand to many excellent men who wished to unite with us, and to utter the humiliating words, "We have nothing we can set you to do." And yet the work is here on all sides of us, a church waiting to be gathered in every considerable town or city. What enchantment has its spell over us, that we must keep scores of men in tight leash, forbidding them decisively to labor where the world invites them? What but the fear that churches might be gathered which in their further growth might require more aid from the denomination than the contributions amount to? More money would set these men free, and a new chapter would be opened in our denomination's history. But, whether more money is obtained or not, these men cannot be much longer restrained. Already they threaten to break the spell under which they lie, and, alone and unsupported, go to the most promising town or city, and labor for the kingdom of God. Whether they succeed or fail, strengthen or enfeeble the common cause, we cannot but sympathize with them. But how much better it would be if they could go forth beneath the standard raised at the Saratoga Conference, and with the denomination in its united strength behind them! Then would they accomplish the great work which other denominations, nowise so well fitted, are aspiring to do.

THE BISHOPS' PASTORAL.

PROTEST OF AN EPISCOPAL CLERGYMAN.

The following letter appeared in the Boston Herald of Monday last:—

I have received a copy of the current pastoral letter. It urges upon me a conception of religion which seems to me untrue, admonishes me to teach things that in conscience I cannot teach, and construes the obligation of my ordination vows in a manner contrary to my understanding of them.

The conception of religion set forth in the pastoral letter seems to me untrue, and dangerously so, because it seems to make religion consist in a merely intellectual assent to creedal statements. The historical creeds are to me august and glorious symbols of countersigns of the Christian faith; but they do not, I think, contain the faith, or in any effectual way express it to plain men. So that it is perfectly possible, and by no means uncommon, for men to accept every article of the creeds in a most literal and historical sense, without having any considerable consciousness of the meaning of Christianity; and, on the other hand, equally possible, and no less common, for men to dissent from such a construction of the creeds, and yet show in their lives those fruits by which our Lord bids us judge of the reality of faith.

For my own part, I accept the creeds in the way defined by the pastoral letter; but I must refuse to tell the man who comes to me with honest doubts that the safety of his soul depends upon his doing so, too. I am bound to tell him that the test of faith is much more difficult and strenuous; that it is necessary for him to have high courage, and to take real risks; necessary for him to live day by day from the hand of the Father, to believe in goodness against all appearance of evil, to suffer willingly loss of possessions, the chilling of friendships, contempt, hunger, anything, everything.

I must tell the man that consents to listen to my teaching that it is relatively of the very slightest consequence that he hold approved opinions concerning the circumstances of our Lord's birth, but that it is of the highest importance that he enter into his life and share its love, its hope and faith, its humiliation, and its passion.

The pastoral letter tells me that our civilization is showy, but not strong; that it abounds in seductions to lawlessness; and that, therefore, the Church must take a firm stand, and not permit her formularies to be marred of their integrity.

Now, I cannot believe that there is any power in formularies, ecclesiastical or political, to prop up a tottering civilization.

I believe, on the contrary, that civilization in America is grievously threatened just because men have been taught to trust in formularies. I think that what we need in America is not more formularies or tougher ones, but more humanity and a more courageous and authentic faith. When the mob breaks in the doors, it does not stop at the maiming of formularies.

I cannot in conscience teach that the doctrine of the virgin birth of our Lord is an absolute essential of the Christian faith. I am confident that a man may be faithful without receiving that doctrine.

Nor is it possible for me to say that the Holy Scriptures are inspired of God in a peculiar and miraculous manner distinguishing them from all other writings. The doctrine that the Bible alone is inspired is, I think, full of dishonor to the power of the Holy Spirit, and full of discouragement to the spirits of living men. And the teaching that it is miraculously and infallibly inspired has been, as an historical fact, the spring of endless sectarian discord, and the source of the most deadly kind of intellectual pride,—the pride which, exulting in its superior insight, masks under the guise of humble obedience to the word.

I cannot but regard as vain and illusory the notion that God has anywhere, in pope, Bible, or general council, furnished us with an infallible standard of truth, outside of the still and humble heart of man and the everlasting realities of the world around us. The steady urgency and pressure of these realities is authority sufficient, infallible, and ultimately irresistible. I cannot suppose that the truth touching the eternal relations of man to man and of man to God needs to have a guard of learned men set over it for protection.

Truth is fact; and the thing to do with a fact is not to protect it, but to respect it,—conform one's life to it.

Faithful Churchmen will, I think, best preserve and increase the world's faith in the tremendous facts of our religion by trusting themselves to those facts, and showing by visible demonstration that it is possible to stand upright thereon and walk. The truths of our ancient faith cry out to-day, not for masters to interpret them from of old, but for martyrs to prove them anew.

As to the ordination vows, I hold it to be immoral and unmanly for one to make oath as to how he will think and speak tomorrow. Such an oath is in character not easily distinguished from that of Herod in the Scripture story, and is likely to lead to killing of prophets. The ordination vows of a minister of the Church I take to be not intellectual bonds to bind him down to formularies, but spiritual bonds,—a kind of solemn and awful sacrament, to lift him up and bind him body and soul to Christ.

I make no plea for what is called freedom of thought. I do not for a moment think that men can think out a way to right living. I hold, on the contrary, that it is necessary through humility and self-devotion to live out a way to right thinking.

I contend simply for the faith of the Apostolic Church,—the faith that is most ancient and most modern.

I have high hopes that God will make this Church of ours deep and wide enough of heart to hold the heart of the nation, to answer the mute longing of the shepherdless multitude, to take up the cry of the oppressed, to stir strong souls to voluntary servitude, to fulfil the spiritual meeting of democracy, and to build here the City of Faith. I am persuaded that these things will be impossible to us if we rest in a faith documentary, traditional, and reminiscent.

It is with a poignant right that I am constrained to put myself thus in a kind of insurrection against my superiors in the Church,—especially so because it happens that I have stood in a near relation to three of the signers of this pastoral letter, and one of them has been to me for a long time preceptor and counsellor in a very special sense. Yet a wrong thing is no less wrong because good men espouse it.

And this pastoral letter, gracious and engaging in its form, seems to me to be the culminating expression of a wrong thing at this moment dominant in the life of the Church, to its great detriment and danger. It is because it is thus truly representative that I take issue with it, and set myself in opposition to it. I intend, at whatever risk of seeming presumptuous and self-willed, from this day to do everything that one man can do in the pulpit, in public prints, in private, and by every means, to deliver the Church from the influence which thus pervades it, to dissipate its vain and pedantic pretension, to disturb its stupefying calm and smooth content, and to recall it to humility and a real faith.

I pray to be set right if I am wrong.

AN EPISCOPAL CLERGYMAN.

Spiritual Life.

The great tendency among men everywhere is to follow the standards and ideals that are dominant in the particular society in which they happen to move. It is a great thing to have a standard that overtops my little circle and yours; that can be seen from community to community, from nation to nation, from age to age. Such a standard has the Christ-life come to be.—J. T. Sunderland.

The Christian spirit is pre-eminently the humble, loving, forgiving spirit, the spirit that will have nothing of hatred or bitterness or denunciation, nothing to hurt or destroy. It counts all men as brothers, and permits no exclusiveness on the ground of race or wealth or culture. If any one has any superiority in any respect, that only increases his obligation to his fellows, and makes him by so much more their servant. N. M. Mann.

What is called idealism and what is called realism are only two modes from which the same Reality may be viewed: the Reality is all in all. He is perfect, all-rounded, complete. He can neither suffer waste nor increase. He is not continued into anything, even the most mighty and beautiful; but all things, in themselves incomplete, suggest that they are continued and completed in his will here or elsewhere.—Mozoomdar.

To know that in a given situation there are many ways in which we may go wrong and only one in which we can go right, that we may miss our goal as well as attain it, that things do not necessarily work for our benefit save as we choose the good, that the invisible Rectitude may be shown in undoing us as well as in making us prosper, and that always beyond our longings and the most imperious cravings of the heart is the question of what we are really worth,—with what solemnity may such thoughts affect us! James Vila Blake.

The Sunday School.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, March 2. Subject, Lesson XXIII., "Jesus and the Insane Girl." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

The inquiry is often made as to the best primary departments in Boston or vicinity for teachers to visit. We commend to those who wish such opportunities the primary or kindergarten departments at the First Church, Boston; Chelsea Unitarian church; All Souls' Church, Roxbury; Second Church, Boston; and the Unitarian church in Somerville.

The New Song and Service Book to be issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, which will appear about the end of March, will, among other aims, seek to prepare children for better forms of worship in the church. There will be proper admixture of chants and glorias in the services, as well as standard congregational tunes. It is also intended that the book shall be so well supplied with music for festival days that, in using the services for Christmas, Easter, and the like (which are in the volume), it will not be necessary to buy extra music. This book will be firmly bound with a leather back, opening readily. The price will probably be $4 a dozen.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—On Monday evening, February 18, the fourth meeting of the season was held by the Unitarian Sunday School Union at the Church of the Disciples. Just before the customary opening exercises Mr. Porter announced the death of another of our active members, Mr. Alexander W. Wilson, one of the Reception Committee for this year.

The subject for the meeting was "How to make the Sunday-school Room Attractive"; and the topic was attractively handled by Mr. Henry T. Bailey, State Supervisor of Drawing. To make the room attractive, Mr. Bailey said, first ventilate it well. Then see that teachers and pupils have comfortable seats. If you wish for an ideal room, you should subdivide it. Rods and portieres may be used if no other means can be found. As for decoration, Mr. Bailey's special word to us was to see that, whether our supply of pictures be large or small, there should be a change in the arrangement from time to time, and a gradual increase of our store. But all these matters he considers of secondary importance. The school-room, to be attractive to the pupils, must contain well-organized classes,—classes in which the pupils shall take an active part. Let one of the number be appointed secretary, and have him take the attendance most faithfully. Another should have charge of the contributions, and keep a record of those, too. For lesson-helps Mr. Bailey suggests that each class have a reference Bible of its own, and learn to use it. A good map and a concordance are a necessity; and note-books, rulers, and pencils are of great use, especially in a class of boys. A blackboard, whether for topics or for illustration, is of much value, as it appeals to the eye instead of to the ear. But, after all, the supreme attraction is the teacher; and the teacher must be a person who has learned the lesson, who knows how to get from it that which will help the pupil in his daily life, who can present the lesson interestingly, and who loves children. Finally, he must teach goodness incarnate; for that is the life of Christ.

Mr. John Lyman Faxon of Boston, secretary of the Public School Art League of America, told us of the artistic atmosphere in which Italian children are brought up, and urged us to create such an atmosphere for our children. True art is divine. It is born, and not made; and the bare walls of our churches and Sunday-schools will not help to create an artistic taste in our little folk. Let them become used to painted walls that shall tell the story of Christ's life. Let them see pictures of scenes in the Holy Land, and photographs of foreign cathedrals. Then they will learn in what church homes other children are housed. True art will develop the spirituality latent in every child.

Mrs. Howes of Somerville believes that the chief way to attract children to the Sunday-school is for the parents to go with their children.

Rev. B. F. McDaniel hoped for a second meeting upon this subject, in order that the teachers may confer upon ways and means.

Religious Intelligence.

THE regular monthly meeting of the Suffolk Branches of the National Alliance will be held at 25 Beacon Street on Monday, March 4, at eleven o'clock. Officers of other Branches are invited to be present.

THE regular monthly meeting of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, March 7, at twelve o'clock. Mrs. Andrews will be present, and speak of her visit to India. All ladies interested are cordially invited to attend.

UNITARIAN GROVE MEETING ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the corporation, also a meeting of the board of directors, will take place at the Manchester House in Manchester, N.H., on Monday, March 4, at eleven o'clock A.M. All Unitarians interested in the Weirs Grove Meetings are earnestly invited to be present. J. W. Fellows, Clerk of the Corporation.

MONTANA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.—Our school has suffered loss by fire during the recent cold term. "An attempt to keep an unfinished room warm enough for dormitory purposes with a wood stove, when the thermometer was ten degrees below zero, resulted disastrously. Fortunately, the fire was in the day-time, else there would have been danger to life. The room was in the loft of the shop. The whole building was destroyed; but the most of the tools, etc., in the shop were saved. The chief loss is in bedding and bedsteads. Temporary arrangements for lodging the large boys will be made in the main building. It is hoped that the friends of the school will be so generous in their gifts to its treasury that at the end of the school year, July 1, all expenses, including the additional one caused by the fire in the loss of furniture, will be met. It is probable that the work of rebuilding will be delayed until plans for the future of the school after July 1 are matured.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: March 3, Rev. Edward Hale will preach. Services at 10.30 A.M. and 3.30 P.M.

Rev. C. F. Dole will conduct the service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, March 6, at twelve o'clock.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe will preach at the Church of the Disciples, Warren Avenue and Brookline Street, on Sunday morning, in the absence of Mr. Ames.

Ministers' Monday Club: March 4, 10.30 A.M. Rev. J. T. Lusk will preside. Rev. J. H. Whitmore will give the essay, on "The Present Attitude and Tendency of American Unitarianism to the Spirit of the Age."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Service Sunday evening, March 3, at 7.30, conducted by Rev. James De Normandie. Subject, "The Real Remedy for Social Ills." Music by the "Marion Osgood Orchestra," six pieces. Soloists: Miss Kathleen Russell, contralto; Mr. Joseph L. White, baritone. All seats free.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday, March 3, afternoon at 3.15; evening at 8, when Rev. Samuel M. Crothers will speak upon "Saint Francis of Assisi." On Monday evening, March 4, at 7.45, Mr. C. W. Birtwell of the the Children's Aid Society will speak on "Child-saving."

At the Bulfinch Place Church, on last Sunday night, memorial services were held in honor of the late Frederick Douglass. The speakers were William Lloyd Garrison, Henry B. Blackwell, and Mr. Butler R. Wilson, a colored lawyer of Boston, who spoke eloquently of the great work Mr. Douglass did for the colored race.

Second Church: Commencing with Sunday afternoon, March 3, a series of six vespers services will be given in the main auditorium of the Second Church, intended primarily to meet the wants of young people and the many strangers and visitors in the adjacent hotels to Copley Square. These services will be but an hour in length (from 4 P.M. to 5 P.M.), the pastor, Rev. Thomas Van Ness, giving a short address on "Lent: Its Meaning for us." Mr. H. G. Tucker will preside at the organ, and the choir on the first occasion will be augmented by thirty voices from one of the Boston chorus societies. The music of "Noël" (Saint-Saëns) will be rendered in full.

New South Church, corner Tremont and Camden Streets (Rev. Loren B. Macdonald, pastor): Special services will be held Sunday evenings during Lent at 7.30. Service of song, with short addresses by the pastor, on "The Religion of Jesus, as taught in the Beatitudes,"—March 3, "The Poor in Spirit"; March 10, "They that Mourn"; March 17, "The Meek"; March 24, "They that hunger and thirst after Righteousness"; March 31, "The Merciful"; April 7, "The Pure in Heart"; April 14, "The Peacemakers." These services will be held in the vestry, and will be social and informal in spirit. An orchestra consisting of several instruments will assist the congregational singing.

The Harvard Unitarian Club, a new organization founded this year to bring together in the discussion of practical questions the young men of the Divinity School and the Unitarian preachers of Boston, held its last monthly meeting in the parlors of the Second Church. The subject, "Enrichment of Church Service," brought out a good attendance. Rev. Edward E. Hale opened with an historical statement of the growth of the Anglican Liturgy. He showed how, instead of its being possibly the best liturgical service which could have been composed at the time, it was largely a compromise; and its literary merit is, therefore, much below what might have been expected. He then outlined what should be the congregational order of procedure, commented on the service as used in the South Congregational Church, and mentioned his preference for two Scripture readings (not necessarily from the Old and New Testaments); also for a good responsive reading, which he would take directly from the Psalms as they are in the Bible. At the conclusion of his address Rev. Howard N. Brown followed, and gave a short sketch of the development of liturgical feeling in the Brookline church. Originally, it was Puritan of the Puritans in its simplicity; but now, since the new Book of Prayer and Praise has been used, he felt certain that his congregation would not be willing to go back to the old days of barren simplicity. Mr. Horton spoke of the liturgy which had been used by him for over ten years in the Second Church. He would be glad to welcome something better than the Martineau collection, abridged and altered as it had been by Mr. Collier. As to the effect of such liturgy upon the Second Church congregation he was not sure. Possibly, as many people had been driven away from the church as had been attracted to it by so elaborate a service. Mr. Cuckson followed by advising the young men to carefully prepare every slight detail of the morning service. He especially insisted that the choir should be brought into harmony with the pulpit, emphasizing more particularly the musical side of the liturgical service. No one present spoke adversely in regard to the need of liturgical enrichment, the general sentiment being, as Mr. Hale expressed it, for greater form and beauty. Americans, he said, love uniforms, banners, and symbols in civic and political life; and just now there is an equally strong tendency in this same direction in the religious world.

BELFAST, ME.—A correspondent writes: "The parlors of the Unitarian parsonage were filled on the evening of February 14 with a large and brilliant company, the occasion being a reception tendered Rev. and Mrs. J. M. Leighton by the members of the church and parish. The rooms were beautifully decorated with evergreens, smilax, and hot-house flowers, festooned with yellow and olive-green ribbons, and presented a scene of great beauty. From 7 to 10 P.M. Mr. and Mrs. Leighton received their friends of the parish, the local clergy, and the press, standing under a canopy of smilax and roses. In the adjoining rooms a dainty lunch was served by the young ladies of the parish. An orchestra stationed in one of the upper rooms discoursed sweet music throughout the evening. The Belfast Age, commenting, says, 'The popularity attained by Rev. and Mrs. Leighton during their sojourn among us is not confined to their own parish, but embraces the whole community.'"

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Rev. Francis A. Tiffany preached in the First Parish Church on Sunday, February 24. Rev. S. M. Crothers is in St. Paul; and Prof. Peabody, who was to have taken his place, was kept at home by illness.

The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet on Monday, March 4, with Rev. J. T. G. Nichols, D.D., 33 Kirkland Street. Collation at 1 P.M. Essay at 2. Subject, "Discipleship of Jesus." Hilary Bygrave, Scribe.

DOVER, N.H.—The Dover church, closed for the last two months, is to begin services again about the middle of March. Its people are loyal and earnest, but one of the furnaces of the meeting-house gave out just as the cold began to strengthen. Then upon this came the bank failures, which brought heavy losses upon many in the church. Now many are increasing their subscriptions; and, with a warmer interest comining with the milder March weather, the congregation will worship in comfort, and prosper.

FARMINGTON, ME.—The society in Farmington is undergoing the encouraging process of regeneration. The younger disciples of liberal religion in the town have come to the determination that our church shall be opened for regular worship. Last Sunday the New England superintendent preached to about two hundred people, most of them deeply interested in the enterprise. He announced that church services and Sunday-school would be held continuously thereafter every Sunday. Not for four years has the church been kept open the year round, but now the prospect is very encouraging for a self-supporting and prosperous society.

PASSAIC, N.J.—Our New York correspondent writes: "The Passaic Unitarians gave a reception to their new pastor, Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks, on Wednesday evening, February 20. From the hearty expressions of satisfaction and gladness with which the one hundred and twenty-five parishioners and friends welcomed him, one might conclude that a new society is never fully happy until it has settled a minister. 'Dear old father Camp,' as the president of the society lovingly called the ever youthful-seeming pastor of the Third Church in Brooklyn, was present, and in one of his brightest speeches greeted Mr. Wicks as his successor in the charge of the Passaic society. Addresses were also made by Rev. George H. Badger of Rutherford, Rev. D. W. Morehouse of New York, and by Mr. Wicks, whose felicitous remarks were in so fine and manly a spirit that his parishioners had reason to feel very proud and happy over their new minister. Some excellent solo singing by Miss Guthrie and a generous collation completed the evening's enjoyment.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—At the meeting of the Unitarian Club on February 21 Rev. Merle St. Croix Wright of New York spoke of "Certain Recent Tendencies in French Literature," which exhibited one nation's peril and should serve as a warning to others. For two hundred years preceding the present century classicism dominated French literature. It gave place to romanticism, which, in turn, was succeeded by the realistic or materialistic school. Taine, Zola, and De Maupassant are leaders of this school, which is pessimistic to a degree which passes comprehension,—so pessimistic that pessimism is optimistic to it. It holds that 'vice and virtue are products, like vitriol and sugar. . . . The true critic accepts them as facts, but does not extol the one nor decry the other.' These writers do not believe in morality, in a future life, or in God. Renan says of such writers, 'To them only the evil and the ugly are real.' But a reaction has set in. The result of the Franco-Prussian War led thoughtful Frenchmen to seek the underlying cause of the defeat of their country, and they were not long in finding it in materialism. In 1889 a "Moral Defence Association" was formed among the students, under the lead of some of their professors; and it has increased in membership very rapidly. Its object is to raise the moral tone of France. Dumas, fils, wrote to Figaro in 1891, 'The profound reaction against this eternal depiction of evil is growing rapidly'; and Le Maître speaks of it as "a softening of the soul," seeking to add morals to mind in order to save the nation. France has anticipated all other nations in carrying pessimism to its ultimate conclusion, and she has found that the end is death. Let us be warned by her experience, and realize that a nation's true wealth is the noble men she produces, and not the extent of her territory nor the material prosperity she may enjoy.

At the conclusion of Mr. Wright's remarks President Harned returned the thanks of the club to the speaker for his exceedingly interesting and eloquent address. A quartette of young girls from the Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Blind added to the pleasure of the occasion by singing several pieces.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.—The church in San Diego was burned on the night of Monday, February 18. The loss is about $19,000, against which there is an insurance of $6,000.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Second Unitarian Church: The annual meeting held in January passed off very pleasantly. After the numerous reports of the various societies the ladies served the company with refreshments. A pleasant musical programme followed. The treasurer's report showed that all bills had been paid, and a small balance left in the treasury. The membership of the church had been increased by thirty-eight names during the year. Resolutions of tribute and respect to Mr. and Mrs. Sprague were passed unanimously. Since the year's work began, the trustees have released Mr. Sprague from all work in the Sunday-school, and elected Mrs. Sprague to serve as superintendent. At their meeting in February the trustees elected Mrs. Sprague to serve as assistant to the pastor, authorizing her to represent the church in all the pastoral offices and to relieve Mr. Sprague from part of the burden of two services a Sunday. We are all looking forward to a course of lectures to be given by Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, who will visit us in March.

SEATTLE, WASH.—Rev. Dr. Acton preached recently on "Undercurrents," showing how influences from God work on the destinies of mortals, leading them to final success or failure, according to their loyalty to truth and right.

TORONTO, CANADA.—At the second annual meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian church after the settlement of Rev. H. H. Woude an address was presented to the pastor, cordially assuring him of their entire satisfaction in his ministrations and their high appreciation of his sermons, and especially thanking him for his effective service on behalf of the Sunday-school. The address refers to the prosperity and rapid growth of the school, the interest in the "Young People's Association," the minister's untiring efforts to further the social life of the congregation, and rejoices with him in the bright future which is before the church and the cause in Toronto.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Worcester League of Unitarian Women held their February meeting on Wednesday, February 20, at the South Unitarian Church, Worcester. Besides the three Unitarian churches in the city, the First Universalist and All Souls' were represented; and members were present from Clinton, Grafton, Holden, Hopedale, Leicester, Millbury, Sterling, Uxbridge, and Warren. The subject of the day was "Liberal Beliefs"; and Miss Adaline May of Leicester read the first paper, on "Should Reason and Conscience be Final Authorities in Matters of Religious Belief?" after which Mrs. Cyrus A. Roys of Uxbridge gave extracts from Dr. Channing's sermons defining reason and conscience. Intermission was taken for luncheon, temptingly prepared by ladies of the South Church. At the afternoon session Mrs. Royal Cheney read a paper on "Have the Words 'Conversion,' 'Conviction,' and 'Experiencing Religion' any meaning in our Liberal Theology?" And Mrs. Sarah Theo Brown read the last paper of the afternoon, on "Is it our Duty to carry our own Light as far into the World's Darkness as we can?" The broadness of thought and the liberality of all the writers and speakers made not only an interesting day, but a helpful one.

UNION CONFERENCE.—A union conference of guilds, Unity Clubs, and temperance societies will be held in Channing Hall at 10 A.M. and 2 P.M., Wednesday, March 13. The morning subjects and speakers will be as follows: Rev. W. H. Lyon, "Parish Papers"; Rev. E. F. Hayward, "A Boys' Club"; Rev. W. F. Greenman, "The Teaching Value of Good Literature"; Rev. A. J. Rich, "Unity Clubs: How to do it." Mr. J. G. Thorp, "The Norwegian System of License for Massachusetts." In the afternoon: Rev. A. J. Culp, "The Guild as a Ministers' Opportunity"; Rev. E. J. Prescott, "The Guild as a Help to the Church"; Miss L. Freeman Clarke, "The Study Class Work of the Women's Alliance"; Mrs. Emily A. Fifield, "The Work of the Women's Alliance." All clubs, guilds, and Alliances are invited to send delegates. A cordial invitation is extended to every one interested in the meeting. A temperance service to be used March 17 is now ready. In its general plan it very much resembles that of last year, of which the work and teachings of Dr. Hale was the basis. The present service has the temperance work of Mrs. Mary A. Livermore as its general subject. Orders may be sent at once to the secretary, Rev. George W. Cooke, 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—The winter meeting of the Norfolk Conference was held at Neponset in the Church of the Unity Thursday, February 21. Although the day was cold and bleak, the attendance was large. Rev. Eugene R. Shippen was to have led the devotional service; but, as he was detained by illness, Rev. Solon W. Bush kindly took his place at a moment's notice, choosing as his theme "Inspiration," and this subject formed the basis of brief remarks by others.

At eleven o'clock the president, Mr. Richard C. Humphreys, called the conference to order for the transaction of business. The report of the secretary was read and approved. A letter received from the National Council of Unitarian Churches, with a view to reaching more closely the individual adherents to the liberal faith within the bounds of each local conference, was referred by the president to a committee of five, of which Rev. Henry F. Jenks of Canton is chairman, to report at a later meeting. The usual collection was then taken up, amounting (with the addition of contributions received in the afternoon) to $50.02. Of this sum, $50 was set apart to relieve a case of private need which had been brought to the attention of the directors.

The address of the morning was delivered by Rev. George Batchelor of Lowell, on the comprehensive yet most fascinating subject, "The Passage from Philosophy to Religion." According to Mr. Batchelor, all ideas, as ideas, must disappear before they become imbedded in character. Philosophy is but the raw material which must suffer certain changes before it can be a helpful and inspiring factor in the religious life.

Rev. Howard N. Brown of Brookline opened the discussion, speaking eloquently and forcibly in the same vein, and was followed by Rev. Messrs. Stebbins, Allen, Horner, Dr. Osgood of Cohasset, Mrs. Bagley, Mrs. Webster, and the president.

At one o'clock Rev. George H. Hosmer, the pastor of the entertaining church, cordially invited the members of the conference to partake of the collation which was ready in the vestry.

Upon coming together at 2.15 in the afternoon, the roll of churches was called, the result being that twelve ministers and about two hundred lay delegates were found to be present, besides other friends. It was also voted that the president and secretary convey the appreciation of the conference to Rev. W. R. Lord (now taking up his residence in St. Paul) for his devotion to the highest interests of the body during his connection therewith.

Rev. Ellery C. Butler of Quincy then spoke earnestly upon the theme, "The Church and the Young Men." Rev. William H. Branigan of the Norfolk Church in Dorchester followed Mr. Butler in a well-considered address. Others taking part in the discussion were: Mr. Henry Faxon of Quincy; Rev. Mr. Wilson, pastor of the Baptist church in Neponset; Rev. Mr. Savary; Mr. Charles A. Porter, Jr.; and the president. After the thanks of the conference had been extended to the Church of the Unity for its bountiful entertainment, and to the principal speakers of the day, the conference adjourned with the singing of the doxology and the benediction, pronounced by Dr. Osgood of Cohasset.

Business Notices.

The Triennial Examination of the John Hancock Life Insurance Company of this city, as required by the laws of this Commonwealth, has just been completed by Insurance Commissioner George S. Merrill. The result is of considerable public interest, and the report is given in full elsewhere. It states that, after an examination in detail of all the items in the assets of the company, the amounts were found to agree with great uniformity with those appearing in the company's official statement, the only cases where any variation was noticed being where the company conservatively claimed less values than have been allowed by the examiners. This company was incorporated and began business in 1862; and, in its entire history, no obligation has been defaulted, nor has any just claim lacked prompt satisfaction. The commissioner says that their records are clear and honorable,—a pride and credit to the financial institutions of the Commonwealth and country. A substantial advance has been made by this company since the last triennial examination. The distributions of surplus of this company, as regards the ordinary business, are made annually, and make a favorable indication of prudence and economy of management; for, as appears by the annual statements submitted to the Massachusetts Insurance Department, this company ranks in class of four companies, excelling in liberality in this respect. The distributions to the industrial policies are made once in five years. The great detail of allotting and applying the dividends to the hundreds of thousands of these policies would make a more frequent distribution an unwarrantable expense.

A Relic of the Past.—Perhaps some of our readers can recall the old-fashioned lowboys and highboys which were so much in use a century ago, and many of which are still to be seen in the rural towns that boast of colonial mansions and old families. This year, for the first time, it is possible to find a highboy among the designs of new furniture. They have one at Paine's on Canal Street. It is a veritable old-fashioned highboy, with the addition of a mirror at the top. (See the engraving in another column.)

BY REV. CHARLES T. CANFIELD.

Humanity! Humanity!
Thou guest of ages long,
All creeds and forms are vanity,
We wait thy matin song.
In sin and shame, through blood and strife,
'Mid gloom of darkest night,
A voice still calling unto life,—
A voice,—“Let there be light.”

The morning stars shall chant refrain,
And earth rejoice in thee;
The world shall triumph o'er its pain
In glad humanity.
Nor star of old can light our way
As to thy heights we go;
But truth and right shall be as day,
Thy upward path to show.

O high and grand Humanity!
In lowly service great,
All creeds and forms are vanity,
But love thy lofty state.
And, where thy pierced feet have trod
In dust thy footsteps bare,
Still give the guidance of our God
Thy place with him to share.

O glorified Humanity!
Unveiled on the cross,
All creeds and forms are vanity,
And crowns and thrones are dross.
But thou the holiest we know,
From chief of humankind,
Humanity divine dost show,
And God in thee we find.

THE NEW THERAPEUTICS.

A VESPER SERVICE ADDRESS AT HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

BY REV. FRANCIS G. PEABODY, D.D.

“Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.”—ROM. xii. 21.

It is coming to be believed by the medical profession that we are very possibly on the eve of a great revolution in medical practice. Only a few years ago our methods of surgery were practically revolutionized by the use of antiseptics, so that many operations are now made by surgeons, and many lives are now saved, which seemed a dozen years ago simply hopeless. And now the doctors are beginning to say, “It is our turn.” It seems not altogether inconceivable that a few years hence many of the contagious diseases which are now the scourges of civilization—diseases like diphtheria or cholera or scarlet fever—may be robbed of most of their terrors. It may come to pass that every practising physician will have his laboratory of bacteriology, just as he now has his consulting-room. It is already reported from Great Britain that the deaths from diphtheria have been reduced, under the new treatment, from 30 per cent. of cases to 5 per cent., or from a yearly average of 3,900 to a yearly average of 800. And what is the principle on which this proposed change of practice rests? The principle is not, as in the old practice, the conquering of effects of disease after it has fastened on the system: it is the prevention of the entrance of disease by fortifying the constitution against it. It is not proposed to destroy the germs of disease; but it is proposed to establish a capacity of resistance, against which these germs are to be powerless. The life of the patient is to be so treated that the disease simply finds no soil to fasten on, no material on which to feed. The life becomes, as the doctors say, “immune” to the disease. It is given immunity, that is to say, from the danger. The germs attack in vain a life that has been thus—as the new word says—“immunized.” And how does this immunity come to pass? It comes to pass, so the new doctrine believes, by inoculation from another fortified life. It is security by contagion. A safe life imparts safety. We are in the habit of thinking of contagion as a quality of disease, but here we have the contagion of health. The life of some animal is treated until it becomes at last impervious to the disease, and from that one life thus immunized immunity proceeds. One such life, impenetrable to contagion, becomes the safety of a thousand. And so the health of a community may come to depend on the existence in it of enough of these fortified lives. They simply crowd out the contagion of disease by imparting the contagion of health. There is not room for both. The germs will continue to float in the atmosphere, but they will find no entrance with the “immunized” life. The doctor says, “Be not overcome of this evil, but overcome the evil by the preoccupation of your life by good.”

Now, whether these new and startling discoveries in medicine are so revolutionary as many people believe is not, of course, our business here. But it is certainly interesting to notice that this newly proposed way of salvation for the bodily life only repeats the true doctrine of salvation for the life of the conscience and the soul. What is it to have a perfectly healthy conscience? Some people think, and some people teach, that a healthy conscience is a sensitive and watchful conscience, always guarding itself against the attacks of the enemy, like an alert soldier in a hostile land.

And, of course, this sensitive, watchful conscience is much better than a sleepy and careless one. And yet it is not perfect health. It is an invalid conscience, guarding itself from harm, afraid of what is coming, dreading exposure to temptation. A perfectly healthy conscience is a much more rugged thing. It is not susceptible. It is the safe, the immunized conscience. And, in the same way, what is a saved soul? It is not an invalid soul,—a frail, delicate, convalescent thing, always in danger of a new attack. A perfectly saved soul is a safe soul,—a soul that is impenetrable to temptation. A fort that is impregnable is safer than one that has been lost and regained. It is not so much saved as it is safe. And how does this safety of conscience or soul come about? It comes about, says the new teaching, through contact with the purified life. One life becomes impenetrably sound and clean, and then its contagion “immunizes” other lives. A good man gives goodness, just as a sick man gives disease. A safe soul becomes a saviour of other souls. A quiet, unassuming mother lives in a home, leading a life before which evil thoughts simply shrink away; and that contagion of purity and simplicity affects the whole home circle, and saves it from worldliness and sin. Jesus goes his way among the sins of his age, impervious to their solicitations,—tempted in all points, yet without sin; and it is as if a fresh west wind blew across a malarial plain and the germs of selfishness and bigotry, which still swarm in the atmosphere of his nation, simply cannot fasten on those whom his spirit has blessed. Such is the higher therapeutics of the soul. The salvation of a life or of a world is to be found, not in the impossible abolition of evil, but in the overcoming of evil by good. The good life imparts itself, and then the germs of evil, though they still float in every breeze, find no room to enter. The contagion of the good has killed the poison of the bad.

Now take that doctrine for one moment into the affairs of our daily life, and see how it opens with a new courage and hope. Here is a college; and it has its sporadic cases of evil, just as it has its occasional cases of disease. These evils are to be deplored: they bring harm and shame on us all. It is impossible among three thousand men that offences shall not come; but woe unto those by whom they come! It were better—at least for them—if a millstone were hanged about their necks, and they were cast into the sea. And yet, in spite of such evils, what is the most remarkable fact of our moral condition? It is its general excellence. Just as one often wonders why contagious diseases get so little hold in our crowded life, so he should wonder that the contagion of evil which blights a soul here and there touches us so slightly. Let us thank God for the great body of robust and fearless manhood going its way through the temptations of youth perfectly pure and clean. Here is the secret of our moral health,—in this great body of immunized lives among us; and here is the moral problem of the university,—not the impossible task of wholly exterminating the possibilities of evil, but the happier work of multiplying and developing and encouraging these fortified lives, these manly men, who can go up and down amid possibilities of contagion, and yet be perfectly safe and free. Each man thus freed becomes a medium of social immunity. The safety of the whole lies in the overcoming of evil contagion by the spread of good contagion. A young man cannot hide from evil, but he can become impervious to it. If he only cast out the devil from his life, and leaves that life empty, back comes the devil, with others worse than the first. But let him establish contact with immunized lives, let him take up with the interests which give no room for sin; and then his life comes to partake of that immunity. Spiritual bacteria, like physical ones, thrive only in the life which provides a soil for them. They cannot be barred out, but they can be starved out. The way to overcome evil is to be preoccupied with good.

And it is the same in the larger world about us, with all its solemn problems and anxious fears. A great many people are dreaming of a different world from this one; a world which shall have no contentions or competitions, no social disorders or temptations; a world where the germs of evil shall be no longer in the air. But that is not the world as it is given, or is likely to be given to us; and a new social programme which depends on thus transforming the world is little more than a dream. Science is not sanguine of the extinction of evil germs. It turns to the more promising task of the fortifying of life against them. It may be possible some day to make this hard world soft; but the present problem is to make this soft human nature hard and strong, and to take the world as it is, and must be. You look out into the world about you, and you see possibilities of evil on every hand. You see temptation and dissipation, drink and lust, restlessness and ambition, scattering their germ of desire about man's paths; and you wonder what is to banish all this evil from the world. Well, it is not going to be banished. That is the probable truth. Evil is here to stay. But then you look again, and you see what is possible,—a miracle of the moral life, beside which these triumphs of medicine are but commonplace. You see that the evil is not to be exterminated, but that it is to become uncontagious. You see the pure life walking among these poisonous paths in perfect security, just as a hospital nurse walks unscathed through her wards, fortified against disease by her healthy consecration. And then you say: “That is the way of the healthy soul. Its perfect love casts out fear. It carries safety, because it is safe itself. It is not afraid of life: it is the master of life. It is not overcome of evil: it overcomes evil with good.”

A CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

AN ORTHODOX CONGREGATIONAL MINISTER'S IDEA OF WHAT IT STANDS FOR.

Rev. H. P. DeForrest of the Woodward Congregational Church, Detroit, preached a sermon recently on “What one Church stands for: A Declaration of Principles.” He took his text from Gal. v. 13: “For, brethren, you were called for freedom. Only use not freedom for an occasion unto the flesh, but through love be servants one to another.” The following is an abstract of his discourse:—

ITS AIM AND PURPOSE.

It seems to me fitting, as this church is summing up its record for another year and laying its plans for the future, that we should give expression, for our own stimulus, and for the information of the public we seek to serve, to the purpose and aim which we set before us, as one among the family of Christian churches in this community. Churches as well as men have, and ought to have, their own individuality; and, if by this means there comes to be a variety in the specific aims which characterize them, the more likely is it that the varied needs of a great community will be met. The real use of sects is not, as is sometimes thought, in the assumption on the part of each that the particular tenet for which they stand is the most important of all, constituting them the only true church, but in the fact that the variety of them affords opportunity for all shades of human thought and preference, and provides for the union in a congregation of those who can best work in sympathy toward the end of human betterment which all are to seek in common.

Because we have a specific aim and state it, it does not follow that we antagonize in any way the aims or efforts of other churches that may differ somewhat from our own. We recognize with gratitude the good work which they are doing. It may be, and often is, greater than we are able to do. We desire to be in the greatest possible accord with them in the spirit of Christian brotherhood. We set up no rivalry, and we will be allured into no competition. We only ask for the liberty to do our own work in the way that seems to us most needed, and we heartily desire to co-operate with them all in those general aims which belong to us alike in the community.

FOUR ESSENTIAL POINTS.

In trying now to state the specific aims for which this particular church stands, I enumerate four points, as follows:—

1. It stands for the liberty of the spirit, as emphasized by Paul, and in modern times illumined by the Pilgrim founders of that branch of Christ's Church to which we are most closely allied. We do not worship the Pilgrim Fathers; but we do respect and reverence the men for their stanch character, their true courage, and especially for their supreme devotion to the rights of the individual conscience, and the freedom of thought and investigation. Their claim was that they were ready to follow God's blessing, wherever they saw it; but they were equally determined not to follow the dictation of any man or church or State. The enlargement of knowledge since then had been greater than in sixteen centuries before. To keep the Pilgrim succession, we must try to keep pace with this growing knowledge, in so far as it throws light on the essential principles of religion. All knowledge is of God, as all life is from him. The progress of the ages is his development of man. And, if to-day we have the means of knowing better than our fathers what the will of God is, we should be untrue to them if we did not follow its light fully, freely, frankly, whether we do it in company or alone.

2. This church, then, tends also for the fundamental truth that the essentials of Christianity are not established forms or articulated creeds, but a spirit and a life; and that these essentials are to be emphasized by the church, and the non-essentials are sternly subordinated. For instance, the essential in regard to God is that he is the living, present, loving energy of spiritual life, in whom we live and move and have our being. The essential truth in regard to Jesus of Nazareth is in what he has revealed to us of God. The essential thing in regard to the future after death is not what is to be, of which we have little knowledge, but rather how to be best fitted for that future by entering into the life in God now.

ERROR OF DOGMATISM.

It is the serious error of dogmatism that it concerns itself but little with the essentials, but insists continually that, in order to be orthodox, one must accept the speculations of human minds about the being of God and the details of the life beyond the grave. Desiring to avoid this error, we refuse to make the dogmas of theology a condition of church membership. We emphasize the importance of clear thinking about them, but we do not ask those who come to us what they believe concerning them. Our warrant for insisting on certain truths as essential, and ruling out non-essentials as confusing and immaterial, is, on the one hand, in the lessons of experience, and, on the other, in that unmistakable declaration of Jesus himself: “Thou

3. This church stands, also, for the searching and reverent study, according to true scientific methods, of the Scriptures, and their interpretation in the light of the actual facts of their origin and history. We do not assert that every one should know the latest facts about the Bible in order to lead a Christian life, or that the clearest understanding of its history alone will produce that life; but we do believe that, for those who are seeking for a clearing up of the misconceptions about revelation, and for an elucidation of the difficulties and puzzles which abound in the common interpretation of its writings, there is a satisfaction and a power to be found in a clear understanding of what modern research has made plain. And for such the book which they are in danger of laying aside in despair will become instinct with life, and crowded with the evidences of divine working with men. And we think it is all wrong that the key to this greatest of books which is supplied by its history should be locked up in the knowledge of a few scholars, and not given to all the people.

CONTINUOUS REVELATION.

We believe in this book as a revelation, not by occasional breakings forth of the supernatural into the sensuous, but by the constant and uninterrupted actions of God on the living spirits of men of old, by which they were continually helped to gain clearer and nobler ideas of God and truth out of the experience of life, and to speak out to the world the great and growing thoughts which came to them. And we are not out of the line of reverent belief in the God we worship when we also believe that God still lives, and is helping men to see the clearer truth; and that inspiration is not a thing of a remote past, but a reality of every age, in proportion as men awake to the touch of the divine Spirit. We do not see how it is possible to believe in a living God and not believe in this.

4. We stand alone, and hope, as facilities increase, to stand more and more evidently for the practical application of a rational and spiritual Christianity to the actual life of the community. The Church is not merely an institution for the purposes of formal worship: it is to make itself a picture to the world of what the real kingdom of God is,—the sway of God, which is the sway of righteousness and truth and love in the whole life of man, individual and social. It is to make itself a centre of light and warmth, filled itself with the spirit of love, and seeking to pervade all the activities of life—society, commerce, literature—with its own atmosphere. Nothing is foreign to it but evil, nothing is trivial to it which belongs to healthy human activity. Unless the Church can destroy the idea that the religious life is something apart from the common life, and lift into prominence the truth that religion is to pervade all life, it will never bring in the real kingdom of God.

SOME POINTS OF DIFFERENCE.

Such, in mere outline, is the specific aim of this church. In its main outline it is one with all others. If in any points we differ from them, it is not for the sake of difference, but incidental to the following out of our individuality. We stand in the succession of the free men who founded our Church and State. We claim the liberty of conscience and of untrammelled thought and investigation. We put forward the union with the eternal Spirit of the living God as the one essential thing in religion, and the exercises of the spirit of love which is born of it as the one mark of a true Christian. We stand for an intelligent understanding and a rational interpretation of Scripture in the light of all the facts that can be obtained. We stand for an applied Christianity, whose function is not to say to any man, "Stand by thyself, for I am holier than thou," but which is related to life in all its aspects, and makes all things sacred which partake of its spirit.

In this attitude we appeal to the community. We welcome all who are of like spirit, without question concerning differences in speculative opinions. We put no five-barred fence before our doors, but only ask for evidence of a Christian spirit, or of a hunger for it, to receive those who knock at our gates.

INSURANCE DEPARTMENT,

BOSTON, January 30, 1895.

Under the provision of the law of this Commonwealth, requiring triennial examination of all its insurance corporations, the usual investigation of the affairs of this Company has just been completed.

All the assets claimed by the Company have been examined in detail, each item having been separately verified and checked, and the amounts found to agree with great uniformity with those appearing in the Company's official statement. The only cases where any variation is noticed are where the Company has conservatively claimed less values than have been allowed by the examiners.

The items of liability have in the same manner been separately investigated. The net premium reserve, which comprises nearly 98 per cent. of the total liability, has been computed from the registers of the Insurance Department. These registers, under the practice of the Department, constitute an entirely separate and distinct record of the policy accounts of the Company; and in this respect are a complete history of the policy transactions from the beginning, accounting for, in respect to the ordinary business, every policy issue in consecutive numbers, as well as the date and manner of termination of all those which have ceased to be in force. The computation of the reserve by the Department is, therefore, from independent records, and a matter wholly distinct from that of the Company, and in the present case corroborates with great exactness the results found in the office of the Company.

This Company was incorporated and commenced business in 1862, and has, therefore, been continuously under the provisions of the non-forfeiture laws of the Commonwealth, the first of which was enacted in 1861. The design of these laws was to prevent the confiscation of the accrued values of life insurance policies, in case the insured was unable or unwilling to continue his premium payments, and to require the substantial equivalent of such values to be applied to the benefit of the owner of the policy either in cash or extended insurance. Previous to these enactments there was no restraint whatever upon any life insurance company in this respect, and the rule among the companies of the country generally had been rank forfeiture of the entire values and interests of lapsed policies; but, by the influence of these laws, although they applied only to Massachusetts companies, there has resulted an entire change in the practice of the companies generally throughout the country, until now it is rare to find one in which the rights and equities of the insured in this regard are not fully or largely recognized.

In the entire history of this Company, as may be said in common of all the five Massachusetts Life Companies, no obligation has been defaulted, nor any just claim lacked prompt satisfaction. Their records are clear and honorable, a pride and credit to the financial and fiduciary institutions of the Commonwealth and country. And while not in the slightest degree reflecting upon or disparaging the soundness or goodness of the many excellent companies admitted to transact business in this State, or implying that any of them are not as good as our Massachusetts companies, the Commissioner is entirely free to say that he does not believe any other State has any better companies than the five regular life companies of this Commonwealth.

The substantial advance made by this Company since the last triennial examination makes pertinent and interesting a comparison of its progress and the development of its business within the recent years.

During the first half of its existence the Company followed the usual plans of life, endowment, and term insurance. In 1879 it commenced the business of Industrial Insurance, and with one exception was the first company in this country to engage in this class of business; and it has steadily and conservatively pursued it until its present assured and established condition has been attained. Although the efforts of the management have been largely directed to this plan, the usual or so called Ordinary business has not been neglected. As an evidence of this, it will be seen that the amount of new insurance written in that Department during 1894 was $6,900,550, an amount in excess of that written in any other year of the Company's history. That the industrial plan entirely meets the needs of those for whom it was particularly designed is manifested by its success, which is so marked and prominent.

The Industrial plan consists distinctively of the issue of policies for limited amounts at correspondingly easy rates of premiums, having as its basis a weekly collection of five cents, the design being to bring the much needed and desired benefits of life insurance within the reach of those who are unable to accumulate or provide in a single sum the annual amount necessary to meet the costs of the usual and so-called Ordinary forms in use by the companies generally.

The proceeds of these small policies are designed and intended for meeting medical and other attendant charges of last sickness and as a burial fund, and in a majority of instances meet the need which would otherwise have to be supplied by charity or be a public charge.

The disbursements by the Industrial Companies of their many millions annually among scores of thousands of families have already produced an effect very marked and notable, as observed by the charitable institutions and relief societies in a diminution of calls for their aid.

The number of these policies in force on Dec. 31, 1894, in the three leading Industrial companies was 6,496,981, insuring $766,231,386, an increase of 1,016,627 policies and $131,318,590 of insurance during the year.

As encouragers and promoters of self-respect and thrift among those for whom these policies are designed, the Industrial companies are recognized and esteemed as powerful factors; and their wonderful growth and increase in membership is a matter of earnest and sincere congratulation.

The distributions of surplus of this Company as regards the Ordinary business are made annually, and, as may be seen by comparison with the premium receipts of that class, make a very favorable indication of prudence and economy of management; for, as appears by the annual statements submitted to the Massachusetts Insurance Department, this Company ranks in class of four companies, excelling in liberality in this respect. The distributions to the Industrial policies are made once in five years. The very great detail of allotting and applying the dividends to the hundreds of thousands of these policies would make a more frequent distribution an unwarrantable expense.

The following table, compiled from the official records of this Department, shows the progress of the Company during the past ten years:—

Insurance Commissioner

We make no distinction of rich or poor, learned or ignorant,—only of spirit and life. And, if we have a mission to any class more than another, it is to those who are burdened and troubled, and who, in the midst of the controversies of the day and the upheaval of old beliefs, are feeling uncertain whether there is any broad ground of Christianity on which all may stand, and any sure footing for the feet that cannot walk in the old paths of unquestioning belief. To such we hold out a hand warm with sympathy. We assert without fear that there is a resting-place for modern doubt, and that an intelligent acceptance of the fundamental principles of Christianity is not difficult, when unessentials are thrown aside. We, too, know the discomforts of uncertainty. We welcome intelligent question, honest scepticism, real hunger for truth and life. And we say, as Moses did to his brother-in-law, "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good; for we believe the Lord has spoken good concerning us."

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

With this aim and purpose, there are a few things absolutely essential to our large success.

We need thoroughly to understand our own position, otherwise we cannot hold it intelligently, or defend it from attack, or explain it to those who seek for light and help.

Brethren, we are called into freedom. It is a noble calling, and the time is ripe for it. Once it meant the rack and the stake. To-day the right of liberty is won by the sufferings of our fathers. We can have our liberty and do our work in peace.

But more important yet is it that we use it rightly. It is the spirit of love that is to master the world. We can do nothing in any other spirit. For only love is of God, and only he that loveth is born of God and knoweth God.

POTTER'S LECTURES AND SERMONS.*

Dr. Abbot's sketch of his friend will bring to many, even of those who knew Mr. Potter best and admired him most, a welcome addition to their knowledge of his early life. Talking little about himself—almost never, unless he had some pleasant or absurd experience to relate—and writing nothing, there was always a certain background of mystery to the man, as we knew him in the full stress of his maturest power. This Dr. Abbot has done much to clear up, though at the outset he is not able to tell us whether Mr. Potter was born Feb. 1, 1829, or Feb. 1, 1830. Mr. Potter's opinion leaned to the latter day, but with no positive inclination. He was the ninth child of his Quaker parents, William and Anna Potter of North Dartmouth, Mass. It would appear that he and his friend, William C. Gannett, had a common ancestor in Matthew Gannett, an early settler in Hingham, Mass. He went to the Friends' School in Providence, and afterward to the Bridgewater State Normal School. Dr. Abbot does not say so; but I believe the principal at Bridgewater, Nathaniel Tillinghast, an educator of exalted character and very great ability, was married to an elder sister of Mr. Potter. The boy's passion for an education seems to have had no encouragement and considerable opposition from his father, who would have made a farmer of him, like himself. The conflict of filial affection with the larger hope meant much unhappiness. There was also the conflict between his traditional Quakerism and a new order of belief that began early to develop in his mind; also, the conflict between his "mental attraction toward the ministry" and opposing considerations. Along with these conflicts, and in part, no doubt, because of them, we find a remarkable maturity at an early age. This was the most striking thing apparent in his "Twenty-five Sermons of Twenty-five Years," published in 1885. It made it possible for him to make such a selection without a painful contrast of the earlier with the later work. But ten years before the first of his New Bedford sermons we find the maturity which they displayed remarkably advanced.

Graduated from Harvard in 1854, he was for two years a classical teacher in the Cambridge High School. The two following years he was a student in the Harvard Divinity School. Of his experience there Dr. Abbot deigns no syllable; or was the record of these years an absolute blank? He went abroad in 1857, travelled widely, and studied at Berlin and Tübingen. The winter of 1858 finds him again in Cambridge; and he was ordained and installed at New Bedford Dec. 28, 1859, Dr. Furness preaching the sermon. Drafted into the United States service in 1863, his sermon, "The Voice of the Draft," attracted the attention of Secretary Stanton, who summoned him to Washington, where he served a term as hospital inspector, and another as chaplain of the Convalescent Camp in Alexandria. His sermon on the draft is printed in the present collection, and has more than a mere biographical or historical value. He was always in close touch with matters of great public interest; and this volume finds an appropriate end and climax in a sermon, "The Higher Patriotism," which lifts up an ideal that shames the average politics of our time, so sordid, mercenary, and corrupt.

Dr. Abbot passes more trippingly than one could wish over Mr. Potter's connection with the Free Religious Association and the Index; but all the leading facts are given. A brief study of his character, pp. xxi-xli, is admirably done, though not without the personal equation that we should expect to find in it. The account of Mr. Potter's mental processes on p. xxxii is, in reality, a comparison of those processes with Dr. Abbot's, and, in effect, an assertion of the superiority of the latter, while in appearance it approves Mr. Potter's lack of logical thoroughness. "He always stopped a little short of the extreme logic of the case" means that he could not always quite agree with Dr. Abbot, whose self-criticism is evident when he writes of Mr. Potter, "His temperamental moderation, both in action and in thought, saved him from that grim remorselessness in pursuing a principle to its last results which makes at once the strength of the speculative pioneer and the weakness of the practical reformer." A doubt obtrudes itself whether Dr. Abbot has not unduly made Mr. Potter his stalking-horse in his attack on the Free Religious Association, and whether the "state of arrested development" into which it "has lapsed since Potter's death" is "mainly because of the loss of his sagacious leadership." By "a state of arrested development" Dr. Abbot means the refusal of the Association to reorganize itself, as he would have it do, as a Church of Universal Excommunication, none to be admitted except those forswearing Christianity and Buddhism and Brahminism and Mohammedanism and every other form of historical religion. Dr. Abbot is confident that Mr. Potter would have been the willing chief of this Adullam's cave. I doubt it very much. The sentences which Dr. Abbot quotes to justify his interpretation do not bear it out, when taken in connection with other utterances of Mr. Potter and the later course of his activity. It was his deliberate opinion that we must look to the development of existing organizations rather than to the formation of societies specifically Free Religious for the best things the future has in store. He was never in such active sympathy with the Unitarian Association as during the last year of his life. The Western Unitarian Conference difficulty reached for him a perfectly satisfactory solution in the Resolution of 1892. That he favored the formation of new societies by those who could not conscientiously remain in the historical churches there can be no doubt, nor any, to my mind, that he would have favored the action of the Free Religious Association in May last, looking in this direction; but that he would ever have found the hope of universal religion more in an organization built on the express repudiation of all historical religion than on the widening sympathies of existing bodies I could only believe by first believing him transformed into another and a wholly different man. He was nothing if not an evolutionist: this book is proof of nothing if it is not proof of this. And, consequently, he must have been much more illogical than Dr. Abbot thinks to have expected more for the Church Universal from a hard-and-fast mechanical reconstruction than from the organic development of existing churches and religions into a lively sympathy and cordial interchange of spiritual gifts.

Dr. Abbot has supplemented his sketch with extracts from a journal kept by Mr. Potter in the years 1847-1858. These self-communings of a pure and earnest spirit are very noble and inspiring. They would have been invaluable if they had been continued through his ministry. How much we should have prized his comment on the religious interests of his career, and on those shocks of tragic fortune which, after long anxiety, left him the lonely father of his motherless children!—these would so certainly have been entirely simple and sincere, and therefore helpful to any in like circumstances of distress.

Passing from the biographical sketch to the following lectures and sermons, the best that can be said of them is that they sustain the impression made by the former volume. It was not to be expected that they would do more than that, and they do not. It may even be questioned if we have here so many sermons of great ability as we had there. But, if there is any loss upon the intellectual side, the gain on the emotional side more than makes it good. We had in Mr. Potter a man of strong religious nature and profound religious sentiment passing from the Transcendentalist position to that of entire devotion to the scientific method, and complete acceptance of the scientific facts; and the problem which he set himself was how, without any real religious loss, to exercise this method and allow these facts, and how to express the facts of science in the language of religion, and the facts of religion in the language of science. Many have entertained this problem, but it was Mr. Potter's advantage to do it with an absolute sincerity. We have no patched up compromise, in which neither science nor religion is its true self, as in so many reconciliations of science and religion. The religious outcome may or may not be what the traditionalist would like for it to be, but it is so much as science actually allows. The first seven lectures are a connected whole. The first, "Religious Sentiment in the Light of Science," is of a general character, a noble plea for religion as something that is not merely intellectual; and then we have six lectures on "The Twenty-third Psalm in the Nineteenth Century." Each lecture is the explication of a verse. The method in each case is to seek out the essential meaning of the verse, and then to ask what truth that meaning has for us in the light of modern science. Here is a splendid tour de force, and it is justified by its success to a degree that would have seemed to the most of us quite impossible in advance of the attempt. But it still remains a question whether it was well to attempt anything so difficult. In every lecture there is a helpful and inspiring thought. The only question is whether this might not in each case have been presented more impressively without any connection with the Psalm, or with frank confession that there is in the Psalm only a mere suggestion of the truths which Mr. Potter wishes to present. The earlier part of each discourse has certainly a more labored air than is agreeable or consistent with Mr. Potter's usual straightforwardness. There is no pretence that the Psalmist consciously entertained the thought which is found to be fundamental to one verse after another; but the working out of this fundamental thought is so laborious that we are always glad when it is well over, and Mr. Potter swings out with bellying sails into the strong mid-current of his discourse.

Of two of the other discourses I have already spoken. Of those remaining, the first in order, "The Trinity of Evolution," it was my good fortune to hear in Santa Barbara; and, as I read it here, the preacher's voice and presence are vivid in my memory. Never did I hear from him a discourse of greater power, nor one delivered with so much joyous energy. Here and elsewhere the help which Mr. Potter brings to us is that of a man who does not wilfully deceive himself, who is clear-eyed to see the manifold hardness of our lot and that of our animal cousins, whose courageous optimism takes up into itself the facts which pessimism delights to vaunt. "Rational Grounds of Worship" is one of many signs of Mr. Potter's inability to resolve all religion into an ethical element. He does not even believe that we have no "duties to God" which are not "duties to man." His address on the Chicago Parliament of Religions is a generous and enthusiastic appreciation of that great event. For sermons that come home to practical daily needs there are none better than "Sealed Orders" and "Heroisms in Daily Life." "Wheat and Tares" is a plea not only for the good which better people can do the worse, but also for the good the worse can do the better by compelling their patience and sympathy and helpful service. It suggests a query whether, in matters of religious belief, it is not perhaps just as well for those who have attained to absolute perfection to mingle freely with their erring brothers instead of drawing apart into a community of infallible logicians, bombarding humanity in general from a superior height. But this is by the way; and my last word must be one of thankfulness for Mr. Potter's beautiful and beneficent activity; and of gratitude to Dr. Abbot for his part in a book which will indefinitely prolong the influence of his wise and noble friend.

J. W. C.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA, WRITTEN BY HIMSELF. In two volumes. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Mr. Sala writes the characteristics of the sailor and the tramp and the journalist in proportions which make an interesting combination. He has travelled the world over and over, but he is not a mendicant. He can gossip endlessly without being a bore or an idle tale-bearer. He has served as a Boswell for other people; but in these volumes he acts as his own Boswell, and is more interesting than ever. And his subject is as important as many that he has treated biographically in the vast library of his writings. His influence over his reader is complete. He holds nothing back. He reveals his own failures and deficiencies with a frankness that almost make us feel that he is proud of them. The reminiscence goes back to his earliest age. The title, "Life and Adventures," is well chosen. Few lives have been more adventurous than that of Mr. Sala. The tone of the book we may gather from the preface: "I have had not a few dull moments in my life, and have had to pass some moments of utter misery and seeming despair; but, on the whole, I can say that during the last sixty years I have found life much more amusing than dismal. I am no philosopher; but I believe that it is, after a manner, philosophical to laugh whenever you possibly are able to indulge in harmless merriment." The jolly good humor of the preface never deserts the author. We can be pretty sure that this is a truthful self-revelation. It bears the marks of authenticity on its face. If the reader wonders why he (Mr. Sala) has taken two volumes for these reminiscences, he will find the answer in the veracity and fidelity of his memory, and in his

IS IT THE END?

A Time of Great Mortality.

Especially Noticeable in Children.—Will Man Cease to Exist?—Can the "Omega" be Averted?

Why is it, with our improved sanitary appliances, our care to obtain fresh air, pure food, and plenty of exercise, the observance, in fact, of every hygienic law, that in spite of every care each succeeding generation seems to become weaker and shorter lived? Is it that we are now suffering for indiscretions of our ancestors, or is that terrible, unknown end of man at hand?

Whatever the cause, the existing condition of things is too apparent. Especially is this noticeable with the babies. Instead of the mother's life-giving milk, they are compelled to begin a struggle for existence with the bottle. The result in many cases is disastrous. The little one, failing to obtain necessary nourishment, grows weaker daily, until death ends the struggle. The end in these cases is Simply Starvation.

With this termination so often the case, the best physicians of the day have resorted to the use of Bovine, that great and original raw food product, as a means to save the babies.

In this connection Dr. A. B. Robinson, 61 Dudley St., Boston, after commending Bovine most highly for various complications where the waste of disease must be checked, and new blood, flesh, and strength created to effect a cure, says concerning this life-creating preparation, "With feeble, bottle-fed babies, a small amount added to the milk has in my practice saved many children."

Bovine is not a medicine, but a life-maintaining, flesh, bone, and blood-making preparation that contains the greatest amount of nourishment in the least possible bulk.

Give it to the little ones while there is still hope. Your physician, if you ask him, will recommend it, and you will bless the results obtained forever.

graphic style. Every page in the book is richly quotable; but who would dare to undertake the task of making an abstract of these two volumes? Mr. Sala has protected himself from having his book spoiled in that way by the reviewers. The most cynical critic is easily disarmed by his geniality. Mr. Sala's narrative, on the whole, would hardly be classified in a library as contemporary history; but there is a great deal of contemporary history in it. His newspaper experiences have led him into all sorts of places,—into society of the high and the low, the little and the great, the nobility and the democracy; and all is described with the impartiality of the chronicler who tells his story mainly for the joy of telling it. He is always readable; and, though he is very much afraid of being instructive, there is a good deal of information mixed with this entertainment.

DISCORDS. By George Egerton. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—The author's title of her book is a criticism on it in parvo. We say "her book," because the writer is unmistakably a woman. Men have many bad ways of writing; but the way of physical intensity, of febrile energy, of coarse and brutal insistence on the passionate side of life, they leave very much to the women. This is the author's second book. The first was "Key-notes." That, with all its force and beauty, was sufficiently disagreeable. This beats it out of sight. It is entirely pathological. It deals exclusively with the diseases of society, in particular with the case of fallen women. The object is not clear. It appears to be to engage our sympathy with the victims of unbridled passion, be it their own or that of some victimizer of the other sex. One is almost bound to conceive a moral purpose, because it is inconceivable that the writer should think that she is giving pleasure. The last story in the book is undisguisedly a sympathetic treatment of free love. A man and woman join their fortunes without ring or book, and with the express understanding that they are free to go when other sights allure. And it is the woman that takes the initiative in this brave adventure. There is one thing about the book sadder than any story in it: it is the perverted power of a writer who, more happily trained in morals and in the art of writing, might have done some beautiful and memorable thing.

THREE MEN OF LETTERS. By Moses Coit Tyler. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—Prof. Tyler's three men are Bishop Berkeley, Timothy Dwight, and Joel Barlow. All of the three studies are extremely careful, and have the admirable quality of the biographical and critical work which makes his "History of American Literature in the Colonial Time" so valuable, and our impatience so great for its sequel,—a literary history of the American Revolution. The study of Berkeley was an incidental product of researches made by Prof. Tyler when he was working on his opus magnum, in which it could not properly be included. The monographs on Dwight and Barlow were prepared for the forthcoming Revolutionary history, but they have been excluded from that because the chief activity of these men was in the period following the Revolution. It is devoutly to be hoped that Prof. Tyler may in due time continue his history so far that it will include not only Dwight and Barlow, but men of much more recent date.

BALLADS IN PROSE. By Nora Hopper. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—The reader would be glad to have some indication of the relation of these ballads to Celtic folklore. Are they fresh renderings of old wives' tales, or are they entirely original creations? If the latter, they show much originality, and at the same time a lively sympathy with the folk-lore of Ireland. Miss Hopper must have drenched herself in that lore to be so saturated with its spirit. If, on the contrary, these are merely fresh renderings of old stories, we can still admire the felicity of their new presentation. As for the enjoyment they will give, it depends a good deal on the individual taste. They are not cheerful reading. They give one a creepy feeling; but there are those who like to shiver with affright and shudder with delicious awe, and these will certainly be pleased.

THE VOYAGE OF THE LIBERDADE. By Captain Joshua Slocum. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.—This is a new edition of a book published a few years ago, which describes a remarkable voyage taken by a father, mother, and two children, one of whom was a grown-up son. The bark "Aquidneck" sailed from New York to Montevideo in 1886; and the first part of the book describes the varied exciting experiences of those on board, which ended in leaving this family alone in a strange place, shipwrecked, without money or friends. They built a little boat, thirty-five feet long over all, three feet depth of hold, and named her "Liberdade," or Liberty. In this craft they sailed on the 13th of May, arriving in Washington on the 27th of December. The story is simply told, and has the interest of actual occurrence.

DAN OF MILLBROOK. By Charles Carlton Coffin. Boston: Estes & Lauriat.—This story of American life is our old friend, "Caleb Krinkle," only named for another of the characters. It was first published twenty years or more ago, and has been out of print for a long time. A boy of our acquaintance said on seeing this: "Well, I never believed there really was such a book. I tried to get it out of the library for years, and gave it up." But here it is, five hundred generous pages long, in fine new binding and print. It may seem somewhat old-fashioned to the younger readers, who demand brisk incident and rapid action in their stories; but this leisurely narrative, with its natural representation of life in a New England town, has its own charm.

IN WILD ROSE TIME. By Amanda M. Douglas. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—It is always a question as to how far it is well to put into the hands of children books that deal wholly or almost wholly with the sadder facts of existence. If contemplation of the poor starved lives of little waifs makes them more tender, more genuinely willing to sacrifice themselves for the sake of others, then the result compensates perhaps for the process; but we doubt this result in many cases, or believe that it can be attained to more purpose in other ways. This is a sad, sad story, despite the hint that the poor little life was not sacrificed in vain. There are other aspects of the book that compel us to rank it far below others by the same popular and gifted author.

THE LITTLE LADY OF THE HORSE. By Evelyn Raymond. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.50.—This story is well told, and one becomes easily interested in the bright little heroine who can tame an unbroken horse or win a race as well as the cleverest of jockeys. Still, it is one of those books that tend to destroy the unconsciousness of children by dwelling too much on their possible influence over older people. The book, too, might have been brought to a more artistic ending than by making Steenie an heiress in the last chapter, though one sympathizes with the desire to give so unselfish a child all the good fortune possible. The descriptions are graphic, and the conversations natural.

Miscellaneous.

Georgiana M. Craik's little story, "Bow-wow and Mew-mew," is published in the English Classic Series. It is for children just beginning to read; and it is so easy, and so much more interesting than short primer lessons, that mothers and teachers will find it very helpful.

The American Book Company is usually in a serious and didactic frame of mind; but it evidently has its hours of recreation, and is capable of unbending to an unusual degree. So it seems to do in "The Schoolmaster in Comedy and Satire," which is a volume arranged especially for teachers and round tables. Some of the extracts will serve to show the difference between the humor of the earlier time and that of our own day. Thus the book may be instructive, in places where it is not humorous, and it is sometimes humorous where it undertakes to be instructive. As, for example, we are told in all seriousness, in a note to Telémaque, that "it will, perhaps, interest the reader to know that the isle of Calypso, formerly called Ogygia, is the modern Gozzo in the Mediterranean Sea." There are archæologists who will consider this humor of the most satirical character.

Literary Notes.

"The Story of the Stars," by G. F. Chambers, is a compact and convenient outline of astronomy for popular reading, which is to be published shortly by D. Appleton & Co. as the first volume in a new series of "Useful Stories." This series includes: "The Story of the Stars"; "The Story of the Earth," by H. G. Seeley; "The Story of Primitive Man," by Edward Clodd; "The Story of the Solar System," by G. F. Chambers.

"Life=Studies."

The immediate large interest in the two small cloth-bound books of the "Life" series, published during the last quarter of 1894 (each containing four papers), together with the general desire that similar brief essays or "studies" might be had singly in neat periodical form, leads to this first monthly issue of Life-Studies.

The two books first issued in the bound series were "As Natural as Life," by Rev. Charles G. Ames, and "In Love with Love," by James H. West, subsequent volumes, uniform in size and general style, being promised from Rev. Dr. E. L. Rexford, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Rev. John W. Chadwick, Rev. Dr. M. D. Shutter, and men of similar power.

Some or all of the writers here named will appear likewise in the present periodical, in a single issue each, while to their papers will be added popular essays or "life-studies" from others among the best and brightest minds of America.

NATURE'S CONSTANCY.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

The rose is constant on the grosbeak's breast,
No time doth change the peacock's Tyrian dyes;
The scarlet spot will mark the tanager
Long as with arrow flight it cleaves the skies.

Through passing ages rose will still be rose,
Its spice unlike the spice of violet;
And all the flight of time will hold distinct
The breath of apple bloom and mignonette.

No time will change the flavor of the peach,
Or round the apple to a different form;
The golden balls on orange boughs will hang While summer winds shall blow, and suns shall warm.

Never will linden mingle with the larch,
Nor rich acacia rhododendrons grow;
Pure is the sap that feeds the lordly palm,
Ever magnolias wear their crowns of snow.

The song the halcyon sings will still be hers,
While time with steady flight shall speed along;
And never will the robin change his note,
And no song-sparrow lift the skylark's song.

TOLD IN A GAMME.

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

A beehive-shaped hut, perhaps fifteen feet in diameter and eight feet in height, built of birch timbers which were covered first with bark, and then with turf and stones,—this is a gamme, the home of a mountain Lapp in far-off, frozen Lapland. A hole at the top serves both for window and chimney; and, instead of a door, there are two low-vaulted passages through which it is necessary to crawl on the hands and knees to gain admission to the interior. Will you enter?

The whole interior is begrimed with smoke. In the centre is a fire on a heap of stones, and above the flames hangs a kettle suspended from the roof by a chain. On one side are a number of seats composed of soft reindeer-skins and white woollen covers. On the other side is a box-bed, the family sleeping-place. The beds are made of birch-leaves covered with sealskins, the pillows are sheepskins, and the "quilts" are reindeer-skins.

What is that queer-looking thing, like a small coffin, hanging from the wall? It is the baby's cradle; and in it, wrapped in warm furs, sleeps the little one, as soundly as any fond mother might desire. And there is the Lapp mother,—a little, doll-shaped woman, only about three feet and seven or eight inches tall. How queerly she is dressed! Over a warm woollen undergarment she wears leather trousers and a long leather tunic or gown from which the hair has been partially rubbed. On her feet are leather boots, which turn up at the toes and are lined with hay; and on her head is a scarlet, pear-shaped cloth cap. The children—little Olla, Margareta, and Katinka—are dressed much like their mother; and you cannot tell the boys and girls apart.

By and by the father—stout, sturdy, ruddy-faced Lars—comes in from caring for his flock of reindeer or from a hunting excursion; and the supper is got ready and placed upon the table. There is reindeer's milk thickened with oatmeal; bear's flesh, broiled or boiled; reindeer meat; rye bread; milk curds; and reindeer cheese. Cold water is the only beverage tasted. During the meal the dogs, of which there are quite a number in every Lapp household, are fed with milk and water from the same vessel the Lapps are using.

Anon the night comes on, and a lamp is lighted. The master and mistress of the gamme take their seats near the fire, opposite from the door,—the place of honor. The children cluster upon the other side, and lie at full length beside the hearth. The mother sews, perhaps a dress of deer-skin for little Nito or a new cap for herself. The father smokes lazily for a while, and then half falls asleep.

"Oh, Arahic [papa]," cries Katinka, coaxingly, "tell us the story of Giant Redhead!"

And tired, patient Lars, who knows all the old legends by heart, clears his throat; and, while the dogs slumber before the cheerful blaze, and good mother Adnic industriously plies her needle, and the children listen with silent awe, he relates the story of the red-headed giant, which is quite as famous in the literature of the Lapps as Cinderella and her slipper is in English.

A long time ago there lived a little boy who was sent by his mother one day to bring a pail of water from the lake. He started on his errand; but the lake was so far away, and its waters sparkled so brilliantly in the sun, that the boy was afraid, and returned to his mother without the water.

"Why did you not bring the water?" she asked.

"I did not like to go so far," answered the boy.

"Well," said his father, who had just returned from a hunt, tired and hungry, "it is pretty certain that you will never kill old Redhead."

When he inquired who Redhead was, the boy was told that he was a lawless old giant who lived on an island in the lake, and of whom everybody was afraid.

"Father thinks I am a coward," thought the boy, as he lay in his bed that night; "but I am not afraid of Giant Redhead, as he will see."

Before the sun was up, the boy arose and put on his fur boots and warm coat and mittens, and left the gamme while his parents were still asleep. He walked on very bravely till he arrived at the shore of the lake. There he saw an old woman picking up sticks with which to broil some fish for breakfast that she had just caught in the lake. He asked her the way to Redhead's island.

"And what will you do there?" she inquired with some astonishment.

"I have business with the giant," replied the boy, very bravely.

"If that is so, you will need some help," she said. And she made him stay and eat breakfast with her, and afterward gave him a bow and four arrows, telling him that whenever he wanted any help to shoot an arrow. She also showed him a boat by means of which he could reach the island.

The boy stepped into the boat and rowed all day over the lake, but it came on dark before he reached the island. What to do in the night he did not know, so he placed an arrow in the bow and shot it. Instantly a lighted way opened before him; and he saw far off a green island, and on the island a strong castle. "That is Giant Redhead's house," he thought.

He arrived before the castle, and blew a horn that hung at the gate. The sound that he made was as loud as thunder; and it startled old Redhead, who came down to the gate to see who his visitor might be.

"Ho! And so it's you that made such a bluster," said the giant, taking him up by his thumb and forefinger. "Well, and what are these needles for?"

The boy told him that by shooting them he could earn his dinner.

"We will see how that is," said the giant. And the next day he took him hunting with him. The boy did not have any luck at all, for no game crossed his path; but he was determined not to go home empty-handed if he could help it. So, as a last resort, he shot an arrow from his bow. No sooner was the shaft sped than the ground before him was covered with game of all kinds, more than he and the giant could carry home.

"Well," said the giant, "you will be of use." And that night he had a big banquet at the castle. At midnight, however, the horn at the gate was blown again; and, when the giant went down, there stood a wolf, large and fierce, and back of him were many others.

"We have come for him who slew our mates," said the wolf; and, without waiting, they rushed at Giant Redhead and killed him.

The boy heard them coming up the stairs, and he grasped his bow and fired the third arrow. Instantly the waters of the lake rose and swept the wolves all away, and drowned them. But Giant Redhead's body floated across the lake to the shore where the boy's parents lived; and he was so vast that it covered an acre of ground, and no one could live near it.

Finally, the boy shot his fourth arrow, which fell into the sea; and the fishes swam up and devoured the giant's body, all but the ears. These he kept, using one for a boat on the lake and the other as a covering for his njalla (storehouse). And this is the story of Giant Redhead and the boy who was afraid to bring the water for his mother.

In the Lapland gammes they tell this story of the man in the moon, which, in this instance, is not a man at all, but a couple of unfortunate children.

Hundreds of years ago there were a boy and a girl whose names were Hjunki and Bil. They were pretty children,—small, but agile and dark-eyed, and good and obedient, too. They lived with their mother near the famous well, Byrgir; and very often she sent them to draw water. On these occasions they always went hand in hand, with a pole upon their shoulders, from which depended the pail. Generally, they sang on their way to and from the well; for they were happy as reindeer calves in springtime.

Now the moon had seen the children, and had fallen quite in love with their beauty and goodness. So she spoke with the West Wind, and asked him to help her. One night, when the moon was full, the children went for water, as was their wont. Then they noticed for the first time how low the moon hung in the sky. And her face seemed to be pleasant and smiling, and her warm light fell on them like a mother's loving kiss. As they looked, the West Wind came along, and asked them to go with him a little ways. When they inquired how far he was going, he answered, "Only to the moon."

They laughed, and said they would go with him; and he kept his word, and took them up to the moon, where they can now be seen from the earth, with the pole and the bucket on their shoulders.

Another story which they are fond of telling is how Njavvisena tamed the reindeer, and made them serviceable to the Lapps. And you can imagine how the little Lapps open their eyes at the picture of the beautiful daughter of the sun coming down to the earth to instruct their distant ancestor.

Once the Lapp did not have his big drove of reindeer. These animals were all wild, and lived in the forest, and were so shy that the hunters shot them only by stalking them,—of course, approaching them from leeward. But one day a hunter who had shot a stag, and was dressing it, was surprised to see a beautiful woman coming toward him over the snow.

"Magto veso [How do you do]?" she said. "Do you not know me? I am Njavvisena, the daughter of the sun. I have seen how poor you are, and how you nearly starve in the cold winter; and my father has let me come down to teach you how to make your life easier."

"Come to this spot to-morrow, and you will find two reindeer, a stag and a doe, holden by their antlers in the wood. Place this bell upon the neck of the stag, and he will become tame; and you can lead him to your game. The doe will follow him."

She then gave into his hands a tiny, silver-tinkling bell, and disappeared.

The hunter returned the next day, and found, as she had told him, a couple of deer caught by their horns in the bushes. He led them home as she had directed, and from them have descended the countless herds that are now in Lapland.

These are some of the stories told in a Lapland gamme to the children during the long winter nights, when the cold winds moan in the pine woods and the snow sparkles under the radiance of the Northern Lights.

THE SPARROWS.

BY S. B. B.

Did you ever hear the reason why the sparrows twitter so continually? It is said that they are so glad and proud of the mention Jesus made of them in his talks to the people of more than eighteen hundred years ago that they wish constantly to remind us of it. Who knows what their little twitter does mean? It means something to them; and it might as well mean this as anything else to us, and better than all else.

Why, do you remember what it was Jesus said? He said that not one fell to the ground without the ever-present love which pervades all things being with it. Birds are among the most beautiful objects of creation,—not only on account of their graceful shapes and beautiful coloring, but on account of their power to fly through the air.

How we miss them in winter! How our eyes follow the pigeons, and the few that are left us during the cold months! And how we dislike to see them forming into companies for their fall flight to warmer places! Did you ever read Longfellow's "Birds of Killingworth?" If not, do so; and there you will learn of how much value the presence of birds is to the human race,—how a town which cruelly destroyed all the birds in the neighborhood had to go everywhere to hunt for some the following year, and brought back a huge cage full of the beautiful, useful little creatures, and, with ringing of bells and great rejoicing, let them fly out into the air and into the trees. Read the poem, and try what each one can do to help people, both young and old, to be loyal to the spirit of love for the birds.

Whenever I see a boy or girl (do girls ever kill birds?) so cruel as to wantonly kill a bird, I pity them more than the poor little lifeless object. Why? Because I think how that boy or girl will have to suffer, in some way, some time, to retrieve that action. The bird's suffering is over, and it had no dread of the hurt which put an end to its innocent life; but the careless, cruel deed has made an impression on the human life which, if not checked, may lead to greater crime, greater suffering, for the one who now is the victor.

THE LITTLE BROWN BIRD.

Willie Wharton was awakened one morning by such a strange noise as he had never heard before, a crushing and scraping and crackling and dashing,—a dreadful noise somehow, that made him feel as though something wicked were going on, as, indeed, in my opinion, there was.

Up he jumped, and looked out of the window just in time to see one of four beautiful oaks on the other side of the road fall to the ground. Half a dozen men, with ropes and axes, had been at work at it ever since sunrise, destroying in a few hours what heaven had cared for for a hundred years; and there it lay like a murdered thing.

Willie hastened to dress himself, and ran downstairs to the dining-room, where everybody was gazing through the windows and looking very sad. Grandpa looked the saddest.

"I remember that great oak all my life," he said. "It seemed almost as big as it is now when your grandma and I used to sit under it, when I first went to see her. Her father owned the ground it was on, but he sold it. It's a pity. None of her folks or ours would ever have cut those trees down. If I could stop it, I would; but there's no use talking to old Manuel about it, none at all. Some one has offered him money for them, and down they are going."

Up there in the old oak a brown bird had built her nest. Willie had watched her from the first. She picked up hay and dried leaves and little bits of all sorts of things; and, when his mother had fringed out some napkins, she put the little roll of ravelings on the window-sill, and the little brown bird came hopping in at the window, with her pretty head on one side, and, keeping a good watch with her round eyes, carried it to her nest.

On the outside the nest was rough and dark, the color of the oak boughs themselves; but within the bird had woven all the bright beautiful colors that had been given her. Willie knew that, for he had climbed up to peep in. Another bird, much the same color that she was herself, but handsomer, helped to build the nest; and then he perched on a bough, and sang and chirped while the mother-bird sat upon some beautiful little eggs. At first they were dreadfully frightened when Willie climbed into the tree; but after a while they found out that he always brought crumbs and seeds, and had no fear.

A few days before the morning on which the chopping began Willie had climbed up, and seen four little birds in the nest. They had come out of the pretty eggs. And now the mother sat and kept the baby-birds warm, while the father-bird went out and caught worms and found crumbs; or sometimes the mother went, and the father stayed.

"Oh, the poor little brown birds!" said Willie, with reason; for, when the tree they had built on fell, the nest would be crushed and the baby-birds killed, and the dear little bird-home broken up forever. Willie knew this very well; and, when he had finished his breakfast, he jumped up and ran out of doors. The men were chopping away at the second tree; and the poor father-bird was fluttering about and screaming, evidently quite aware of what was to happen.

Willie waited not a moment. He caught his cap from the rack in the hall, and marched across the way. Mr. Manuel stood at his gate, watching the work of destruction; and he cried out:—

"Go away! I don't want boys round here!"

"Yes, sir," said Willie, respectfully. "I'll go as soon as I get the bird's-nest."

"Bird's-nest fiddlesticks!" snapped Mr. Manuel. But before anything more was said, or any one could drive him away, Willie went up the tree like a squirrel. He was a famous climber, and in a minute or so he was looking into the nest. There was the mother-bird hovering her babies and screaming; and in a moment Willie had covered nest and all with his cap, put it in his bosom, and let himself down to the next branch. A big workman held up his arms, and set him down on the ground.

Mr. Manuel called him an "impudent young rascal." But Willie only said: "Excuse me. I had to save the nest." And away he ran to his own garden, knowing that grandpa would help him to do what he wanted to do.

A few minutes later all the household were in the garden, watching grandpa and Willie,—grandpa on a ladder, fastening the nest into a nice, shady place under the leaves, while Willie, perched on a branch, held a handkerchief over the nest to keep the birds in. When the nest was safe, grandpa descended, and Willie got down as softly as he could, and everybody went to a distance to see what would happen.

The first thing they saw was the bird stretching her neck to look out. Then she took a little flight; then she went back to the nest; then she gave a cry, and a bird flew from the fence where he perched to the bough where the nest hung; then there was a great fluttering and chirping, and he was on the edge of the nest. It was the father-bird who had come home, and they were all rejoicing together.

"They're going to stay and keep house," said grandpa. "If there'd been only eggs in the nest, I think they'd have flown away; but the baby-birds kept them."

And, sure enough, just then the father-bird came down, and, picking up a crumb of bread as big as his head, carried it into the tree, and was heard calling all the family to dinner.—New York Ledger.

A WORKING EMPEROR.

Those who earn their living by manual labor may console themselves, if they ever sigh for an easier occupation, with the reflection that the great of the earth—presidents, kings, princes, and ministers of state —enjoy nothing so much as hard manual labor, and resort to it as often as they can find an excuse to do so. Europe has had, in this generation, two illustrious woodchoppers, both of whom, however, to their great regret, were compelled, in the end, by failing health to relinquish their favorite amusement.

One of these men is Mr. Gladstone; and the other was the late Alexander III., Emperor of Russia. The Russian emperor surpassed Mr. Gladstone; for he made it his work not only to fell great trees, but to work them up into planks, and to plane the planks into boards.

The emperor, during his period of good health, was an extremely muscular and powerful man, to whom daily exercise of a somewhat violent nature was a necessity.

In winter he caused many of the walks on the grounds of the Gatschina palace to be left uncleared by those whose duty was to clear them of snow. These walks the emperor shovelled off with his own hands under the guard of the sentinels of the palace.

Dressed in a gray frock and armed with a great snow-shovel, the Tsar of all the Russias might have been seen—not by the general public, certainly, but by his guards and the inmates of the palace—raising great mountains of snow along the paths, or shovelling it into carts, which wheeled it away.

Sometimes, in the midst of the Russian winter, too much snow fell for even the muscular tsar to cope with. On these occasions he called out his sons,—the Tsarevitch Nicholas and the Grand Dukes George and Michael. Then the imperial party could be seen—and heard, also, for they made much jovial uproar in their work—shovelling out the paths of the palace.

It was in the midst of his daily exercise, when insufficiently dressed, that the Emperor of Russia contracted the cold which resulted in his fatal illness.—Youth's Companion.

PRAYING-WHEELS IN INDIA.

Little children who go to church and say their prayers softly and earnestly after the clergyman would be much surprised at the way some grown-up men and women say their prayers. In a part of India called Darjeeling many different kinds of people live, called Bhootias, Lemboos, and Lepchas. In fact, they are like Chinese, but dress quite differently. Here they have praying flags. These poor ignorant people write on a piece of white calico any prayer they wish, then tie it to a long pole, which they fasten to a very high tree. The flag waves about with the prayer on it.

A praying-wheel looks like a brass ball on a stick. Inside the ball is a narrow strip of parchment, on which the prayers are written. You can twist the stick, the ball goes round very fast, and the prayers go round also. Some men think even that too much trouble, so pay another man to twist the handle for them.—Exchange.

THE EMPEROR AND THE COBBLER.

Saint Crispin, you know, is the patron saint of the shoemakers. In Flanders and some other European countries he has his day, which is kept as a festival. It is said that the emperor Charles V. went into a cobbler's shop on the evening of St. Crispin's Day, and found the cobbler celebrating the day with his friends. The emperor, who was not recognized, told his errand. He wanted his shoes mended. The cobbler told him he would not do any work, not even for the emperor. "Do you love him?" asked Charles. "I do," said the cobbler, "but I would love him more if he taxed us less." The emperor sat down with the cobbler and his friends, and had a pleasant evening. The next day the cobbler was summoned to the palace, and in the emperor saw his visitor of the preceding day.

The emperor asked him what he wanted most. The cobbler asked for a night to decide. The next day he told the emperor that he desired that the cobblers of Flanders should have the right to bear for their coat-of-arms a boot with a crown upon it. The request was granted.—Universalist.

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

"These stories about the beauty of the temple at Jerusalem must be taken with a grain of salt," said Dr. Solomon Schindler in Steinert Hall, Boston, several days ago. "We must remember that at no time were there more than fifty or sixty thousand people in Jerusalem, and that they lived in small, low-roofed huts, and had narrow streets, and that their surroundings were anything but beautiful. The temple was not larger than Mechanics' Hall nor more beautiful than the Park Street Station; but to people who had such surroundings as the Jews at that time such buildings would be things of great beauty by comparison. We must judge all things by comparison."

SAPOLIO

NEW YORK LETTER.

The event of greatest interest to our city during the past three weeks has, undoubtedly, been the appointments to public office made by Mayor Strong under the new Power of Removal Bill. "Choose gentlemen for your officers" was the advice of Washington to those at the head of his government departments. This is what the mayor has done, being careful that the gentlemen of his choice, selected irrespective of party, were men of business ability and undoubted integrity. The machine politicians are thunderstruck at his course, they apparently thinking that it is his duty, as a good Republican, to betray the people who elected him, and prove false to all his pledges made before election to give a strictly non-partisan, business administration. This seems to be their idea of "good politics." But before expectation had wholly vanished from the hearts of the politicians, and while it was still eager among reformers as well as anti-reformers, a delegation of women from one of the Good Government Clubs of the city called upon the mayor with the request that one-third of the members of the new Board of Education be women. Considering the fluctuation of women's share in the public direction of school affairs during previous administrations, the delegation was quite unprepared for the hearty assent of Mayor Strong to its proposals. He is reported to have said: "You have hit my programme exactly. I intend to appoint at least three women to the board at the start, and possibly five. The others will come later."

In many ways the women of New York seem to have effectually broken through the "stiffening crust of cautious experience." A public spirit has been cultivated among them, and this may well be attributed largely to the fine work of the Woman's Municipal League during the great struggle last fall for a reformed city government. The history of the league has not yet been written. It exists only in the minutes of the secretary, and in the memories of the twelve or more women who for four weeks prior to election gave every day all their time to working against the strong and corrupt power which bound the city. The origin of the Women's Municipal League must be credited to Rev. Dr. Parkhurst. It was a speech of his before the City Vigilance League that prompted Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell to offer to do what she could in helping along the good cause. She gathered together over a score of ladies, of whom about twelve did active campaign service. Among this number none was more untiring than Mrs. Lucy Gibbons Morse, a former president of the New York League of Unitarian Women. To her, as chairman of the Committee on Public Meetings, is largely due the popular growth of the movement.

Besides the splendid work accomplished by these women in the recent municipal campaign, there remains to the credit of their efforts an organization on the west side of the city known as the Colored Women's Municipal League. Regular meetings of a social or educational character still go on there. The colored women, earnest in their efforts to train their children to better citizenship, have started industrial classes, and, with the help of Mrs. Morse, a small loan library. Another feature is a bureau designed to find respectable employment for young colored girls. The latter greatly need this effort in their behalf; for they are not so popular as formerly as domestic servants, and they are ostracized in the shops as saleswomen and cash-girls. Nor are the colored men more fortunate. They are unable to get employment on street-car lines, and in many of the other callings open to their white brothers. And yet it is a notable fact that one rarely, almost never, finds a colored person begging on the streets or at the doors of houses. The statistics of institutions do not show that the city has an appreciable number of colored paupers and criminals. President Low of Columbia College, at a recent dinner party, told of the unique plea made while he was mayor of Brooklyn by the colored member he had appointed on the Board of Education. The question of a new school building for the education of white and colored children arising, the representative of the blacks begged that the measure be vetoed. If it were not, one of the most respectable occupations for the women of his race, that of teaching, would vanish forever. In a mixed school none but white teachers would ever be employed.

The annual meeting of the Association for the Advancement of the Medical Education of Women, held last week at the house of its president, Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi, gave further evidence of how completely is being destroyed the belief, once so universal, that it was woman's only sphere

"To eat sugar, strawberries, and cream, Sit on a cushion, and sew up a seam."

The open talk at this meeting by the prominent women physicians of the city, upon their past, present, and future opportunities for study, would have rejoiced the hearts of the pioneer friends of the higher education of the sex. Dr. Emily Blackwell, the founder, with her sister, in 1854, of the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, spoke in behalf of the college connected with it. It is the only regular school of medicine for women in the city, the infirmary giving every chance for clinical and anatomical work. The graduates of the college are successful practising physicians. Some of them have reached public positions of trust, as, for instance, Dr. Williams, who is a member of the Board of Health, and is stationed in the Bacteriological Department, where she has extremely difficult and important duties with relation to the making of anti-toxine.

It is the desire of the trustees of the college to have it affiliated with Columbia, as a women's school of medicine. Before this is possible a debt of $15,000 must be raised. Dr. Jacobi pledged the support of the Association for the Advancement of the Medical Education of Women to this object. So eloquent and convincing was her presentation of the college's needs that a lady present promptly headed the subscription list with a gift of $500. When some one complained that this generosity might frighten away gifts of a very much smaller amount, the liberal donor quaintly said: "I am an old lady of over threescore years and ten. What I do must be done quickly, while I have yet time."

The members of Unity Church, Brooklyn, have been doing good deeds in behalf of the starving and suffering farmers of Nebraska, to whom they have sent large boxes of clothing and provisions. This gracious work of remembering the necessities of others is not the only thing in the way of remembrance which the congregation of Unity Church has lately been doing. A beautiful window from the Tiffany Company has just been put in place, in memory of Prof. Robert Foster, one of the founders, and, up to the time of his death last spring, one of the most active members of the society. The window is a love-offering from those who were his friends and fellow-workers in Unity Church.

A Potato Delicacy.

No one needs to be told of the great difference of quality in potatoes. Many brought to the table are utterly inedible, because originators have had but one aim in view—earliness. We secured by chance (see below) a potato which now bears that name. It is unlike other sorts, being free from disease, early, an abundant cropper, good keeper, when cooked, "dry as summer dust," and the quality, to appreciate that you must eat some. Plant a few, and the crop will pleasantly surprise you in many ways. We deliver them anywhere for 25c. lb., $1.25 1/2 pk., $2.00 pk., $7.00 bu. Our 1895 illustrated catalogue mailed free. It contains the history of this remarkable potato, and is replete with news about novel varieties, standard varieties of flower and vegetable seeds, and the most approved agricultural and horticultural implements. It contains particulars of our unique offer to duplicate first prizes offered by all Agricultural or Horticultural Societies in the United States. "Everything for Farm, Garden and Lawn." Joseph Breck & Sons, BOSTON, MASS. We mail free to purchasers who name this paper, a 25c. package of wild garden seeds.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.
I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.
I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

IN GRATEFUL REMEMBRANCE.

In grateful remembrance of the beloved and long-cherished friend whose "beautiful spirit, freed from its earthly temple, entered the celestial city" February 10,

"Because we so loved her, we say It is well she has fallen asleep,"— well that "the silver cord has been loosed, the golden bowl broken," and the sweet, patient sufferer been taken by the "kindly angel" from the earthly home, where she has ever been its life, joy, and comfort, to the heavenly,—welcomed there so tenderly and lovingly by the many dear ones "gone before." The long and saintly life spent for others, with perfect forgetfulness of self, has ended here; but its blessed influence will live on forever, and in its new home commence anew its beautiful mission of love and joy. In the weariness and suffering of long invalidism the oft expressed regret was that she could do so little for others,—a great sorrow and heavy cross to one who had ever been so ready to relieve in time of need, at whatever sacrifice to herself. With what touching delicacy were bountiful gifts bestowed where her ever-watchful thought and care for friends felt they would be welcome!

"Sweet promptings unto kindest deeds."

"No duty could o'er-task her,
No need her will outrun.
Or e'er our lips could ask her,
Her hands the work had done."

"Her holy living meant

"For all her quiet life flowed on
As meadow streamlets flow,
Where fresher green reveals alone
The noiseless ways they go."

"The dear Lord's best interpreters
Are humble human souls:
The gospel of a life like hers
Is more than books or scrolls."

Dear friend of the meek and quiet spirit,

"Who, trembling here, Distrusted all your powers," may you now, with clearer vision and deeper insight, know that your life here was ever a benediction; and may we, in this sorrowful parting, look to you for the fortitude and courage always yours to bear it cheerfully and trustingly!

"Another hand is beckoning us,
Another call is given;
And glows once more with angel steps
The path that leads to heaven.
And half we deemed she needed not
The changing of her sphere
To give to heaven a shining one,
Who walked an angel here."

A GRATEFUL FRIEND.

MRS. JOHN FARWELL MOORS.

Descended from a long line of ministers, reaching back to the first settlement of Massachusetts by the Puritans, daughter of a Unitarian minister, Rev. Preserved Smith of Warwick and Mendon, and grand-daughter of another Unitarian minister, Rev. Preserved Smith of Rowe and Pembroke, Mrs. Moors came rightfully by that intense interest in all denominational undertakings, especially in her husband's work, which made her indeed a "helpmeet for him." Those who knew them most intimately knew that it was the sympathy, intelligence, energy, and loving co-operation of his wife which largely enabled Dr. Moors to accomplish much of his arduous work, especially in later years, when the failing body began to flag behind his ardent spirit, always young, always eager, to the last, to be spent in the cause dear to him. Their pleasant home, now left desolate, will long be remembered as a centre of warm hospitality by many Unitarian ministers, and by countless friends and relatives. Many young people, too, can testify to having received in that home refining and elevating influences, moulding a lifetime.

Mrs. Moors's energetic nature espoused warmly all persons or causes needing aid. It was characteristic of her to learn china-painting after she was sixty years old. The artistic work of her busy hands went to help the fairs of many a struggling Unitarian church, was given in loving remembrance to her friends, or sold to raise contributions for Unitarian causes. Interesting would be the history of their forty-four years of married life, if told as only they could tell it, with all their reminiscences of quaint or memorable characters they had known, all those touching or ludicrous experiences which often brightened with good stories the talk about their cheerful fireside. Pathetic would be the ending of that story, when the couple so united in life were not divided in death. Mrs. Moors had inherited a strong constitution, promising her a long life; but gladly did she lay down that life for him she loved, wearing herself out during his long illness in faithful, untiring ministrations, until she, too, dropped by the way. Dr. Moors, wearied with his long, patient waiting for death, said a few days before the end, "I cannot help feeling that I am waiting for Eunice." Five days after her husband's death the new and beautiful Unitarian church in which both Dr. and Mrs. Moors had taken so deep an interest was opened again for the funeral of the wife. The same carriers and bearers, the same ministers, officiated; and the many beautiful flowers and the thronged church bore witness to the love and esteem of a community which she and her husband had helped in so many ways. Her body, as she requested, was laid between her husband's and that of the dear child she loved with almost more than a mother's love. The earthly story is ended; but back from across the graves of these friends seems to come an impression of strength, of peace, of gladness, as from those who are once more well, and bright, and free, and glad with joy we cannot even conceive. The words of Chadwick's hymn, that hymn which echoes the thought of so many sorrowing hearts, come to mind as we remember these friends:—

"More homelike seems the vast unknown
Since they have entered there.
To follow them were not so hard,
Wherever they may fare."

Personals.

James Payn, the English novelist, is so much of an invalid as to be confined to his bed and chair. He can write only in pencil and with great pain, but continues to write, and with his old-time cheerfulness.

It is said that the late Hans von Bülow left directions that a post-mortem examination of his brain should be made, with the view of ascertaining the cause of the excruciating headache from which he was a life-long sufferer. The autopsy revealed the fact that the end of the nerves had become imbedded in the seat of an injury to the brain he had received in childhood.

Prof. Thomas N. Chase, recently appointed dean of Atlanta University in place of the late Dean Hincks, has been connected with the university as instructor or trustee during the entire period of its history. For nineteen years he was professor of Greek, and won a high reputation as a scholar. He is a graduate of Dartmouth College in the class of 1862.

The Rev. S. R. Crockett of Scotland, author of "The Stickit Minister," says the only imaginative book he was allowed to read in his early boyhood was "Pilgrim's Progress." "I used to be fond," he declares, "of acting scenes from it with a cousin of mine, who sometimes came to play with me. He always wanted to be one of the respectable characters; but I invariably chose Apollyon, and threw darts with such force and precision as to make my victim howl."

A school child of Washington answered the question on her examination paper, "What was the object of the Crusades?" by saying, "To rescue the Virgin Mary from the hands of the Seraphim" (Saracens).

Young Housekeeper: "Have you any nice ducks this morning?" "Yes, here are some nice canvas-backs." Young Housekeeper: "Oh, dear, I am so inexperienced! I think I would rather have the old-fashioned kind that have feathers on."

"Please, ma'am," said the cook, "I'd like to give you a week's notice." "Why, Mary, this is a great surprise. Do you hope to better yourself?" "Well, no, not exactly that," answered Mary, with a blush. "I'm going to get married."

Teacher: "What are marsupials?" Boy: "Animals which have pouches in their stomachs." Teacher: "And what do they have pouches for?" Boy: "To crawl into and conceal themselves in when they are pursued."—London Figaro.

The son of the editor has been ill with a cold, and obliged to take two kinds of medicine. The other day, when told that it was time to take some, he said, "And is it the one with balsam in it, mamma, or the quails and epitaphs [squills and ipecac]?"

"An' that's a chrysanthemum," said Mr. Dolan, deeply interested. "It is," replied his wife, who had been indulging in some floral purchase. "Well, a wonderful flower it is. If the t'ing cu'd only bark, it 'ud be as foine a Skye terrier ez ye'd want to see!"—Washington Star.

Some advertisements are models of pure English, as, for instance, one concerning a nursing-bottle, which concludes with: "When the baby is done drinking, it must be unscrewed and laid in a cool place under a tap. If the baby does not thrive on fresh milk, it should be boiled."—Medical Times.

It is said that a lady went into a high-class music-dealer's shop on Bond Street, London, and asked for the popular song, "'E don't know where 'e are." The salesman said that he didn't have it, but that he would get it for her; and to her intense amusement she saw him write on a slip of paper, "Get song 'He does not know where he is.'"—The Critic.

Before he left England for the United States Charles Dickens received the following note:—

"Dear Dickens,—As you are going to America and have kindly offered to execute any little commission for me, pray, if it be not too much trouble, try to get me an autograph of Sandy Hook's. I have Theodore's. Yours very truly, THOMAS HOOD."

The story is going the rounds that, when the first specimens of "The Bonnie Brier Bush" were appearing, they struck Prof. George Adam Smith as very like stories which Mr. Watson of Liverpool used to tell. Accordingly, a post-card was despatched to Sefton Park: "Well done, Ian Maclaren!" The professor received on an equally laconic post-card the apt reply: "Well done, Higher Criticism."

A needle's eye would be a cavern in which the souls of some rich men would eternally wander. A miserly layman replied to a minister concerned for his salary, much needed and long due: "Why! I thought you preached for souls." The disgusted clergyman replied: "Souls! I cannot eat souls; and, if I could, it would take a hundred thou-and such as you have to make a meal."—Ram's Horn.

SAYINGS OF DEAN HOOK.

The late Dean Hook, though a man of no genius, obtained considerable reputation as a preacher, and did great good by his sermons. The secret lay in his industry and in his common sense. His industry is well illustrated by what he said to an artisan, who talked to him of his surprise in seeing the light burning in the vicarage study, as he went to work at five in the morning. "Well, my lad, it takes a deal of courage to get up at all; and it only requires a little more to get up at four." His common sense is shown by his directions about preaching. "First state your case; then state your facts; then make out your case; then sum up. If your sermon is not in your opinion a good one, deliver it as if you thought it a good one." Another of his dicta was, "Preach to the many, but always try to bring in something for the few." He deprecated the impatience with which sermons are heard. "If you have something to say, you must have some time to say it. In these days men only measure sermons by minutes. 'Mr. A. preached this morning, didn't he?' 'Yes, a capital sermon,—only nine minutes and a half.'"—The Christian Life.

A STORY OF LOWELL.

As James Russell Lowell was leaving his house one morning, his wife said to him: "Now, James, I beg of you not to bring any one home to dinner to-day. We are too much distracted with house-cleaning to cook, and the prospect is that there will be little for us to eat."

Mr. Lowell promised to heed her request, but he met during the day the oldest son of an English family with whom he had been on terms of friendship. He now forgot his wife's admonition, and insisted upon the young Englishman's going home with him to dinner. The meal consisted of "picked fish" and potatoes. The guest was evidently puzzled. He had never eaten "picked fish" before. Mrs. Lowell meantime, was haunted by thoughts of the apple pie that was to finish the repast. Her sensations may be imagined when the Englishman, after playing daintily with the contents of his plate, remarked in the most courteous manner, "I know that Mrs. Lowell will pardon me if I omit the fish course."—San Francisco Argonaut.

ROGER AND HIS HUNGRY FRIEND.

This is a dog story in which Roger is the hero. The cook noticed in the last ten days that Roger had developed a terrible appetite, and was not satisfied with one bone, but hung around until he got two or three; and then he would start off with them in his mouth. The cook thought he buried them, so he determined to follow him one day and find out what he did with them. He followed him over to the barn, and close to the barn there is an old hayrick with a fence around it; and there in the corner was a poor little, miserable dog. He was one with whom we were not acquainted, and therefore called him a tramp dog. He was bleary-eyed and skinny, and so poor that, when his tail wagged in appreciation of Roger's bringing him these bones, his joints would make a noise like a sand-paper rustle. Roger would put down the bones in front of the dog, make a little dog talk, and sit down and watch the poor little tramp commence to eat them up.—Harper's Young People.

HE WAS NO MENAGERIE.

Senator Harris of Tennessee says that just after Andrew Johnson had vacated the presidential seat the managers of the Simpson County (Ky.) Agricultural and Mechanical Association decided that it would be a great advertisement to have the old gentleman attend the fair. "We don't care for him on Saturday," said the manager, "for on that day we shall have a pretty big crowd, anyhow. Wednesday will be the day. I will write the ex-President."

The following letter was sent to Mr. Johnson:—

Great Sir,—The people of the wonderful county of Simpson, feeling a great interest in one of America's greatest sons, have decided to invite you to be present at our fair grounds on Wednesday, October 6, where they wish to shake your hand. Please let me know by return mail.

He let him know by return mail, on the back of his own missive. The old gentleman turned the letter over, and read the following: "I am no menagerie. A. Johnson."

Editorial.

OF the many conferences held in all parts of the country for every variety of object, there is no one that has a more practical bearing or from which we can expect more useful results than the conference of the colored people held at Tuskegee, Ala. A letter on another page gives account of the spirit of the conference and the resolutions adopted. They are characterized by the same manly spirit of independence, determination, self-respect, and wise resolution toward self-helpfulness which have characterized the conferences that have preceded. While there are many theoretical discussions of the Negro problem, at Tuskegee, the subject is taken hold of at the near end, and with practical interest and intelligence. The colored farmers, mechanics, teachers, and students who come there do not spend their time in building castles in Spain or talking on deportation to Africa. They have questions of land, crops, home, education, and trade to consider; and, when they settle these,—as they are certain to do in the long run, if they carry out the spirit of the conference,—there will be no need of deportation or any other solution of the Negro problem than the wise and practical one they have achieved.

THE reformer needs two qualities which seem to be practically opposed to each other. One is the quality of patience to wait for changes which take a long time for their accomplishment, and the other is a holy impatience which refuses to be satisfied with things as they are. There exists a certain stolidity which would never disturb anything, a mental inertia which accepts things precisely as they are. But that is not the patience of the reformer who knows that seed is sprouting, that buds are unfolding, and that by and by the fruit will come. He can wait just as the farmer waits for the spring. There is also a kind of grumbling which finds fault with everything, which is peevish and petulant. This is not the holy impatience of the reformer who refuses to be satisfied with things as they are and has some hope that they may be better. The true reformer may be obliged to point out many faults in sight, but he is not a pessimist.

THE air is full of financial discussion. There are many elements entering into the matter which cannot be disposed of lightly; but there is one fact fundamental to the whole discussion which, if recognized, would silence fiat money cranks. It is that money must represent intrinsic, not imputed value. The thing that gives gold its value is not the coinage stamp, but the gold which receives it, and which represents a certain cost of production, just as if it were a yard of cloth or a bushel of wheat. In theology, as in finance, we do not want fiat righteousness, imputed excellence. In the clearing-house of heaven character is weighed, not estimated by the label. Soft money Christianity is nothing but the promise to pay. The redeemed Christian is one who is worth what it costs to redeem him.

THE multiplication of societies goes on. Never was there such a mania for organization. There is no direction of social, educational, professional, industrial, or religious activity which does not organize in every possible way. It is simply following out the suggestions of Nature, who organizes with a persistency and a variety which is unbounded. And all this shows that the social capacities of man have multiplied in innumerable directions. Most of these organizations spring up naturally. They exist for the sake of their members; for objects, at least, which no one could achieve alone, but which all may achieve together. Neither Patti nor Melba could sing a whole oratorio alone: that is the product of chorus and orchestra as well as of the trained soloist. Organization in which the power of the individual is multiplied fulfils the purpose of each in fulfilling the purpose of all. But organization in which the individual is sacrificed, or becomes less of a man than he would be without it, is tyrannical and destructive.

THE practice of duelling in this country has greatly decreased, and we hope will soon die out altogether; but in Germany over one hundred duels have been fought during the last year, although it is contrary to law. It is little excuse for the practice to say that in most of these duels the principals do not mean "business," and that they are content, for the most part, with scarring each other's faces. The custom is still a barbarous one; and Germany, or any other country, cannot be called wholly civilized until it is abolished. It is supported and countenanced by the army. An officer who declines a challenge practically loses his position. In England, on the contrary, an officer who sends a challenge loses his position by doing so. In the United States this was formerly the code in the army; but the Stanley-Hazen court martial, some fifteen years ago, in which one officer preferred charges of slander against another, showed a change in public opinion in the army and outside of it. A writer in Das Protestantenblatt notes the fact that in Germany those who stand at the head of society defend duelling, while the Social Democrats, the members of the Catholic Centre, and the Free-thinkers and Progressives oppose it. On the other hand, it is defended in the Reichstag by orthodox Protestants.

SERMONS cannot be measured by the yardstick or by the watch, and it is a mistake to establish any Procrustean bed to which every sermon must be cut. Not all subjects are of the same dimensions. The preacher, like the painter, must have some liberty as to the size of his canvas. A preacher may spoil a sermon by making it too long, or he may spoil it just as truly by making it too short, by failing to develop his subject properly. A sermon which is simply a suggestion, a hint, an exhortation, or an affirmation of principles, may be brief and effective. The sermon which is to be an exposition, an unfolding of a subject which has wide and varied relationships, may require time for its development. A preacher in Boston whose church is filled every Sunday preaches from fifty minutes to an hour; but his audience all stay until he is through, and they come again the next Sunday. They have been accustomed during twenty years to have large subjects treated in a large way, but only those who have the gift can presume to exercise it. It is quality, not length, that is the real test. There are twenty-minute sermons which seem unmercifully long; but Beecher could preach an hour, and his audience would still be sorry that he did not keep on. James Freeman Clarke once heard Wendell Phillips talk, as he supposed, for forty-five minutes, but was surprised, on looking at his watch, to find that he had spoken nearly two hours.

How hard it is to drive away the bugaboos of superstition, especially when ministers use them to frighten their congregations! One would suppose that the theological superstition that the application of water is necessary to save a soul from fire ought to be as dead as a mummy by this time. The doctrine of infant damnation, though it still exists in the creeds, is believed by very few in these days. But it comes up now and then, as it did recently in a village in which a child was taken suddenly and dangerously sick. It had never been baptized, and the parents were afraid that it would die before the rite could be administered. A messenger was sent for a minister who lived near by; but, when he reached the house, he found that both of the parents were unbaptized or were not professing Christians, and the laws of his church forbade him to baptize the child under such circumstances. But, being of a merciful disposition, he unmercifully waked up another minister at the dead of night, and asked him to administer the rite. Minister No. 2 could not at first understand why he should be roused in his slumbers for this purpose, when minister No. 1 might have conducted the rite. But, belonging to a church which was willing to baptize the children of unbelievers, he heard the explanation, and graciously went to the house, and, by putting on a little water on the brow of the child, saved it from hell and the wrath of God! Verily, there is still need of Christianizing our Christianity.

HUMAN INTERCOURSE.

Friendship is very much like an egg: once dropped, it is impossible to put it back in the original shape. Love is easier to restore to its pristine beauty, if it has been injured only by flaws of temper, and not by moral obliquity. This is due, perhaps, to its firmer texture, its more absorbing quality. It will bear more strain where the trend of character is generous and noble. Friendship is a thin-skinned, susceptible, nervous relation. It has so many shades and hues one is never quite sure of it until one mounts the last round of the ladder, where sincerity is not simply endured or tolerated, but demanded as a condition of being.

If, as Matthew Arnold says, conduct constitutes three-fourths of life, six-eighths of conduct may be set down to the profit and loss account of human intercourse, the bearing of the individual not so much toward society at large as toward a few other individuals. The world in which we live, and which furnishes our criterion of taste, judgment, and virtue, is very small. One person may make our world, or a hundred or a thousand. Occasionally a person may be found who overtops a city or a country in his estimate of social states or differences. From a dozen to fifty people may, however, be set down as the size of the average circle. It is our relation to these few that makes up three-quarters of life, to which Matthew Arnold refers.

How do we stand toward these dozen or half a hundred in regard to love, friendship, fidelity, unselfishness, tolerance, all the ingredients and shades of character? Thought is a great power. Its influence is so immense the world is always trying to believe that it can detach itself from the basis of conduct, and float free as an independent force, beneficent or otherwise; but subtly the moral nature of the man, his personal relation to society, enters all his works, like a pervasive dye. He cannot keep himself out of abstractions and philosophizing. The greatness of Bacon's intellect has been smirched by the moral taint. The wholeness of the man gets into all he does, all he thinks. If he tries to bar the door against himself, his nature, deeper than consciousness, takes sides against him.

The cry that art is unmoral has been heard in all ages. Beauty, we have been told a thousand times, is a thing apart, exists of and for itself; and yet the impersonality of art is belied by the fact that all art worthy the name is steeped in personality, drenched through and through with the secret life of the artist, the trend of his thoughts, the power and purpose of his conviction, the tendency of his deeds. Beauty, too, is not beauty unless it covers something deeper than form and color. The nature of being is felt everywhere under paint or chisel work, or design of any kind, as under flesh and blood.

How often work is vitiated by something far deeper than cleverness,—by the inner life, the springs of conduct! Cleverness is not unseldom abortive and unfruitful. For all its adroitness and open-eyed capacity, it comes to shipwreck. The whole weight of character is shifted on each point, and the whole chain is only as strong as its weakest link. For this reason conduct is three-quarters of the whole make-up. Few people are possessed of genius, not many are endowed with lofty imagination, great powers of abstraction, or capacity for sustained thought; but all of us with ordinary intelligence, it would seem, might attain to conduct of a worthy kind. And yet conduct proves to be the stumbling-block even for those of great endowments; for it is continually running counter to selfishness and unpruned impulses, and a fine and high behavior comes in the end to be valued like some rare special gift of music and poesy.

We hear much said of philistinism, but the word has no concise meaning. It leaves an impression, but not a sharp outline. Still we dimly feel that it describes a very prevalent type of materialism. Philistinism makes count of no subtle beauty, no soulful experience. It eliminates the spiritual, cuts it clean off, and leaves you only crass matter. It will feed you at its banquets, but it gives no bread of life. It thrusts its gold and pearl under your eyes, but it ignores their ideal uses. Its values are perishable. They leave no trace of thought and emotion in the mind. It not only cannot perceive the soul of things: it degrades the objects that in their essence were made to minister to man's higher nature and to help toward the best human intercourse. Philistinism has spoiled so much of our meeting and entertaining and hobnobbing, has interposed so much padding between hearts and lives, that sometimes we despair of human intercourse, and think of lapsing into the den of the recluse or the cell of the hermit.

Still the need of sharpening the face against other human faces, of looking into friendly eyes and clasping friendly hands, is as imperative as it ever was,—more so, our communion with our kind often being reduced to this dumb show; while the things our neighbor might communicate to us or we might say to him are dumb within us, hidden in the heart. For beings so loquacious about nothing, sound and fury of no significance, we are singularly tongue-tied. How often we eat a man's dinners and enjoy the good things of his providing without knowing by any sign he has ever made whether he is Christian or pagan! How obliged we would be to him if he would give us a slice of himself instead of so much turkey and pudding! It sounds antiquated to speak of sharing in another's virtue when we think of the gossip and chit-chat of society. Yet this discredited thing lies at the basis of human intercourse. If we cannot give and get strength and invigoration, why should we meet?

It is because we do so seldom meet here, so seldom partake of the valor and strength and courage and fortitude of our neighbors, that scepticism of the value of human nature is so widespread. If society were not so cunningly devised to keep people apart, to make the lonely more lonely and the thronged more beset with idle and foolish folk, would men be so faithless of one another's honesty and value, so sceptical in regard to the goodness and worth of women? This deadly scepticism of the heart has taken very largely the place of belief in the possibilities of improvement. The fine grain of thought and feeling and aspiration is coarsened in the process of getting acquainted with the world, because the intercourse afforded is of a low type, material in all its phases. Ideals are broken in the contact, the mere give-and-take encounter of the great, noisy, selfish market-place or May-fair.

Human intercourse, the nourishing and inspiring kind, is the crowning experience of our days. It ennobles love until the nature is transformed by its touch. It makes friendship so unspeakably good and precious that even one experience of noble friendship in a lifetime may change all values and show us how to discern everywhere gold from dross. The thought of making others happy is common enough; but that thought freed from taints of selfishness is a divine thought, a potent agent, like sunshine or ozone. The exquisite thing called goodness—temperament clarified by virtue—we speak of as if it were common as dandelions in spring; but the honey-sweet variety is, after all, not very common. It is far and away beyond most of us, but still we can strive to hold up the ideal, to be a friend, to be a lover, to be a devotee of all the good and great, to strive for reverence and humbleness of heart, to cultivate distrust of our own importance, to repress egotism, and to stand for what is true and genuine, regardless of the external and fashionable standards of the world.

THE DUTY OF CHEERFULNESS.

Even after the lapse of two centuries and more, it is not easy to read the diaries of the early New England ministers without experiencing at second-hand something of the depression with which they recorded their mental conflicts and "disconsolate uneasinesses." How they reproached themselves for the fact that they could not continue uninterruptedly in a state of self-examination and solemn reflection, but that now and again natural longings and inclinations asserted themselves! Even they could not always be speculating on the chance that they might, in spite of all effort, be included with their dearest ones in the number of those foreordained to eternal suffering; but the thought, occasionally banished, ever returned with renewed doubt and fear. Like the minister's black veil, which threw its influence over his whole person, and made him ghostlike even in the sunshine, such mental agony forbade the consideration of so small a virtue as cheerfulness.

The world has changed much in this regard. Not only need he who is light-hearted no longer affect an unreal seriousness, but we believe that even he, who must carry in his heart a lifelong sorrow or who aches for a lost companionship, ought to let no shadow fall on other lives for his sake. It is sometimes curious to note, however, how little credit for courage is usually given to the person who is habitually cheerful. Hardly any one reaches middle life without some trouble that touches the very springs of action, and cheerfulness is quite as likely to be born from thoughtfulness and courage as from temperamental indifference or unreasoning delight in existence. It was said not long ago of a certain woman whose quick smile and ready jest brightens serious faces, "She has no comprehension of people who have moods, and who have to sit down in the blues now and then"; and yet, touching just such moods, the woman had said to me with a smile that half hid the real earnestness of her speech: "The tiger and the lady (that's myself) go into a cage together now and then, and one of us comes out alive. So far, it has always been I." And that is a good way to treat our moods,—to take them with us into a cage, and have it out by ourselves. Even then we need not announce the fact to others. We have few memorials left of the ministers' wives in the early Puritan days, except such as are afforded by long epitaphs; but we can easily imagine the state of mind with which one would hear her husband's study door close behind him, knowing that he was entering upon a season of wrestling with himself, during which he must have shed melancholy as the honey-suckle sheds fragrance.

Dr. Everett has shown us how comedy may be the corrector and helper of the earnest life, preserving the freshness and bloom of the spirit. "The path of duty is indeed the path of life, but happy is he who can press sometimes laughing and sometimes singing upon his way." And not only is he happy himself; but he increases the happiness of others, and makes for more goodness and more sunshine in the world.

Yet we ought to realize that cheerfulness and the disposition to see the humor even in some things serious is much more than simple light-heartedness. It is less a matter of temperament than we used to think, less a result of easy conditions, less dependent even on digestion. Often it is a philosophy, the result of a deliberate turning toward light and sunshine rather than toward sadness. It is never more real and pervasive than when based on an earnestness that goes deep into character. Helen Hunt once said of joy that it is built on the adamant of pain, and cheerfulness may well be born from the strength and sympathy developed by suffering.

A writer in the Register has recently written tenderly that grief may be transmuted into the most precious products. "He giveth songs in the night" of sorrow; and, when the unspoken, unspeakable loss has been accepted, it takes us "far above the low rebellious mood into which it first plunged the soul." Then it is that the inner meanings, the universal sympathies of life, touch our hearts, binding us closer to our fellows. Cheerfulness is, then, the finest courage and the most genuine sympathy. It is the constant, daily gift to our household companions and to our friends of the one thing that most sweetens the common duties of common days. Then the wonder is repeated that is forever renewing itself in the moral world. What was at first only a duty becomes the most natural thing in life, what was difficult becomes easy and spontaneous, what was an endeavor becomes habit.

EPISCOPALIANISM AND TOLERATION.

We have frequently pointed out the fact that the use of standards, creeds, and liturgies in the Episcopalian Church has not prevented the development of a great diversity of belief as well as of ritualistic practice in that body.

There are in fellowship with it those who are Unitarians in everything but name, so far as their theological views are concerned; and there are those who represent the other extreme of conservatism in matters of dogma. There are Episcopalians who, in matters of ritual and polity, come as near Congregationalism as they can get; and there are others who are just as near to Roman Catholicism as they can get without paying allegiance to the pope. It is evident that a church including such different elements needs a very elastic constitution. To limit freedom of interpretation, to impose a rigid discipline and severe tests of subscription upon its membership, is to sacrifice breadth and catholicity.

Six bishops have undertaken to lay down the law to the whole Episcopal Church, of whom Bishop Potter says that their authority "may be said, if anybody chooses to say so, to have little more value than is expressed in the more or less close consensus of opinion of some half-dozen individuals." This pastoral reaffirms positions and undertakes to define the terms of loyalty; but, in doing so, it implies a censure of the large body of men who have given their best efforts to the work of showing that, while the Episcopal Church is faithful in its transmission of "the faith once delivered to the saints," it is essentially a modern communion which recognizes its duty to minister in the things of God to the needs and requirements of the present generation. The pastoral is not faulted as a statement of ancient dogma, and we have yet to learn that any one objects to it on this account; but it is a blow at toleration. It implies that men are disloyal who decline to accept its statements in what they imply. This is the cause of the trouble which is growing out of it. It seems to narrow the Episcopal Church at a point where it has been claimed as the roomiest body in Christendom. It is a statement, on the authority of a portion of the episcopate, that comprehension of divergent interpretations of truth is not to be allowed, as it is allowed to-day in the Church of England, and that the clergy of the Church must abandon their wider interpretations of its authority and position. So far this document has been met on the part of the liberal clergy with protest. With all due respect to the bishops, and to their right to direct the Church, they feel that the pastoral throws a doubt upon their loyalty.

The vital question here raised must be met. It is whether the Episcopal Church is to be simply the transmitter of ancient truth in its exact terms, standing as a witness of the past, or whether it is to be both a witness to the past and a strong and powerful interpreter of living truth to living men. The growth of this communion in this country has been almost in exact proportion to the extent that it has become an interpreter of truth and a force in present affairs.

To recede from this position of the widest usefulness, and to withdraw into its shell, if this were possible, would be suicidal. The trouble with this pastoral is that it overlooks this enlarged mission of the Episcopal Church, and misinterprets the spirit of its more liberal clergy. They have shown by their works the loyalty of their spirit; and, if one party is to be arrayed against the other because each has a different idea of service from the other, while all agree in essentials, gods and men will look agast upon the scene.

Musings.

ON another page of this paper William Lloyd Garrison pays a tribute to Frederick Douglass which his relations to that prophet, as well as his father's long association with him, well qualify him to utter. But I have heard him tell an anecdote not mentioned in these reminiscences. When a boy in his early teens, he went to bed one night, in a certain town of Massachusetts, at the home of a well-known anti-slavery leader with whom the family were very intimate. During the night he "had a dream which was not all a dream," or, as Shakspeare put it, "a dream past the wit of man to say what dream it was." He dreamed that he put out his hand into a mass of bushy hair. The discovery created no terror. There was no nightmare associated with it. When he came down to breakfast in the morning, the youthful William, like the youthful Joseph, told his dream. It awakened not a little merriment, and an interpreter was present who could give a realistic explanation. Frederick Douglass had arrived at the house unexpectedly late at night; and, as there was no other room available, he was put in the same bed with the young William. He had to leave early in the morning to take a train for another lecture engagement. He succeeded in getting to bed and in rising in the morning without waking his bed-fellow. But whether his bed-fellow woke him when he put his hand into the masses of his hair I am not able to say. I only know that Frederick Douglass has gone now to a well-earned rest. And, if young Garrison disturbed his slumbers that night by his grasping disposition, he now atones for it by tenderly placing some flowers on his bier.

THE other day the editor of the Christian Register was referred to by a reporter of the Boston Herald as a "well-known Baptist minister." Unitarians and others who take a different view of his denominational relations have smiled at this; and an anonymous writer in a daily paper who attacks the writer for a disposition to distinguish between Spiritualism and fraud aims a fling at him in regard to immersion, on the supposition that he is hitting his antagonist in a vital point of his faith and practice. Now, Unitarian friends may smile if they please; but the reporter was not so far out of the way as if he had called the editor something else. If the reporter wished to prove the truth of his statement, he might show that the editor of this paper was baptized by immersion at the age of fourteen in a Baptist church in New York. He might show that at a still earlier age he accompanied his mother to a Baptist church, and cried because he could not partake of the bread and wine at the communion,—a fact which identified him with the open-communion Baptists. He might show that the editor of this paper has written a book entitled "A Baptist Meeting-house." He might point to the fact that in England there are General Baptists included in the Unitarian fellowship, and that there are some churches there in which only a minister baptized by immersion can be settled. Such a minister might well be called a "Unitarian Baptist" or a "Baptist Unitarian," and the reporter might add that the "Baptist Meeting-house" referred to was published in this country by the American Unitarian Association. He might argue that both Baptists and Unitarians strongly maintain the Congregational polity, that neither church has any written creed, and that neither believes in salvation or regeneration by baptism. He might clinch the statement by the fact that the minister of the First Baptist Church in Boston was called to the pastorate of a Congregational church in Springfield, Mass., and that that church is now spoken of very freely there as the "Second Unitarian Church." In short, it seems to me that the reporter could make out a very strong case; and I have no complaint to make.

BUT, to settle the matter beyond question, and to show how true a Baptist the writer is, I quote a few sentences from various paragraphs in the concluding chapter of the book referred to. It is a description of

THE NEW BAPTIST MEETING-HOUSE.

"I know that I cannot do justice to it in any description that I may give. We cannot wholly describe all there is of to-day in the realities about us, but the new Baptist meeting-house belongs also to the morrow. Its foundations are deeply laid in reality, but its superstructure rises like prophecy into the domain of the ideal and the unattained.

"It is not something that can be wholly described by measurement. The rod of Ezekiel cannot determine its proportions. Its architecture is attractive and pleasant, but not wholly from its external quality. It embodies a soul. 'The conscious stone to beauty grew.' It is not dominated wholly by one style; for it is spirit, not form, that makes the temple. It may be Gothic, Romanesque, or modern in its outline and detail; but it is not grotesque. Its very architecture is marked by catholicity. It rejects nothing true or beautiful because it is old, nothing true or beautiful because it is new. The building itself is an architectural psalm. . . .

"Its terms of membership are not described by any tests of doctrinal belief. It welcomes all to its fellowship who sympathize with its spirit and who would share its activities. Not uniformity of belief, but perfection of character, is the end which it has set before itself. It seeks to solve for men the practical problem of life, and to reconcile them to the truth, the beauty, and the goodness which blend like prismatic colors in the being of God. . . .

"If it is not always defining its belief and tinkering its creed, there are, nevertheless, great positive and vital truths which command its convictions and inspire its activity. One of these grand truths is the marvellous power which is wrapped up in the name of God. . . .

"With the truth of God there is the truth of sonship. Humanity is not lost, fallen, degraded, or disowned. It is the life of God coming into consciousness, freedom, development in the life of man. . . .

"As the new Baptist meeting-house has its God ideal, so it has its Christ ideal. Its Christ is not a matter of tradition, textual criticism, punctuation marks. It is the manifestation of God in the flesh. It is the sublime truth of the incarnation not localized, but made universal. Not only Jesus, but all the spiritually good and beautiful, all who have enriched humanity by golden precept or divine example, are transfigured into one likeness in this Christ ideal. . . .

"The worshippers in the new Baptist meeting-house find inspiration in the great law of sacrifice. As they lift the eye of gratitude toward God for his blessings, so they turn with gratitude toward humanity. They recognize and bless the martyrs and heroes of the race. . . .

"As the new Baptist meeting-house has a firm foundation in the realities of the present, so its faith and its hope unfold the vision of immortal life. The fear of death casts no shadows over its altars. . . .

"And what shall I say of the worship, forms, ceremonies, and rituals of this renewed Baptist meeting-house? Simply that they are varied and flexible enough to suit the needs of those who adopt them. . . .

"The Bible of the new Baptist meeting-house is the slowly written Bible of the ages. Greek and Hindu, Christian and Jew, people of all kindred and climes, utter its language. The Hebrew and the Christian Bibles have not been dethroned. They are no longer a fetich or a talisman, but an inspiration. They are a priceless part of the sacred literature of the world. . . .

"There is 'close communion' in the new Baptist meeting-house; but it is the closeness of sympathy, not the closeness of exclusion. There is baptism there, but it is rather the baptism of fire than the baptism of water. The law of its discipline is the law of charity; the law of its life, the perfect law of liberty, duty, and love."

Brevities.

Mr. William Lloyd Garrison's admirable article on "Frederick Douglass" ought to be read by every one born since the war, and who cannot know by participation in the struggle how much it cost to get the measure of liberty we possess.

Well, the monarchs are mortals, like the rest of us. The German emperor has been kept indoors by a severe cold, and so has the boy king of Spain; and the Prince of Wales has had a chill. Nature is democratic, and no respecter of persons.

This sentence from Dr. Talmage is not profound, but it is cheerful: "If this world is ever to be taken for God, it will not be by groans, but by hallelujahs." Dr. Talmage is not a pessimist; and, if he can get pessimism out of Christian theology, he will render an excellent service.

The Gould family has done a good deal of discounting; but now one of the daughters has been counted out, or the French "nobility" will say she is counted in. The majority of the American girls, we suspect, would rather acquire the title to Miss Gould's property than to acquire a title to nobility.

In another column an account is given of the loss of the San Diego church by fire. The loss of Rev. Mr. Johnston, the pastor of the church, is very heavy, including all his books and sermons, and everything except the clothes he wore. But Brother Johnston has the true grit, and his hope and determination are not burnt out.

A correspondent shows the success of a Children's Neighborhood Library in Troy, N. Y. Rev. E. M. Fairchild, pastor of the church which started it, thinks it very easy to convert the ordinary Sunday-school library into a neighborhood library, thus increasing the usefulness of the books a thousand-fold, and conforming far more nearly to the ideals of the church. He would doubtless be glad to give any information desired regarding methods.

A correspondent writes: "Two clergymen of Athol, Mass.,—one a Baptist, the other a Universalist,—met in a restaurant and ordered oyster stews, which were served smoking hot. The Baptist ate his without difficulty, but the Universalist made much fuss in blowing his to cool it off. 'How can you eat such very hot oysters?' said he to his brother theologian. 'I suppose,' said the Baptist, 'it is because I preach a hotter theology than you do.'"

The Catholic Review seems to think that the Indian is doomed because Congress is in favor of withholding appropriations to denominational schools; but, if the government does as it should and will,—namely, take up the work of educating the Indians,—it will be all the better. For the government schools, as a rule, are much better than the denominational ones. Still further, there is nothing to prevent religious denominations from doing missionary work among the Indians as elsewhere.

The confessional has been introduced in St. Matthew's Church (Episcopal) in Detroit. The minister recently declared that the priest of his church had just as much power to absolve sinners as he had to consecrate the bread and wine of the eucharist, Christ's body and blood. The present time, just before the Lenten season, he said, was particularly opportune for confession. "Come to your priest," he declared, "and lay bare your sins; and, if you are truly penitent, you shall be absolved. Though your sins be as scarlet, yet they shall become as white as snow." Here is an opportunity for the bishops to write another pastoral letter.

Rev. John S. Brown of Lawrence, Kan., tells this interesting anecdote: "In my early days I went to the Baptist church in my native town, New Ipswich. John Parkhurst was our minister, a graduate of Harvard College,—a very worthy man, and a fair preacher, who on occasions selected very apt texts; for instance, 'Behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, and ye shall have tribulation ten days.' This was preached from the next Sunday, after three of his church members were released from Amherst jail, where they were incarcerated for refusing to pay taxes assessed for the support of the Congregational minister, Richard Hale. All this occurred in the year of our Lord 1819."

HYMN-BOOKS WANTED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The church in Farmington, Me., needs a number of copies of the earlier Hymn and Tune Book with services. Any church having such to spare will confer a favor by informing D. M. Wilson, 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

JOHNSON ON PARTY ALLIANCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Apropos of the discussion about "Convention Morality," this from Boswell's Johnson, vol. ii. p. 145, may be interesting:—

"An eminent public character being mentioned:—

"Johnson,—I remember being present when he showed himself to be so corrupted, or, at least, something so different from what I think right, as to maintain that a member of Parliament should go along with his party, right or wrong. Now, sir, this is so remote from native virtue, from scholastic virtue, that a good man must have undergone a great change before he can reconcile himself to such a doctrine. It is maintaining that you may lie to the public; for you lie when you call that right which you think wrong, or the reverse." L.

THE A. U. A. COLLECTION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The acknowledgments of the American Unitarian Association for February, which will be found in another column, show, as before, an increase in the amounts contributed by the various churches. Now our main harvest is to come. During March and April, the last two months of our financial year, we received last season $36,000. If the rate of increase made by several churches already contributing shall be maintained by those who are just beginning their annual subscription, our treasury will receive from $45,000 to $50,000 before May 1.

If the individual contributors, the ministers and churches, knew what hope and gladness would be awakened in many struggling congregations, and in the hearts of ministers bravely trying to do their duty with insufficient means, there is no doubt that the gifts would be spontaneous and generous. The work of the Association is sound, its financial standing is good. The only lack is a free income which can be applied directly in the field. In 1893 the gifts of societies and individuals passed $60,000. Dr. Reynolds believed then that he had surmounted the Hill of Difficulty; that the next year the income would reach $80,000, and the strain of anxiety would be over. Then came the panic of 1893; and the next year the contributions fell to $50,000, leaving appropriations unprovided for. If now, with the rising tide of interest, the contributions can be restored to the level of 1893, the churches will have good reason to congratulate themselves on the results. GEORGE BATCHELOR.

AN EPISCOPALIAN VIEW.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Apropos of the sermons recently preached by Rev. Messrs. M. J. Savage and Thomas Van Ness, in regard to the late pastoral letter emanating from the House of Bishops, I send the following:—

The Rt. Rev. Chas. G. Grafton, S. T. D., bishop of the Episcopalian diocese of Fond du Lac, in a recent discourse in a New York pulpit, indulged in some severe comments on the Unitarians. Interviewed by a Chicago reporter on this subject, Bishop Grafton said in confirmation of his charges:—

"Regarding my words, 'Let us beware of those confidence men, those bunco-steerers, who, under the guise of liberality of life, are moving about in the Vanity Fair of this world, endeavoring to seduce the self-willed and self-opinionated to the opium joint of Unitarianism,' I am quoted correctly. We ought never to attack persons, but I say that of a theological system; and the system of modern Unitarianism, which has been erected and is based on the deductions of human reason, dreams of man's imagination, is therefore likened to the results of an opium joint, is contrary to the teachings of the Church, which is based upon authority, with the concurrent assent of Christendom as a witness to its truth.

"One thing was especially fitting in my comparison. The person about to smoke the opium, in order to have the desired effect, must be placed in a recumbent position, with his head on a level with the body. After the attendant has served him, he cannot get up by himself. He thinks he is up, but it is nothing but imagination. Just so with modern Unitarianism. Its followers think they are up; but they are down, and never get above the level of a material philosophy." x.

WILL YOU HELP THE BLIND?

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

A liberal response has been made to the recent appeals for contributions to aid the Kindergarten for the Blind in Jamaica Plain, but the amount still falls far short of that which is needed. It has occurred to me that there may be many persons in this rapidly changing and growing section who do not know much about this special form of rescue work, but whose compassion and help could be easily gained if a concrete case of need was brought before them. With the earnest desire in my heart to win new friends to the cause, I beg you "look here upon this picture, and on this." I may say truly that neither is in any degree a sketch of fancy. Here is one side of the shield:—

The home which we see is most forlorn and destitute in appearance. No picturesque side to poverty appears in this place, but an aspect of penury absolute, severe, and unlovely. The two rooms are meagrely supplied with bare necessities for living. The pent atmosphere is close and stifling. Dirt is seen everywhere, and in abundance. The children in this home are ragged, unkempt, half-starved, noisy, and rough in manner. True, the little fellow who is behind the cordon of pieces of furniture is quiet enough. But he, poor baby, is blind; and the other children, having instincts of mercy, arrange for him this comparatively safe retreat, perchance from their own rude violence. The father and mother are absent the livelong day, having employment in a mill near by. The needs of the little sightless boy are ministered to occasionally by the young brothers and sisters; but, for the most part, they find it pleasanter to play on the street than to stay in this dismal room with a blind boy. And so this neglected child is left alone, guarded in a measure from danger, but prevented by this very semblance of care from the exercise which children need in order to grow. What wonder that both his body and mind are enfeebled by such an existence! Where is the possibility of hope that he will ever receive that which is his due as a member of the human family? This child should exercise freely in the open air. He should become familiar with objects by the sense of touch. He should be taught to dress and undress himself, to wash his hands and face, to feed himself with spoon and fork. He should be encouraged to dispense, as far as possible, with the assistance of others, be taught a becoming deportment, and such habits as will be of service to him later in life. This category of obligations is by no means an exhaustive one; but tell me, I pray, where shall the blind child of the very poor receive this simple but important course of training? Can the home supply this need? Let us reverse the shield.

Commodious and beautiful buildings, each of which is admirably adapted to its purpose, have been erected in Jamaica Plain for the use of the Kindergarten for the Blind. The rooms in each house are large and sunny; the appointments of all have suited means to end. Ample playgrounds are provided, and no effort is spared to supply whatever will develop and promote health of body and mind. A company of blithe and merry boys and girls may be seen daily engaged in delightful kindergarten occupations, or in outdoor sports and games. Wise and gentle teachers are employed to guide, control, and instruct. Floods of sunshine, abundance of fresh air, healthful food, comfort, and happiness abound for seventy children in the Kindergarten for the Blind.

These little sightless children have nearly all been rescued from homes of ignorance and poverty. The good work goes on apace. The expense of maintaining the kindergarten increases rapidly: the funds needed for its support lessen as steadily. Shall this philanthropic enterprise ask in vain for money? The sum of $5,000 seems a paltry amount to block the wheels of progress. Too hearty praise cannot be given to the noble, generous, warm-hearted friends who have thus far sustained the fortunes of the kindergarten; but, in this hour of financial embarrassment, may not a force of new adherents be won to the cause? I call upon a score of business men in this city to unite and free the Kindergarten for the Blind from this oppressive load of debt. L. E.

THE ILLS OF THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In the notice of Mr. Otken's book on "The Ills of the South" in the Register of February 14, after quoting from the book a graphic statement of the destitution existing at the close of the Rebellion, the Register says, "This condition of affairs brought on the vast credit system, with all its tremendous evils." In behalf of the truth of history, allow me to suggest that that is not strictly accurate. The Rebellion did not bring on this vast credit system: it only intensified it. An intimate personal friend of the writer went from this city in the year 1850, and went to Eufala, Ala., as an agent for the purchase of cotton for a New York firm. In a letter to me he said the practice there was for the merchant to make a contract at the beginning of the year by which the funds and the supplies necessary to enable the planter to plant, cultivate, and pick a crop of cotton were to be furnished, and take a mortgage on the crop. At the end of the year a settlement would be had; and, if the crop of cotton was more than sufficient to pay the loan, the balance was paid to the planter. But, if the balance was on the other side of the account, and not too large, as was not unfrequently the case, it was passed on to the contract for the next year; or, if payment was demanded by the broker, the planter would "sell a nigger" and pay the debt.

During the Rebellion a bright mulatto boy from Northern Alabama came to my house, and, after securing a fair common-school education, returned to Alabama and engaged in the same business as my friend of 1850; and he said to me that his method was exactly the same as it was then, and that it was nothing new. Their credit system was not the result of the Rebellion: it was only intensified by it.

MY LADY.

BY EDWIN E. WOODMAN.

A deeper thrill to joy in other hearts
Her quickly kindling sympathy imparts;
Another's sorrow or another's pain
Her aspen spirit, trembling, feels again.

Her balm of pity's palpitating touch
Assuages love's fine dolor overmuch,
So one whom her compassion has made whole
Longs for new hurts, that she will heal his soul.

Where she appears, the halo of this grace
With softly streaming splendor lights the space.
I, standing in that glory, see the woman
Supernal in its rays, at once divine and human.

And far or near and ever she is mine,
As I am hers. To me where her eyes shine
The place is sacred by that burning token;
Where not, made holy by her name but spoken.

AN AMERICAN PAINTER.

BY AUGUSTA LARNED.

There are moments in many of our days that seem like strokes of genius. They are the outflashings of the spirit of beauty, and reveal themselves to eyes prepared to see. Without the power of seeing and reporting these great moments in nature, there can be no great landscape art. Claude Lorraine saw them. So did Turner and Constable, Corot and Millet.

Among Americans Inness was the man to whom Nature unveiled herself in her most brilliant, if not in her tenderest, moods. Though at times an audacious colorist, he was by no means sensational. In nearly all his works a justifying note of harmony makes you feel the rightness of his conclusions. He is the man who has profited most by the impressionist movement. Never led astray by its crazes and exaggerations, he has taken the heart out of it, and compelled it to teach him all it had to impart. He saw its significance as a new point of view, a fresh way of looking at nature, a break from conventionalism toward truth and freedom; and he profited by it more largely than any other American. His distinctive Americanism is one of his chief glories. When a student in the Old World, he knew most of the great artists and their works; but he did not swerve from his strong native bent impressed upon his genius by the peculiar conditions of his own country. While preserving the precious quality of nationalism, he struck out for himself a middle ground between the old school of mannerists, with its fixed habits and iron-bound traditions, and the crazy art of men intoxicated with a new idea essentially true, but falsified by the intemperance of its followers. He evolved a style of his own, magnificent in breadth,—as many believe, the best American style up to date. Inness has been a great emancipator; and it is a little singular that his countrymen have been so slow to see the extent of his services, and the firm and free direction in which he has led his generation.

It seemed inevitable that Inness should create a school, should draw to himself many and devoted disciples. He was a man large enough for the task and richly endowed; but as yet, in an artistic sense, we are not of age, know not how to combine the elements of an art world on the principle that the good of one is the good of all,—the more you give, the more you have. Our greatest artists have lived isolated lives, have worked out their ideas apart, unable to create a diffused art feeling that penetrates the social pores. For this reason many good artists have been less esteemed than they deserve to be, and have found it impossible to make head against the mania for foreign pictures that has inundated our society. Jealousy may have had some preventive influence in the creation of an American school. The art spirit may isolate while still young and tentative; but, when it gets its thaws and sinews, it unites and becomes a common possession. The little man shuts himself in his studio, and works out a little piece by his north light; the big man opens wide his doors, and invites criticism and competition and sympathy.

In a certain sense, Inness has created a school. There is no man, perhaps, on whom his mantle has fallen; but it is not credible that a genius so original as his should not have wide influence, not only on his contemporaries, but also on those to come. No one in our time has surpassed him in the rapidity and sureness of his perceptions, his glancing but firm touch, the swiftness and fidelity with which he seized on great impressions, the ever-shifting play of light and atmosphere. Those were the gnomes and wizards he loved. Like all genius, he aimed at the impossible. All the aspects of sun and weather were an exciting drama to him. He would extract the heart of the mystery, and show it trophy-like on his canvas. His failures, therefore, are more interesting than the successes of many other men. All the scene palpitates with the eager love and passion of the man. In the wrestle with difficulties he is always alert, active, an athlete, wholly awake and in earnest. There was the least of the dilettante about him, the least of the devotee of prettiness. He aimed at truth, and loved it ardently.

These are the qualities that make his work so vital. If his treatment may at times seem sensational, he was never so in the selection of his subjects. He took just the every-day warp and woof of nature,—trees, earth, bushes, rocks, as they exist in fields and along waysides,—and waited until the sun and shadows, local and reflected color, had struck out of them all their intensest meaning. Then he was on them as his prey; for his eye, his brush, was so experienced, a thousand subtle shades and intentions were seized by him that escape the untrained.

The sketches and pictures, finished and unfinished, on exhibition at the Fine Arts Building in West Fifty-seventh Street, New York, are of great interest to an Inness lover. In examining the least important of these, we see how surely and swiftly he struck the key-note of the scene, giving at once its values and the pitch he desired to attain. If the pitch seems at times too high, still he was a consummate master in bringing the whole composition into harmony. Few of our artists have been as audacious in the use of color. The problem of our flaming autumnal forests, which most of our artists have given up as impossible to paint, Inness tackled with delight. He sought for the secret of truth in that brilliant phase of American scenery; and, if he did not always find it, he certainly came nearer to it than any other. His audacities often have a sense of rightness that is a justification of the boldest attempts. No one has dealt more sympathetically with greens,—not the feeble hues of the studio, but the living colors of nature bathed in air and sunlight, or seen against the heavy blue hazes of our American autumns. He loved the on-coming of storms,—blue-black thunder-clouds hurrying and toppling in the sky, and against them the up-toss of vivid foliage, the last gleam of splendor before the on-rush of the rain. He loved superb sunsets, and the fire haze hanging over the world, breaking from spent clouds with intensity of splendor, touching human faces, and transforming and glorifying common things. It is his mastery in lighting that makes Inness so great. In his art he was a worshipper of the low sun that gives color, all the subtlety of varied effects that gather about the drama of sunset.

But in his forestry he is also supreme. No one has so entered into the soul of the tree in our time, or made it a more vital thing in the landscape. The mass of his pictures deals with trees in clumps, in fields, on hillsides, in forests, by the way,—endless successions of trees, all imbued with character, each individual and alive, standing just where it ought to stand in the scene with unpremeditated art. Few have equalled Inness in this artless tree-grouping that makes his pictures so companionable, and surrounds us at once with shade and leafiness where we feel the play of the south wind in the branches. The chief value of art is that it makes us more at home in the world, shows us the things we have long looked upon without observing, and reveals the hidden soul of beauty. In this sense the art of Inness's domesticates, renders dearer the familiar, truer the truths we know. The interest does not flag, the excitement is unabated. You feel the shock of new and joyful surprise as you pass from picture to picture. You find old, forgotten emotions renewed by a master hand. The things you have felt, but could not express, are here limned, fixed forever by a medium that seems not faint, but vital perception made objective.

Our picture galleries are often very discouraging. They make us feel too keenly the limitations of the art world, the timidity of the artist nature. The work we see there seems to bear but slight relation to the universe, steeped in and flooded with beauty and vital, vibrating power. We ought therefore to be grateful to the man who dares, not as an experimentalist, a deluded egotist, but as a master of his craft, to be an interpreter of high things to the soul. Inness may in time hold to American art the place that Constable now holds to English art. Both men had the power of imparting life to their work. There are no dead sticks in their woodlands. Constable reached his end by another method; but with him, too, all is movement, animation, palpitating air and light. The wind is in the leaves of his trees, his brooks run and gurgle. You perceive the lush, cultivated richness of that English landscape, so different from the unpruned wildness of shaggy America. But the spirit is the same in both men. They did not choose their art: it chose them. It was a possession, an intensity of being. The joy with which they wrought is subtly imparted to us as we gaze. A new face is put upon the world; and we see that this art, so robust and virile, has in it moral elements of deep satisfaction and invigoration for the soul.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

BY WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

Frederick Douglass was born a slave in the State of Maryland, probably about 1817, although, as no records of the birth of slaves were kept, the exact date is not known. His father was a white man, but who he was even the son never surmised. Mr. Douglass said: "Of my father I know nothing. Slavery had no recognition of fathers, as none of families. That the mother was a slave was enough for its deadly purpose. By its law the child followed the condition of its mother. The father might be a white man, glorying in the purity of his Anglo-Saxon blood, and the child ranked with the blackest slaves." In 1838 he escaped from Boston to New York City, and then went to New Bedford, where there was a large colored settlement. There he lived about three years, getting what odd jobs he could. Although a caulker, the white workers in that trade would not tolerate a colored man. So, instead of earning two dollars a day, as he might have done, he was forced to saw wood and take anything that offered.

His mother had given him the high-sounding name of Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey; but his friends persuaded him, for the sake of safety, to change it to Frederick Douglass, the last name having been the choice of a Quaker who had recently been reading Scott's "Lady of the Lake," and thought Douglass a fine name. Meantime he sent to Baltimore for the free young colored woman to whom he was attached. They were married and settled down, as he thought, to a life of common toil. It happened, however, that his natural powers of speech induced him to take part in the Methodist meetings for prayer and exhortation; and this brought him into notice. He had also seen and subscribed for the Liberator, and become deeply interested in the anti-slavery movement.

In 1841 there happened to be an anti-slavery convention held at Nantucket, which Douglass was tempted to attend. He had no thought of speaking, and did not suppose any one there would know him. An abolitionist from New Bedford, however, named Coffin, who had heard him talk in the little school-house where the colored people worshipped, recognized him, and prevailed upon him to come upon the platform. He tells in his story that it was with the utmost difficulty that he could stand erect, or could command and articulate two words without stammering. He trembled in every limb. He says: "The audience sympathized with me at once, and, from having been remarkably quiet, became much excited. Mr. Garrison followed me, taking me as his text. Whether I had made an eloquent speech in behalf of freedom or not, his was one never to be forgotten."

When his unusual powers as a public speaker were discovered, Mr. Douglass was at once put into the lecturer's field by the Anti-slavery Society, and went about from town to town preaching abolition. It was an occupation that brought him into the company of earnest and devoted people, and often into scenes of danger and persecution. For abolition was everywhere unpopular, and those who denounced slavery were themselves denounced by society as fanatics and disturbers of the peace. Meetings were frequently mobbed and broken up, and lecturers greeted with missiles. Arrest and imprisonment were not uncommon. Boston was as bitter against the free Negro then as South Carolina is now, and for one to avow himself an abolitionist was to lose caste in society, religion, and business. The churches permitted the colored people to occupy only the "nigger pew," as it was called. They were shut out of the theatres, except in a portion of the upper gallery set apart for them, and known as the "nigger heaven." Hotels denied them entrance, save as servants; and to only one grammar school in this city, the Smith School, were they admitted. In my boyhood's day it was the custom to insult colored people as they passed along the street. On the railroad they must ride in the "Jim Crow car" or with the baggage.

Frederick Douglass, after leaving New Bedford, went for a time to live in Lynn. The president of the Eastern Railroad, a prominent Quaker of Salem, was, nevertheless, a bitterly pro-slavery man, and decreed that no Negro should ride in the common cars. But Douglass, who was a man of courage, with a stalwart frame and strength of muscle, undertook to test his rights one day. His white friend, James N. Buffum, a staunch and earnest abolitionist, in later years mayor of the city, went with Douglass to defend him. Together they took seats in the forbidden car. The conductor ordered the colored man to leave at once. Buffum protested, and Douglass refused to budge. The brakemen were called; and, in spite of Mr. Buffum's remonstrance and Douglass's resistance, the latter was carried out by force, taking with him the back of the seat to which he had clung. He finally was forced to ride in the baggage car; and Mr. Buffum stayed with him, refusing to go back to his seat when his friend could not.

My earliest recollection of Frederick Douglass was about 1845, when I was seven years old, and he used occasionally to come to my father's house. The story of his early life and the interest attaching to his personality made a great impression upon me. In the anti-slavery meetings his eloquence always attracted, especially as he spoke of slavery with an interior knowledge and experience that no white abolitionist could possess. The iron had entered his soul, and his burning words were most effective. He was a natural speaker, having a fine presence; a powerful voice, admirably in control; an ease and force of expression, without that fatal fluency so often the bane of ready speakers; a native wit and gift of sarcasm; and, behind all, an intellectual quality that weighted every sentence. Other colored orators have attained great success upon the platform and in the pulpit; but it is no disparagement to them to say that Frederick Douglass towers above them all, like Saul among his brethren. My own conviction is that, had he been thrown as a white man into the nation's councils,—even when Webster, Clay, and Calhoun were in the ascendant, with equal early advantages,—he would not have been dwarfed by their companionship.

The abolitionists were very few in those days. In Boston only three or four houses were ready to entertain colored people or anti-slavery advocates. Of those who kept open houses, I can recall only Francis Jackson, Joseph Southwick, and my father. At any time, day or night, they were liable to be called upon to shelter fugitive slaves on their way to Canada, or receive itinerant lecturers or others who had suffered for the cause. The fugitives came to our house as a natural refuge, and the feelings of the household were harrowed up by the details of cruelty which the poor terrified creatures told. But more impressive than any words were the scarred backs and maimed limbs, the welts made by the driver's lash being most often in evidence. Sometimes white men who had tried to help slaves escape were brutally dealt with. A noble man, Capt. Jonathan Walker, allowed some slaves to escape on his vessel. He was a Down-East skipper, and his vessel was in the coasting trade. He was arrested, imprisoned, and sentenced to have his right hand branded. I remember the astonishment with which my brothers and myself examined the ridged letters on his palm, "S.S."

They were supposed to stand for slave-stealer, but the abolitionists insisted that their true meaning was "Slave Savior." He was a gentle and brave man. The story of his experiences is preserved in a book, which contains a picture of the branded hand.

In 1846 Mr. Douglass was sent to England on an anti-slavery mission, his old friend James N. Buffum accompanying him. There he lectured to enormous and enthusiastic audiences, making a host of friends for life. The color prejudice did not exist in Europe, and the man who was dragged out of the Lynn car and barred out of American churches and theatres was received on equal terms in fashionable drawing-rooms and in the houses of the nobility in Great Britain. It was a grateful contrast from persecution and malignity to courtesy, appreciation, and respect. It is strange that any colored person, once feeling the difference, was ever tempted to come back to the land of chains.

Samuel J. May, in his delightful "Recollections of the Anti-slavery Conflict," tells of Mr. Douglass's reception in Great Britain: "He was treated with great attention by the abolitionists of the United Kingdom, was invited to lecture everywhere, and rendered most valuable services to the cause of his oppressed countrymen. So deeply did he interest the philanthropists of that country that they paid $750 to procure from his master a formal, legal certificate of manumission, so that on his return to the United States he would be no longer liable to be sent back into slavery."

Douglass's own delight in the sudden transition from a region of prejudice and persecution to an atmosphere of equality and respect was expressed in an eloquent letter to his friend Mr. Garrison, to be found in "The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass."

Mr. Douglass moved to Rochester, N. Y., and established a paper of his own about the year 1847, and, on account of differences with his old friends, no longer visited them, as was his wont. But, wherever he lived or went, the marked personality of the man, his eloquence and intellect, and, added thereto, a tact and judgment that allayed social antagonisms, and never unnecessarily aroused them, made him a centre of force and attraction. It was the tendency of many colored men who felt deeply the degradation inflicted upon them, simply on account of color, to emphasize their sensitiveness, and be quick to resent the least appearance of a slight. Not so with Frederick Douglass. He never looked for insult, nor showed a consciousness that he was different from other men. To meet him and converse, one would forget that he was of a despised race, and think only of the charming qualities which this interesting human being possessed. It was an evidence of his magnanimity and greatness of spirit.

I remember a story of Douglass and Sojourner Truth, a character as remarkable in her way as Douglass was in his. She was a thorough African, of unmixed blood, gaunt and black. She was born a slave in New York, and emancipated when slavery was abolished in the State. She could neither read nor write, whereas Douglass had educated himself, and was the peer of any so-called self-made white man. At an anti-slavery meeting, when the aspect of affairs was particularly dark, Douglass was speaking, and indulging in a gloomy view of the situation. Sojourner, who was a listener, and was possessed with an intense religious faith, was disturbed at the tone of despondency, and in a moment relieved her feelings, and those of the meeting as well, by saying in her deep voice, "Is God dead, Frederick?" Nobody could appreciate the hit better than himself, and the closing remarks were in a more hopeful strain.

John Brown, when contemplating his raid on Harper's Ferry, took Douglass into his confidence. After the tragedy, Douglass was sought by Gov. Wise of Virginia, who issued a requisition for his arrest, to escape which he went again to England, staying till the danger had blown over. Of the wealth and honors that came naturally to Frederick Douglass in his later years I do not propose to speak. They happen in the lives of all successful men. Of course, it was noteworthy for an ex-slave to be Marshal of the District of Columbia, under both a Republican and a Democratic administration, and be received and honored at the White House in a high official capacity.

His last representative distinction was at the World's Fair, where during its existence he was a conspicuous and attractive personality. Since the war he has lived on a fine estate at Anacostia, Washington, where he died so suddenly the other day.

He took a sympathetic interest in reforms, notably that of woman suffrage. The day of his death he attended the great convention of women in Washington, and was escorted in honor to the platform by two ladies, one of whom was his old Rochester anti-slavery friend and neighbor, Miss Susan B. Anthony. With Frederick Douglass has passed away a life as full of romance and wonder as can be found in the world of fiction. His career is an incentive and encouragement to all down-trodden and unfortunate human beings.

A WHITE CAMP.

While the Appalachians were in Maine, two of them, who were also Shayback campers, stole away from the enterprising snowshoers to catch a glimpse of their beloved camp in its winter array. A beautiful day for travel, and a marvellous conjunction of trains, which would enable them to go right through to Canada, were opportunities not to be resisted. Arrangements for the forwarding of telegrams, letters, and trunks to wait their return in North Conway were easily made; and the promise of a warm room to await their return was a pleasant way of burning their bridges behind them. So, with genuine regret at leaving charming Fryeburg and the merry throng, they turned away to the north.

There was some advantage in going by themselves, for in midwinter there is little travel in that region; and there are ample room for comfort, plenty of windows through which to catch the views, and intelligent conductors only too happy to show off the beauties of the mountains, which they seem to regard as their exclusive property. One might think the rear end of the last car too cool a spot for February; but the air was so dry and sparkling, without a breath of wind astir, that for miles and miles that was a comfortable and delightful place. Every ravine was blue or white or crystal clear, with waterfalls caught fast in the embrace of the ice king. Every ledge and mountain slope had torrents of ice pouring down and sparkling in the sun. There had been a thaw, and the melted snow had been gloriously transfigured through the sudden cold. Far down the valleys and up the hillsides that skirt the Notch the woods were rich with unexpected color. One might have thought it would be like a sea of black branches against a groundwork of white. But the delicate green of the poplars, the soft brown of the alders, the varied hues of the maples and viburnums, from light gray to a deep red, gave a warmth and variety to the wintry landscape full of delight as well as surprise.

Far beyond and above all towered the Presidential range, clear cut against the deep blue of the sky, as though hewn from Pentelic marble, and clothed with the atmosphere of Greece. One could not speak in the presence of such glory: one could only feel and keep silence. The snow-white purity exalted the mountains, and they were more like Alpine peaks than "white hills."

The ride from eleven till five was unbroken pleasure. At last the train halted at the head of Memphremagog. Unfamiliar in its winter guise, it spread out like a vast snowy plain, over which sleds and sleighs were crossing at different angles. Night was coming; and a twenty miles' drive still lay between Newport and camp, with an impassable rift in the ice, so that the land roads must be taken. A few minutes sufficed to lay in a few supplies, to engage a pair of good horses and an intelligent driver, and then, fortified by a cup of hot cocoa at the hands of a friend, the long drive was begun.

Who could faithfully picture the exquisite beauty of that late winter afternoon? No artist of the brush or of the pen. No paint could represent the weird, almost spiritual purity of the snow as it spread over lake and hill and upland meadow. Against this the giant elms and stalwart maples threw the interwoven tracery of their multitudinous branches; the birches vied in whiteness with earth's mantle; and the innumerable evergreens, dotting the landscape or making coverts with the close-branched cedars, lent varied forms of beauty. From the winding height along which the road lay the panorama changed with every step; and, as the sun dropped behind the western hills, a rosy shimmer like an Alpine glow suffused the air, and the white world blushed at its touch.

Night fell, and with it the dispiriting information that the driver had forgotten to bring a lantern. This mattered little so long as the stars sparkled overhead and the road lay between the fences as it should. But clouds darkened the sky, and suddenly the horses were floundering in soft snow up to their shoulders. The road was lost.

It is the custom in that part of the country to roll the snow with heavy rollers after every storm, so that the road-bed is hard and firm; but a treacherous step to one side or the other when the snow lies deep is most disastrous.

"You've got to drive into the lot," sang out a belated farmer who, by good chance, happened to be jogging along a cross-road. True. After a little search, the driver found the way into the lot, and chivalrously tried to tread a path for his passengers, who had been compelled to alight so that the big double sleigh could be turned in the deep snow. Once more in the sleigh, with the roadway left behind, the path led through pastures and over hills, wherever the drifts and the sloping ground would allow. The horses had to follow it as best they could, for it was too dark to guide them. In one place they made a sudden turn, stepped off from the rolled bed, and in much less time than it takes to tell it two bundles of cloaks, hoods, and wraps were executing somersaults in the air not taught in city gymnasiums. Happily, no damage was done; and the funny side was more apparent than the serious. The sleigh was set right side up with care, the robes, hand-warmers, satchels, snow-shoes, and passengers were gathered together, the snow dusted off, and the journey cautiously resumed. Within a mile or two, a farm-house was passed, where a group of men going in from milking had each a blessed pharos swinging from his arm.

"Don't you want to sell a lantern?"

"I dunno's I do," was the way the conversation began.

"Ah, but do! We've ten miles yet to drive, turning constantly into the fields; and the horses cannot keep the path."

"Wall, I've got one in the house; but t'ain't got no wick in it."

"Fix it up for yourself then, and let us have one of these."

"Dunno's I want to sell. I paid seventy-five cents for it."

"Here's a dollar. Buy another, but give us that."

And he did, reluctantly, hanging it on the dasher in front, where it gave a genial and beneficent illumination, casting its light far ahead from a tin reflector.

"Quick, driver! On now, lest he should change his mind, though I wouldn't sell it back to him for five dollars," was the first anxious word from the travellers. The driver, up to that time, had been congratulating himself that he hadn't two nervous women behind him.

On and on, with a soft covering of snow, of big, fleecy flakes, settling down over all things near and far, hiding the stars and threatening a stormy morrow. Often and often the road ran along with the runners above the level of the tops of the fences, whose high, slanting rails alone indicated that fences were buried there. Stone walls slept peacefully quite out of sight; and in one place, where the overhanging elm branches had to be dodged, the driver said the snow was seven feet deep beneath the sleigh. It was an old story to him to go over such highways, but it was an excitingly new experience for his passengers.

But time fails to tell the whole story,—of the warm room and the warmer welcome at the kind doctor's, in the peaceful village, after the four hours' drive; of the delicious supper at the dissipated hour of ten; of the soft down bed that folded every weary muscle in a tender embrace; of the fun of walking on snow-shoes over the frozen lake, where in summer one is used to dip the oar; of the strange sensation of "going ashore" at "Birchbay Camp" after the two miles' walk; of the finding the good farmer in the sugar-house in the woods making ready for the sugaring near at hand; of the ride on the ox-sled up to the farm-house and back; of a drive on the lake from headland to headland at a brisk trot, not half-believing that far below were peaceful deeps fed by ever-living springs. All this must go untold.

But it would be no true Shayback camp without the breaking of bread. With partial consideration the winds had swept the shores in such a way that, though a drift a hundred feet long ran straight up from the clearing, and away beyond into the woods, the snow curled away from the end of the cabin, so that one had but to turn the key in the lock and open the door, without so much as a snow-shovel to break a path. In the darkest night the bag of birchbark could be found; but the morning was brilliant after the evening's scurry of snow, and the sunshine poured in at every cranny as well as through the open door and window. In five minutes a rousing fire was dancing up the chimney. The Wanzer lamp had been left filled; and over that snow was soon melting for bouillon and hot lemonade flavored with tea. The table was drawn up before the blazing maple, the agate dishes were brought out from the cupboard, the Newport supplies produced; and the farmer and the escaped Appalachians sat down to eat and drink. What fun it was! And how good it would have been to have gathered a score more of the Shayback guild, could they have come on the magic Arabian mat, to share the warmth and see the winter beauty of the place. For hardly in midsummer is there more exquisite charm than that sunlit day afforded.

After the manner of tidy housekeepers, everything was restored to its place; a volume was taken from the book-shelves; the melodeon was tried, to see if winter had silenced its notes; the fire-brands were tossed out into the snow, and the glowing coals scattered to die away into cold and gray silence; and the key was turned till summer comes. Had the camp laureate been there, she would have been asked to write on "Paradise Revisited."

Another drive of nearly twenty miles, a cheery evening with beloved friends, a night so starry and so still that all cities seemed a million miles away, another day of travel by train, and by five o'clock the Appalachians were united again, just as though there had been no parting. And the Notch ride was even more beautiful than before; for every tree was decked with new-fallen snow, and over the giant mountain tops clouds were hovering, lit up by sunset gleams of red. I. C. OUR SAN DIEGO CALAMITY.

The Unitarian church in San Diego, a handsome structure, the fruit of Rev. B. F. McDaniel's labors, as announced last week, was totally destroyed by fire on Sunday, the 17th ult., the minister, Rev. H. Digby Johnston, losing all his personal effects,—library, manuscripts, etc. Mr. Johnston had only been in San Diego a few weeks, but his three or four services had already drawn around him a phenomenally large and interested congregation.

The church cost $19,000 in "boom" times; the indebtedness upon it, which sorely handicapped the society, was $9,000; the insurance was $6,000, the lot being worth about $2,000 more. Rev. H. Digby Johnston writes Superintendent C. W. Wendte, under date of February 19, concerning the calamity:—

Long before this reaches you the newspapers will, no doubt, have made you aware of our great loss. I have seldom known a happier hour than that I spent after last Sunday morning's service. The congregation had been the largest the church had had for years,—full up to the doors; and the service had been inspiring to all of us. "The night is past," "the time of the singing of the birds is come," were phrases I heard from men who had in times past seen cause for despair. I remained in the vestry, in preparation for the evening lecture, on "Art as the Ally of Religion," until 3.30, and then ran off to visit a sick parishioner. While I was talking with him, at 4.30 a messenger came, out of breath, to tell us the church was in flames. They drove me down quickly, but I arrived only in time to see the steeple fall and the whole edifice a burning mass. I had not yet found apartments, and all my goods of every kind were there; and not a vestige was saved. What had been called the ladies' parlor had been given up to me for a study; and all my books, pictures, bronzes, and curios had contributed to make it as beautiful a study as any man ever had. And I had already come to love it deeply. Scores of people, after the morning's service, had been in to see it; and I had received congratulations from them. Now I have not a book, a periodical, a sermon, a lecture, a diary, or even a scrap of paper, and not an article of clothing, except those I stood in.

But we "are not in despair." Nay, on the contrary, we have burst into a new life. We went down into the grave on Sunday while the flames roared. We awoke in the newness of the resurrection on Monday; and at a meeting of the church on Wednesday, principal friends held a judge Luce's chambers yesterday afternoon it was resolved unanimously to go on, to allow no break in any part of the work we had just organized, to take the opera house for morning and evening service, and to redouble our energy and interest.

Hard as it is to bear (for the fruits of my life's work, as gathered into books and manuscripts, are gone, and I am orphaned indeed), I believe this great disaster is to be overruled for highest good.

The enclosed letter of sympathy and help, which I received last evening from a Methodist, is a specimen of what many are feeling and saying. There are brave, noble hearts here,—God bless them!—and I feel sure we shall be more strongly supported than we might have been for years if no such misfortune had overtaken us. I shall preach on Sunday morning on "Work as a Refuge."

Faithfully,
H. DIGBY JOHNSTON.

THE ROCHESTER, N.H., CHURCH.

The new sense of solidarity which has developed in the Unitarian consciousness makes it possible to write of the dedication of a Unitarian church in any part of the country with confidence that it is a matter of more than local interest. On the evening of February 21 a very pretty and wholly adequate church was dedicated by "the Church of the Unity" in Rochester, N.H., with interesting and appropriate services.

The wise "Autocrat" used to say that, when a child is born, the first question to be asked and answered relates to its parentage. Rochester is a small manufacturing city, with three lines of railroad crossing and leading out of it in six directions. Its population is about eight thousand, of which five or six thousand are concentrated at the centre. There are two Catholic churches and three "evangelical,"—Congregational, Methodist, and Free Baptist. There have been in times past both Unitarian and Universalist services held there, and a Universalist church was once organized which had a varied history. Four years ago the superintendent for Northern New England ascertained the above facts, and collected a list of about a hundred liberal families, most of whom were not included in any congregation. There was room for a liberal church: it was needed; and it was possible, if those who ought to be in it could be once again interested. That was no easy matter. Liberal preaching had no longer the charm of novelty. The liberal movement had been a costly and, apparently, fruitless experiment,—a record of disheartening failures; and the liberal people had a label upon them, and it was not Unitarian.

Rev. James De Normandie preached the first sermon in the new campaign on July 13, 1890. He was not unknown in Rochester. Some acquaintances whom he met on his arrival cordially welcomed him, and assured him of an audience of two or three hundred hearers. The hall would have seated six or eight hundred. He preached to thirty-nine people, and his kind acquaintances were not among them. That master in Israel, Edward Everett Hale, will remember lecturing there—on a stormy night, it is true, and with a small fee at the door—to an audience of thirty-five. It will not seem strange that for two months the usual Sunday congregation consisted of twelve persons, and that at the end of five months it was only thirty-five. But it happened that there were a few blessed women in that small number whom it was absolutely impossible to subdue. Impossible to discourage would be too much to say. "Cast down" they often could not but be, "but not destroyed." There are many, including the American Unitarian Association, of whom it may be said that without them success would not have been possible; but to no others is this praise so obviously due as to a few faithful and devoted women, whose names deserve to be written in any book of remembrance where the memorials of loyalty, self-denial, and high service are kept. These women early organized a Branch Alliance, with twenty or more members. They paid the local expenses; they have paid more than $600 toward the building and furnishing; they have found persons who have been glad to commemorate their friends in nine tasteful windows, costing from $25 to $200 each; and they have told their story to Branches of the Alliance in other places, from whom they have received both encouragement and aid. They return thanks to societies and individuals outside of Rochester for $864.90. Friends have been generous to them, and they appreciate it; but they have deserved it all. If this were a longer history, there are several men in Rochester whose names would find an honored place.

The church is a tasteful structure, pleasantly situated, fronting a short street, sufficiently near the centre of the little city. It is well carpeted; its ample furnace is in place; and it has, including a ladies' parlor in the rear, a seating capacity of about three hundred people,—small enough for present needs, and not too large for their hopes.

The Sunday congregation has recently numbered about one hundred persons. This excellent showing is partly due to the new church, but more largely to the new minister. The society has been particularly fortunate in securing the services of Rev. W. H. Walbridge, late of Peterboro. It with all the scenic accompaniments, would be held there at the same hour as that appointed for the dedication. It was plain no one would be at the latter service who could be kept away, or who had not the courage of his convictions. It was a pleasure, therefore, to meet an audience of one hundred and eighty-three attentive men and women, only one of whom retired during a two hours' session. It was said, "There were not many orthodox present"; i.e., the little church merely had its own. It was a pleasant contrast to the regular audience of twelve which met Sunday after Sunday four years ago.

The largest, most costly, and most beautiful window in the church was placed there by Mr. Charles Tebbets of Lynn, a Rochester boy, in memory of his brother, also a Rochester boy, Rev. Theodore Tebbets, a man of much promise, soon cut off, settled first over the Unitarian church in Lowell, Mass., in 1855, then in Medford. Near the top is a scroll with the words, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." The Rochester people may be pardoned if they point to it, as they do, as symbolical of their experience.

S. C. BEACH.

is a consummation devoutly to have been wished, but hardly to have been hoped for. A generous and also wise appropriation of $500 by the American Unitarian Association has made this result possible. One of the pleasant incidents in the dedication service was the reading of a letter to the parish from Mr. John Scott, editor of a Peterboro newspaper, giving his former pastor a character. It was such a frank and hearty expression of love and confidence as any minister would be glad to have an old parishioner write about him, though he might not desire to sit on the platform while it was being read. Among other kind letters received was one from Mrs. George S. Hale, who has early Rochester associations and memories.

The ministers who took part in the services were Rev. Mr. Hamlet of Wolfeboro, Rev. C. J. Staples of Manchester, Rev. Mr. Morrison of Laconia, Rev. S. C. Beach of Bangor, Rev. Mr. Cutler of Melrose, Rev. D. M. Wilson of Boston, Rev. A. C. Nickerson of Exeter, and the happy pastor of the church.

The building and land have cost $7,148.93. Of this $4,690.81 has been paid. Of the balance it is expected that $2,000 will be placed with the Church Building Loan Fund. Toward the remainder, $448.12, a collection of $55 was taken at the dedication; and there is left a floating debt of $393.12 to stimulate their further endeavors and the liberality of their friends.

The guests arriving saw placards at the Methodist church showing that a revival was in full activity, and that a meeting,

A NEW EPISTLE FROM ST. PAUL.

In our "Religious Intelligence" we give a condensed account of the installation of Rev. William R. Lord as pastor of Unity Church, St. Paul. A letter from a correspondent who was present adds some interesting comments on the service:—

The occasion was in every respect satisfactory. The informal, or, rather, unconventional character of the services added much to their human interest. Our innovations on the usual installation programme proved very successful. It was a good plan to leave out the sermon and the "specific charges" to minister and people,—best of all to give the incoming pastor a prominent part in the exercises and an opportunity to strike the key-note of his ministry. It is needless to say that Mr. Lord used this opportunity to the best advantage.

The reception to Mr. and Mrs. Lord which followed was of the most cordial character, and left us all in a glow of enthusiasm. The large number who took part in it gave ample evidence of their vital interest in the church, and their loyalty to it after their great bereavement in the loss of Mr. Crothers and the depressing period of the interregnum.

The participation of several of the leading orthodox ministers of the city was one of the most gratifying features of the evening. Dr. Ingersoll of the Park Congregational Church took part in the installation services, and gave in the heartiest way the "fellowship of the churches." Dr. Carson, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, and Dr. Wilcox of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, showed their good will by their attendance at the installation services and at the reception. Undoubtedly, other ministers would have been present but for the fact that it was the regular prayer-meeting night. These indications of a broadening sympathy are very gratifying, as we think they are largely traceable to the influence of Mr. Crothers.

Mr. Lord begins his pastorate of Unity Church under the most propitious circumstances. This is due in no small degree to the loving service of Mr. Crothers, who has lost no opportunity of helping his old parish. He came out last week, preached twice on Sunday (to crowded houses of course), and his sermons showed that Cambridge has not been able to spoil him yet. He said exactly the right things at the right time and in the right way, and made it impossible for the new minister and his wife to fail to receive at once our unreserved confidence. If his presence among us revived our sorrow at his leaving us, that, in turn, put us into the heartiest sympathy with these new-comers who had recently suffered for our sakes the same pain of parting from the generous parish in Dorchester.

The Sunday School.

We learn that the Unitarian Sunday-school in Keokuk, Ia., is showing new vigor. A correspondent speaks very pleasantly of the value of Mrs. Jaynes's "Lessons on the Life of Jesus," which are in use there.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, March 9. Subject, Lesson XXIV., "The Transfiguration." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

There are many isolated Unitarian families, where no Unitarian church exists, that are in communication with the Unitarian Sunday School Society. The parents desire to have their children educated in the liberal faith. To this end the Unitarian Sunday School Society often donates books, Every Other Sunday, and co-operates by consultation. These home Sunday-schools are found in New York State, Tennessee, California, Vermont, Missouri,—indeed, far and wide over the country. Such cases illustrate a zeal which is lacking in many of our large, well-situated Unitarian Sunday-schools.

We wish to commend the spirit which pervaded the address to Mrs. Beach at the meeting of the New England Women's Alliance, at Jamaica Plain last week, who led the speaking on the Sunday-school. Her position was entirely correct, that the solution of the Sunday-school problem lies in the hands of the parents. When they wake up to a sense of responsibility, there will be very little trouble in getting teachers, pupils, money, and full prosperity. The large audience listening to Mrs. Beach seemed to be apparently in full accord. We trust it was so. If such energetic women as are included in the Alliance take hold of this matter, it will be improved. There is no living future for the Unitarian denomination if it continues to neglect its Sunday-school interests.

Mrs. Beatley, superintendent of the Sunday-school of the Church of the Disciples in Boston, is making a practical test of tables and chairs in Sunday-school sessions. This is a new arrangement becoming quite popular in the Congregational Trinitarian Sunday-schools. It often occurs that our friends in that denomination lead off in many matters where it would be thought the Unitarians would come first. The object of this plan is to group a class around a table on which books, maps, and writing material can be placed, and each member put in a position of direct interest with the teacher. His or her eye and voice are thus in immediate relation to all parts of the class. The old way of having a class stretched out in a long pew is often a matter of necessity, owing to the conditions of a vestry or church; but it is not the best method.

We have often had occasion to call attention to the need of knowing the Bible simply as literature. The ignorance in which our children grow up of this book is well known. Even the International Lesson system does not necessarily guide a student to an abiding and intelligent comprehension of the Bible as a whole. Charles Dudley Warner takes up this subject in "Editor's Study" of Harper's Magazine for March, and makes a strong point, as he well may. The opening sentence of his essay strikes the key-note, "The ignorance of the Bible among students in our public schools and colleges furnishes a curious illustration of the inadequacy of our educational machine to meet the requirements of life." He dilates on this, and then in one part returns again to this phase of the Bible as precious literature: "Now, wholly apart from its religious or from its ethical value, the Bible is the one book that no intelligent person who wishes to come into contact with the world of thought and to share the ideas of the great minds of the Christian era can afford to be ignorant of."

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Augustus Woodbury, D.D., will preach March 10. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Rev. C. G. Ames will conduct the half-hour noon service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, March 13, at twelve o'clock. All are cordially invited.

Ministers' Monday Club: March 11, 10.30 A.M. Report of Committee on "Ministerial Ethics," and discussion on the report. Rev. Henry Powers, Chairman.

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Popular religious services Sunday evening, March 10, at 7.30. Rev. John Cuckson. Subject, "Beauty and Bands." Attractive music. All seats free.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon service at 3.15; evening service at 8, when Rev. C. R. Eliot will speak upon "John Wesley." On Monday evening will begin a series of debates upon "City Problems," based upon Albert Shaw's "Municipal Government in Great Britain." The first subject will be as follows: "Is the Present Tendency toward the Growth of Large Cities for Good or Evil?" All are cordially invited to attend, and to take part in the discussion.

BROCKTON, MASS.—Rev. Pitt Dillingham has resigned the pastorate of the Unitarian church.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.—The spirit of friendliness and liberal toleration is pre-eminent in Dr. Lyman Abbott's church. Recently one of its associations, known as the Plymouth League, entertained all the ministers of the First Ward, Brooklyn, and their wives, in a most delightful fashion. Short addresses were made by Dr. Abbott, and by Messrs. Hall, Alsop, and Brewster, Episcopalians; Eliot, Unitarian; Ager, Swedenborgian; Jordan, Methodist; Adam, Reformed,—all testifying to the underlying unity of Protestant Christianity. It is also worth recording that Plymouth Church a short time ago gave letters to two of its members, recommending them to the Church of the Saviour, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, pastor.

CHELSEA, MASS.—The study class of the Unity Club of the First Unitarian Church was entertained on the evening of February 20 by an informal talk from Judge Chamberlain on the subject of "George Washington and his Position in American History." On the evening of the 22d the kindergarten department of the Sunday-school gave an entertainment under the direction of Miss Lucy Gerrish. "Sketches from Life," in quick panoramic succession, composed of artistic groupings of little children, made beautiful pictures, which will live long in the memory of many who saw them. The Sunday-school, in its various departments, under the sustained superintendence of Miss Margaret B. Barnard and Miss Alice Dockham, is doing a work which promises to make it a strong right arm of the church.

Resolved, That this parish wishes to put on record its deepest sympathy with the people of Armenia of Asiatic Turkey, who are deprived of all the conditions of life which are held most dear by all civilized people, and which are held especially dear by all Americans.

Resolved, That this parish is also in heartiest sympathy with the various movements which are now being made in behalf of the Armenians by the friends of humanity everywhere. This parish is especially in accord with the petitions which are being sent to the Secretary of State of the United States, praying that the government of the United States of America use its influence in the manner that may seem to it most efficient and proper to secure, first, a thorough and trustworthy investigation of all the circumstances pertaining to the Sassoun massacre, if the present investigation should prove unsatisfactory; second, suitable protection for life and property for Armenians from the Kurds and Circassians; and, third, administrative reforms by which non-Moslem inhabitants of Turkey may be assured of equal rights and privileges in the courts of just taxation, and encouragement in agriculture and all productive industries.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the minister and assessors of this parish, be sent to Secretary Gresham, and to the British ambassador at Washington, requesting him to transmit them to the foreign office of his government in London.

These resolutions were passed by a unanimous standing vote. Walter F. Greenman, Minister. F. F. Woodward, Charles E. Ware, James F. D. Garfield, Assessors of the First Parish.

JAPAN.—Extracts from the Japan Mail, published in Tokyo, Japan: "A good many changes have taken place in the religious world of Japan, observes the Waseda Bunkaku, in the latter half of 1894. In the first place, as already noted, Buddhism and Christianity appear to be gradually approaching each other in some respects, as indicated by the movements of the Unitarian sect of Christians and the so-called progressive section of Buddhists. The views of the former are embodied in its organ, the Shukyo; and those of the latter, in the Bukkyo. Both sections believe in the compatibility of faith and reason, and aspire to found their religions on the firm basis of rationalism; and both aim at reconciling their creeds to the rationalistic ideas of the generation. The notion that Christianity can be adapted to the Japanese, and that it is not inconsistent with the principle of nationality, has set up a barrier between the Christian pastors of advanced views and those of orthodox principles. In the same way the Buddhists of original and progressive spirit declare that the teachings of Gautama are not pessimistic, but embody the principle of activity. The present war with China, and the victories achieved by the Japanese, have, strange to say, given a practical impetus to these views of Christians and Buddhists. We may also note what the Kokumin-no-Tomo (the Nation's Friend) has to say about the latest work of Mr. Yokoi Tokio, a prominent Japanese Christian. The book is entitled 'The Problem of Christianity in Japan.' The first half, remarks the Tokyo journal, treats of the history of Christianity in Japan, while in the second part the writer gives his views upon that religion. He strongly denounces the old theology. About three years ago Mr. Kanamori Tsurin published a pamphlet called 'The Present and Future of Christianity in Japan.' His advanced views startled the majority of Japanese Christians, and the work met with loud disapproval. Mr. Yokoi goes a step further than Mr. Kanamori. His view is that Christianity should resemble Unitarianism as much as possible. Otherwise it cannot gain a footing as a religion in Japan."

NEW YORK, N.Y.—The fifth monthly meeting of the New York League of Unitarian Women was held at the Lenox Avenue Church, Harlem, on Friday, March 1. The question, "Who are the Heathen?" was the subject for the day, and proved one of the best topics discussed this season. The session opened with the usual business proceedings, followed by the religious news and philanthropic reports. Mrs. Robert H. Davis, secretary of the National Alliance, was called upon for an account of her recent official visit to the Branch Alliances in the State of Maine. This was given in a bright, characteristic speech. Mrs. Davis had discovered an astonishing ignorance about our denominational affairs among intelligent Unitarian women living only short distances from the Unitarian hub, Boston,—notably, one lady, who was unaware of the meaning of the initials, A. U. A. "If our own people are so uninformed, then 'who are the heathen?'" asked Mrs. Davis. Mrs. G. W. Leach of Unity Church, Brooklyn, had for the subject of her paper, "Is the Christian Missionary justified in his efforts to convert the Heathen?" Mrs. Alice May of Flushing, L.I., asked and answered the question, "Is it our duty to spread Civilization rather than Christianity?" After a brief discussion of the papers by Miss Reeve and Mrs. A. Wendell Jackson, Mrs. Fanny B. Williams, a member of Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones's church in Chicago, was called to the platform. She made a womanly appeal, full of pathos, for her race. She said that there seemed no place for the educated, cultivated Negroes, and intimated that in giving encouragement to them might lie one form of missionary work. Mrs. Hooper, in her admirable chairmanship, made a delightful whole of the programme; and after its close there followed the usual social hour.

RICHMOND, ENGLAND.—The society in Richmond, a picturesque and charming suburb of London, are planning to build a suitable church to take the place of Channing Hall, that "tiniest of conventicles, situated in an obscure lane." Rev. Silas Farrington, known to readers of the Register by his letters, has been the minister since 1889. The society has purchased and paid for a freehold site, central in position; and a large part of the money necessary has been already promised.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Rev. Nicholas E. Boyd, chaplain of the Sailors' Home in San Francisco, was ordained in that city on February 10. Dr. Stebbins made the ordaining prayer, and Rev. Edward Payne of Berkeley extended the right hand of fellowship; while Mrs. Eliza T. Wilkes, associate pastor of Mr. Wendte in Oakland, delivered the charge to the new minister. Mr. Boyd graduated from Meadville in 1871, and has preached much in these years, having been always connected more or less with Unitarians.

ST. PAUL, MINN.—The installation of Rev. William R. Lord as minister of Unity Church took place on February 27. The services opened with prayer by Rev. Carleton F. Brown of St. Cloud, followed by Scripture reading by Rev. F. C. Southworth of Duluth. The first address was by Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, who set forth the work of a Unitarian church as the duty to demonstrate the possibility of a vital religion in an atmosphere of perfect intellectual freedom. He referred to his own work in St. Paul as an epoch-making period of his life, and named the traditions of Unity Church as those of fellowship and helpfulness. Letters were read from Rev. John R. Effinger and Rev. W. C. Gannett, former pastors of the church. Rev. Henry M. Simmons of Minneapolis spoke for the Unitarian churches of the State, welcoming him to the oldest church in the conference, not solely in the Unitarian name, but as one who believes that beneath all sectarianism there is common humanity. Rev. Edward P. Ingersoll, D.D., of the Park Congregational Church welcomed the new pastor to the city, emphasizing their unity in purpose and aim. Mr. Estabrook, chairman of the board of trustees, gave the last address of welcome, outlining the history of the church since its founding in 1872. Mr. Lord's response was brief, but earnest. After expressing his personal gratitude for the good will manifested toward him, he added his word of conviction that they together, minister and congregation, stood for religion in its broadest, deepest sense: "Why have we a Unitarian Church? What do we stand for? These questions can be answered in one word, 'religion.' Beneath every true character, whether of a person or society, there must be religion; underlying every life must be the divine spirit of love. Divine love is all inclusive and comprehensive. If Dr. Ingersoll had not come here to extend the hand of fellowship to-night, while I could not have demanded it, I should have insisted that we stand for Christian religion. We labor for the new heaven and the new earth. I am glad to feel the heart of the sister churches through these representations. They call us 'liberal.' Alas that in their minds, and too often in ours, that word has so narrow a meaning! It ought to be a prima facie truth that, unless liberal thought can produce a larger life, it is not worthy to exist. If we go forth to battle with light accoutrements of creed, it is only that we may fight better. In a suburb of Boston are two churches working out God's great law of the survival of the fittest,—a Unitarian and a Roman Catholic church. There is a struggle for supremacy, even for the possession of the ground. And I say to you that that church will survive that has the most love. Though it carry all the superstition of the Middle Ages, it is going to triumph. Let us be very sure that, as we go forth to battle, no one shall find fault with us because we love less than those who believe more of things that we consider unworthy of belief."

At the close of the meeting there was a reception for Mr. and Mrs. Lord in the church parlors.

TROY, N.Y.—The success of the Children's Neighborhood Library established by the Unitarian church has been remarkable. The library was opened in a small room of the church building on March 23, 1894, and kept open only one hour and a half each day, until the second week in September, when it hired a regular librarian, and kept open four hours each week-day. The circulation up to the present is 4,601. 811 children have made use of the library. The room is well patronized as a reading-room, and about one hundred a week are now reading papers and magazines in the library during the evening hours.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—A largely attended meeting of the New England Associate Alliance was held in the Jamaica Plain Unitarian church Wednesday, February 27. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells presided. The president of the Jamaica Plain Branch extended a brief but cordial welcome to the guests. Mrs. S. C. Beach of Bangor, Me., spoke of the work of the Alliance in Sunday-school. She suggested having at least one meeting a year devoted to this subject, and thought that co-operation of parents and teachers was the pressing need. Rev. Edward A. Horton suggested that the Alliance distinguish itself by raising money to publish a "Liberal Commentary on the Bible," which is much needed. The Sunday-school should be a supplementary force to the public school, home, citizenship, and church. It needs conveniences for study, and a few paid teachers. Enforce the fact that it is the one place to establish a spirit of brotherhood. Miss Wistar, a great-granddaughter of Channing, spoke a few words from the teacher's point of view. Make the child realize his own responsibility to duty, and then the beauty and truth of the Unitarian idea. Mr. Ellis Peterson, who has been for many years connected with the Boston public schools, read an able paper on "Work Common to Public and Sunday-schools." The distinguishing object of the Sunday-school is religious instruction; of the public school, intellectual training. But the latter may instil morality and love of country. Rev. Charles F. Dole next spoke of the main purpose of Sunday-school work. It is to equip the children with an earnest purpose. There is not so much in surroundings as in a group of teachers possessed of noble aims.

Luncheon was eaten in the beautiful parish house, the ladies of the parish serving tea and coffee. In the afternoon Miss Emily G. Balch of Jamaica Plain read a paper on "The Relation of the Public to Strikes." Thinkers and workmen are both struggling for juster and more ethical industrial conditions. It is the duty of the public to inform itself as to the significance of the labor movement, and to make its weight felt in favor of the recognition of unions by employers and of peaceful methods of settling labor disputes. Prof. Edward Cummings of Harvard talked earnestly and convincingly on "Strikes and their Remedies." He spoke of the circumstances that have brought about the present conditions of the labor question. Co-operation, profit-sharing, organization, or trades-unionism and arbitration are the various remedies proposed. There was some friendly discussion following the afternoon speeches, in which Mrs. Wells and Mrs. Hale took part. The singing of the doxology closed a pleasant and profitable day.

Mary E. Velasco, Secretary Jamaica Plain Branch.

THE HISTORICAL ARGUMENT AGAINST RITUAL.*

BY F. A. CHRISTIE.

Invited to express my convictions as to the propriety of adopting a stated ritual, I beg leave to consider chiefly an objection which I have myself felt and have heard from others. If the objections are weakened, we are then free to pay heed to any claims of a positive advantage to be obtained by an accommodation of our forms of worship to those of our Episcopalian friends. There is a reluctance to change which is not mere inertia, although the reluctance may be confirmed by the conservative instinct which belongs to us all. I recall a gentleman in Salem who protested against the proposal of a ritual as an act of treason against the forefathers who abandoned England for Massachusetts "in order to be rid of that sort of thing." As a general rule for action, this may be somewhat humorous in a Unitarian; but we may use it as the Salem way of expressing a principle. It was, doubtless, meant as a protest against all that tends to a false conception of worship,—against the sacerdotal and sacramental definition of serving God. It veils the evangelical and apostolic and Reformation thought, that the true worship of God is the offering of our lives as a living sacrifice,—the life of active, brotherly love; the triumph over temptations to evil; and the quiet, personal dedication of will and thought to the divine Perfection. Such, surely, is the worship which in the Fourth Gospel is distinguished from all temple rituals as a worship in spirit and in truth. There is a fear that this truth about worship is to be compromised if we engage to "joyne in Book Prayers," as Cotton phrased it from Boston. There is a fear that this is but a step to the revival of a magical conception of religious worship. I consider it of first importance that we should be able to dismiss this fear from our effort to encourage a more beautiful and churchly usage in our meetings for the expression and refreshment of the mood of religion.

The alliance in history of stated and regular modes of worship of an elaborate character with a theurgic and magical idea of cultus is at first glance somewhat alarming. As the free enthusiasm of spiritual energy in the early Christians passed into the dramatic and imposing Catholic ritual, there is a coincident development of magical efficacy in the acts performed, and of supernatural character in the priest who acts. There is not only a change from the Christianity which was a spirit into the Christianity which was a dogma, but also a transition to superstitious formalism, to the adoption of the old pagan idolatry and pagan theurgy. In our own century, too, we have seen an enrichment of the Anglican service coinciding with a revival of the sacramental view of access to divine help. This fact, which cannot but sadden all who have cherished hopes of a speedy and universal victory of reason in religion, has brought the very word "ritual" into discredit. In our own fellowship Mr. Tunis has somewhat compromised our enthusiasms by his insistence upon the idea of sacrifice, while the new Book of Prayer and Praise has revived the association of book prayers and sacramentalism by the prominence given to traditional conceptions of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Certainly, the language furnished in these forms for the sacraments is not intended to be the vehicle of the old ideas; but the accommodation made to old conceptions requires so constant an effort to reinterpret, and echoes so much of the ecclesiasticism which we have put away, that one cannot easily wonder at the suspensions felt of its inherent dangers. For most of us the value of the book is in the services for morning and evening prayer and praise, and it is my special object to point out the great difference between such stated services and anything likely to become a sacramental and theurgic worship.

Those who have expressed apprehensions have appealed to history. To history, then, we also make our appeal. We assert that the theurgic character of Catholic worship came not by the use of book prayers or a regard for the æsthetic beauty of holiness, but chiefly by the sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist. There are the best of grounds for thinking that Baptism had from the outset a perverting effect upon the Christianity which was spirit and truth, and there are the best of grounds for believing that the rite does not come from Jesus himself. As for the Eucharist, I am unable to accept the recent theory of Gardiner that it, too, was an apostolic innovation suggested by the holy meal of the Greek mysteries; and in the early form and significance of this observance one finds a spiritual beauty and utility that can only evoke admiration. But Christianity and its usages were very soon affected by a general process in the world wider than itself. The old view that our religion was the only vital element planted in an exhausted world has been abandoned. Christianity seems rather to have won in the competitions of a religious revival. The pagan cults, local or national, were tending to universalism and unity, and in that process were increasing steadily in power and fervor. All the world was drifting to a supernatural and superstitious view of religion and its blessings. The façade of St. Peter's in Rome was built in 1618 on the site of numerous altars erected in the last half of the fourth century for the sacrifices of the taurobolium. There on the hill of the Vatican, in front of the new basilica of St. Peter, the aristocracy of Rome obtained the mystic rite which should make them to be born again for the eternal life. [G. Bois-sier, "La Fin du Paganisme," ii. 236.] From the universal tendency to sacramentalism which this fact typifies Christianity itself could not escape. A principle of spiritual life, as Hegel tells us, can prevail over its antagonist only by assimilating it; and there were no forces active to protect Christianity from this kind of victorious defeat. In the early centuries the theoretic reason was making no real advance. The cultured pagan came into Christianity for rational satisfaction; but the answer which the Church made to reason was becoming more and more a rigid formula, and the further indulgence of reason was not looked upon with favor. Both cultured and unlearned, moreover, brought with them the associations of ideas fostered by their old cults and mysteries; and thus all the influences within and without the Church tended to the treatment of worship as a series of acts endowed with magical efficacy.

Now, it is a striking and interesting fact that the general form of church worship in which we are interested antedated this unhappy change, and must be held apart from it in the judgments which we make. From the very earliest time we seem to find the Christian consciousness expressing itself in liturgical forms, which we still hold in esteem. Even the New Testament offers us salutations and benedictions that are liturgic, and possibly contain other brief formulæ. The lyrical prayers of praise (Psalmoi, 1 Cor. xiv. 26) which were the outcome of tense spiritual moods entered at once into tradition, and are preserved in part in the Revelation of John and the Gospel according to Luke. Here are the "Magnificat," the "Benedictus," the "Nunc Dimittis"; and these seem to have become stated hymns of church worship. In 112 the Bithynian Christians are found chanting an antiphonal hymn at sunrise on the Lord's Day. Similarly, the earliest Christians felt no incongruity in combining free and written prayer. Clement of Rome, at the end of the first century, uses a formula of the Roman Church; and the Didache prescribes the exact form of the thanksgiving at the Lord's Supper. It is perhaps to the second century that we may trace the brief responsive prayers like the "Sursum Corda" and the beginnings of the "Gloria in Excelsis" and the "Te Deum."

It seems clear that even in the first century following the death of Jesus, when there was as yet no marked exhibition of the perverted thought of worship, when Christianity still defined the worship of God in contrast to pagan cults as a true life of imitation of a divine ideal; in that early undogmatic period, when spontaneity and inspiration had not yet yielded to cool reflection,—even then the use of composed prayers and stated chants was a natural and fitting expression of the Christian spirit. The early worship was partially liturgic without any association with magic.

The evil which we deplore became possible when the Lord's Supper was placed in this morning order of worship. The cultus became theurgic action through the influence of the sacrament. If this thesis be correct, it ought to appear that an order of common prayer and praise need not transform the rational idea of worship where it is not associated with the sacraments. Our present order of congregational worship and the Episcopalian "Order of Morning Prayer" correspond to the service which preceded the celebration of the Eucharist, and which was called the "Mass of the Catechumens." It contained Scripture lessons, Psalms, sermon, prayers,—the elements, that is, which were the expression of the Christianity which was spirit. This was the type of public morning worship even in the time of Clement of Alexandria, and Clement offers us still a most rational and spiritual conception of worship. This type of worship was, however, soon overshadowed by the second morning service, the Eucharist, no longer, as once, a thanksgiving for new moral life and knowledge through Jesus (Didache, ix.), but a mystic rite of supernatural efficacy. At this point it is of interest to see that congregations became indifferent to the service of edification, the mass of the catechumens. Origen complains that the people in Cæsarea were irreverent and inattentive, gathering for gossip in the rear of the church, the women chatting noisily about their children, their spinning, their house-keeping. Not so, we may be sure, in that solemn after service, addressed not to thought, but to marvel, when heaven and earth met in the sacrificial ritual of the Eucharist. It needs but little learning to declare that the transformation of the true idea of worship as a life of obedience and aspiration into a ceremony which aimed at more than ethical revival and enlargement came to pass wholly through this overpowering second division of the morning service. It was there that the limitation of salvation to saving rites was uttered. There only the baptized might be admitted. There was heard the language of a sacramental food conferring immortality. There, chiefly, was the supernatural power of the priest exercised. Had the Church lived without its rites of Baptism and the Holy Supper, or had it been able to preserve that supper as part of a social meal free from any assimilation to the holy meal of the pagan mysteries, then I can see no reason why the order of morning worship should have taken on a character that antagonizes the rational thought of serving God by the expression of character.

In the Anglican revival of our own day the same thing appears. It was not the beautiful "Order of Morning Prayer" that tended to reproduce the pagan idea of worship. It was the insistence upon the sacraments, upon the dogmas they involve, and the priestly authority that they represent. "We, the old Tractarians, refrained from innovating in externals," said Pusey. Shrinking alike from evangelicalism and the inroads of reason in religion, Pusey and Newman sought to revive Catholic dogma, and left it to their successors to revive Catholic ritual as a consequence of the dogma. The Anglicans thus were not interested in ritual for edification, but in ritual as the life of a sacerdotal church. Fasting and celibacy seem to have been more important in the beginning than spiritual quickening through responsive expressions of aspiration and resolve. And, as a necessary step to the end in view, reason was ruled out of court. The sacerdotal magic was revived quite as much through the control of ministerial education as through the snares of a more elaborate ritualism. On the other hand, other high sacramentalists have been largely delivered from these tendencies, not by abandoning a prescribed and stated ritual, but by the vigorous application of human reason to the history of the Christian religion.

As if to confirm this view of the matter, the churches which we call high show, just as in Origen's day, a neglect of the "Mass of the Catechumens." I have attended a service of morning prayer divested of music, divested of reverence, divested almost of participants; a service interrupted by noise and disorder, and obviously conducted only in order to obey the rubrics and to exalt, by disparagement of that which appealed to the mind, that which a half-hour later was addressed in splendid and imposing ceremonial to the senses,—the mystery of the blessed Eucharist. For that the priests were robed and decorous. For that the altar blazed with light. For that the clouds of incense rose and the great organ pealed its music. The corrupting element in all this is the dogma of sacramental access to God, and that would corrupt even the minimum of ritualism. Where the ritual was the same for all, let us hear the judgment of Thomas Mozley ("Reminiscences," ii. 338): "Many who profess the 'low' view—that is, the purely emblematic sense—are the most reverential, and apparently the most deeply impressed and edified; while it is lamentable to notice how communicants professing the 'high' view can immediately betray, by their frivolity and their worldliness, how little hold it has on them." Surely, the ritual which expresses the Catholic dogma is no argument against a recourse to the despised "Order of Morning Prayer" for elements of the model by which we would shape our meeting for quickening and edification and refreshment. Nothing there need conflict with the Pauline principle, "all things for edification." If we wish to protest against magic in religion, let us protest against the rites which cannot easily be kept from degenerating into sacraments.

Congregational usage and the service of the Book of Common Prayer utter the same spirit and conform to one general type. The first is often as tyrannously formal as the second. The Episcopalian usage, however, has shown a superior power to attract men to church attendance; and there is a wide-spread movement in all churches to adopt elements of it without relinquishing freedom and variety. That Episcopalian churches are constantly making converts among our young people is well known to all. What is it that converts them? Is it the sacramental doctrine? Surely not, if one may judge by the constant rebukes and appeals from the clergy with regard to partaking of Holy Communion. Mozley laments over the contrast between Anglicanism in its high altitudes and the enthusiasm of the early Church (ii. 337): "In these days what a work it is! What canvassing around, what entreaties, what urgent and reiterated reminders! Yet how scant, how precarious are the results!" It is, we may be sure, from an analysis of our own leanings, partly the satisfaction of emotions uttered in kneeling together in common prayer, partly the beauty and attractiveness, the dignity and restfulness, never imperilled by the minister's lapses from taste or nobility or whole-heartedness,—it is these things that convert us. But, then, our children grow up afterward under sacerdotal influences into irrational views of religion, and readily believe that pure worship and undefiled is possible only in the church which is founded upon the sacraments and the episcopate, which gets its meaning from the sacraments. The clergy, not the ancient "Order of Common Prayer," wields this influence; and back of the clergy is the theological school, which is closed to the scientific spirit by the tyranny of the sacramental constitution of the Church. Among the clergy there are, doubtless, many who join in the ritualistic movement from purely æsthetic interests. Such a one declared once that the need of the Episcopalian Church was High Church services and rationalistic theology. Such a man is helpless in an effort to support a Broad Church movement in theology from the very sacramental constitution of the Church. The converts from among us begin with liberal views, seeking in the Book of Prayer not its survivals of old doctrine, but its actual spiritual help. Nor can I believe that there is anything perverting in the beauty and dignity of this wonted and familiar prayer, in the carefully guarded style and richness of the music, in the fitness and elevation of churchly architecture. The evil is seated in forms that have almost lapsed from our spontaneous loyalty, and which no desire for church unity should make us willing to artificially restore. These rites may be wholly abandoned if we think them too deeply imbedded in age-long error to be safe. They may also be transformed until they can no more entail evil than the friendly hand-clasp or the morning's smile of greeting for the day. Some acted form of admission to the church is fitting; but we should protest against everything that suggests a washing and purifying efficacy in the act, and against the beautiful Pauline fusion of soul and sense which identifies the putting on of Christ with the outward ceremony. I, for one, am ready to see the Lord's Supper preserved, but only on condition that we revert to the early freedom for which the commemoration of Jesus was everything and the elements were nothing,—the freedom that could use fish as well as bread, and water as well as wine. And, on the other hand, I am so much impressed with the treachery of symbolic action and the tyranny of a rite that I should feel no loss if our only observance were a Good Friday meditation on the meaning of sacrifice as taught by Jesus in his life and death. By the broken loaf and the poured out wine Jesus imaged blessing in death. That faith has so permeated every common utterance of Christian worship and belief as to be ready now to dispense with a visible symbol.

Such considerations may help to leave unclouded the question of an improvement and enrichment by elements of ritual our daily forms of veneration and prayer and resolve.

THE TUSKEGEE CONFERENCE.

BY REV. PITT DILLINGHAM.

Weather and roads permitting. In this case the weather was fair, but the roads were heavy. Heavy roads in Alabama just now mean that it took a man on muleback from 9 A.M. till 7 P.M. yesterday to come twenty-five miles to this conference, and the fact that he did come means that the conference was a success in point of numbers. Others came, too, over similar roads; and the Institute's assembly-room was solidly filled with the farmers and their wives. Then, again, the representation was satisfactorily wide,—wider than in any previous year, not only covering many counties of Alabama, but the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, and South Carolina. The Tuskegee Negro Conference, as the reader probably knows, is made up of two conferences,—the farmers' and the workers' or teachers' conference. This is the farmers' conference, the original one, and much the more important of the two, opening on this Wednesday morning, February 20, at nine o'clock. We have as introduction two opening talks,—one from Booker T. Washington, in his usual straight-out-from-the-shoulder style; and one from Reuben Green, a typical self-made Negro farmer. "Let us attend," says Mr. Washington, "to the matters we can remedy. Let other hardships and wrongs go. Take the things at the door, which are in our power. Human nature is the same thing everywhere: its prejudices are not open to reason. I was once a Baptist, sincerely convinced that no Methodist could go to heaven. No reasoning, but only an object-lesson changed my mind,—contact with decent Methodist men and women. So it is with this white woman brought up to believe in the inferiority of the black man. Abuse of her won't take out the prejudice. But plant an object-lesson under her nose. Let an educated colored man build a three-room house; let his wife get a carpet on the floor, and by and by a few pictures on the wall and some flowers in the garden; let everything inside and outside that house be clean, neat, and attractive. By and by there will be talk over the gate, and later on inside the gate, especially if the husband raises forty bushels of corn to the acre, and his cows give three or four gallons of good milk a day instead of the two gallons a day his neighbor gets. In short, we must have object-lessons, not reasoning. 'I am as good as you are,' won't do. This white woman knows at least one black man, one black woman, with whom she can discuss matters of common interest, and who attack her prejudice with something besides 'power of mouth.'"

At this point Mr. Washington begged the farmers not to try at big speeches or long ones, but give short fireside talk about debts, etc. "Above all," he said, "don't gloss: call a spade a spade."

After the organization of the conference (done in about one minute by the re-election of the old officers and committees), and while waiting for the report of the Committee on Declarations, Mr. Reuben Green of Macon County was called upon for a talk.

I cannot undertake to do justice to either the force or the wit of it. It continually "brought down the house," and was after Mr. Washington's own heart, being straight from the shoulder and solid with the experience of a self-made Negro farmer.

"I began without a meat-skin, and then climbed high enough to own a horse and wagon; but I 'rid' too much,—went to too many camp-meetings, etc.,—and got into want again. I then told God and all his angels that, if he gie me one mo' chance, I'd do better. An' he did. He gie me his command to work six days in the week. That's the other side of the Sabbath law. Some of you forgot. Try it, brother. Doan complain, but work. Might's well tell the truth. God'll do his part, if you'll do yours. But you can't git a nigger to work from Monday to Saturday, an' he knows just about as much about food-raisin' as a rabbit does about a sifter. Tain't the merchant's fault whet yo' git with yo'r mortgage. Yo' gits Jew's-harps, and calica, cloacks, and a brass ring, an' a red ribbon; and yo' hire a mule to go to camp-meetin'. Stay at home from camp-meetin' tell yo' own yo'r own mule to go on. A man an' 's wife has got to pull together. Control yo'r wants. Some of dese colored men doan take advice. If I've a white papa colla' on, he thinks I've got a big head, an' he won't believe me; but I tell yo' I doan go sneakin' up to the doo' o' the store any mo,' an' askin' fo' a leetle flour fo' my ole lady. I stan' up straight, an' I say I want a heap o' flour. Some o' yo' men's too narrow-hearted. Sow more, and sell it. Las' spring I sowed for one thousand bushels of corn; and, in spite of the drought, I got five hundred bushels. Der man with a leetle one-room cabin he's got a leetle cow-pen an' a leetle corn-crib, an' he's a leetle man. Sit down an' trust God, an' yo'll die. Go to work an' trust him, an' yo'll live. God ain't going to work fo' yo' to save yo' lives. He's given me everything on my place now 'cause I didn't set down; an' I owns everythin', even to the birds an' snakes."

It is needless to add that Mr. Reuben Green has eighty acres of land paid for, plenty of mules and horses, and lives in something besides a one-room cabin. All because, as he said, he made up his mind to come to the top.

At this point a report came from Lee County,—"some homes," "no saving," "all in debt," "wages from $4 to $6 a month"; yet one woman in Lee County raised nine hundred pounds of meat last year, and three hundred chickens. There followed a man who claimed that farmers were made especially by God, although the farmers don't know it. It is time people were "looking up to the farmers": they are the "grain people." But the Negro won't stop on cotton till he has to. Feed yourself on 2½ cents a day, widen your grain field. The mortgage is death and hell.

Stephen P. Porter, representing South Carolina, said: "We raise corn, peas, cotton, potatoes, and rice. It takes all these to make us a people. We haven't much money: money is very scarce. But we are getting many homes. Within a radius of twenty-five miles of my home there are one hundred who own their homes. This is because Mrs. Steele of the Orphans' Home, Chattanooga, bought a large tract of land, which she has cut up into small lots of from three to twelve acres, and sold to us at $5 an acre, with timber enough standing to pay for the land." As a result of this, Mr. Porter reports that morals for the last eight years are growing better. The Negroes don't get into the jail or penitentiary as they used to. There is less drinking, there are better churches. "My nation needs education, food-products, and a home." At this point the Committee on Declarations introduced the report which follows:—

DECLARATIONS OF THE FOURTH ANNUAL TUSKEGEE NEGRO CONFERENCE, HELD AT TUSKEGEE, ALA., FEB. 20, 1895.

Four sessions of the Tuskegee Negro Conference have made clear their wisdom. They give the masses a day in school under most inspiring influences. Education, property, character, and how to cure the evils that lie in our power to remedy, are the subjects discussed.

1. The seriousness of our condition lies in that, in the States where the colored people are most numerous, at least 90 per cent. of them are in the country. They are difficult to reach, and but little is being done for them. Their industrial, educational, and moral condition is slowly improving; but among the masses there is still a great amount of poverty and ignorance, and much need of moral and religious training.

2. We urge all to buy land, and to cultivate it thoroughly; to raise more food supplies; to build houses with more than one room; to tax ourselves to build better school-houses, and to extend the term to at least six months; give more attention to the character and welfare of our leaders, especially ministers and teachers; to keep out of debt; to avoid lawsuits; to treat our women better; and that conferences similar in aim to this one be held in every community where practicable.

3. More can be accomplished by going forward than by complaining. With all our disadvantages, nowhere is there afforded us such business opportunities as are offered in the South. We would discourage the emigration agent. Self-respect will bring us many rights now denied us. Crime among us decreases as property increases.

Where the people are reached by this and similar conferences, and their earnest efforts, their improvement is marked. They are less in debt, have better houses and schools, and, in spite of the very hard times, have more home supplies. We believe these conferences afford one of the quickest and most economical ways of reaching large numbers of the people, and of helping them to help themselves.

Mr. Washington now called for testimony as to the value of the conferences. Said one man: "Why, even the cows profit by it. They don't look so much like quilting-frames. We are all wriggling under the mortgage, and you are helping us out." There followed a picture of the working of the mortgage and the waive note together, the waive note representing the last degree of power to eat up a man's house and home.

The mortgage took one thing, and the waive note another. At last the mortgage, fairly beaten in the race, looked in the cabin door; and there "sot the waive note sopping out a plate."

The next man said that in Section 29 of his county, as a result of the conference, some four thousand acres of land had been acquired in the last four years. Mr. Petersen of Elmore County wished all to remember that there were places where you can't buy land. Near him they had petitioned the merchants for permission to plant food things without success. "Finally," he said, "I done forgot I live on a white man's plantation. I kep' one eye shut and one on this conference, and planted a lot of corn. I'm better off, an' going to be still better off in the time to come."

Report from Lee County said 2,300 acres of land had been purchased in the last four years, a large estate broken up, not all paid for yet, but is being paid for.

Mr. Williams of Mississippi said that eight years ago his brother and himself bought 50 acres on credit apiece; then another 100; then 1,400 acres, which they sold in 100-acre lots to 14 Negroes on 5 years' time; then, later on, 3,000 acres, which they sold to the colored people again. He said, "We own one steam-gin, a horse-power gin, and don't owe a dollar." They hired a lawyer to help in the sale of the lots.

At this point the crucial question of the conference was brought to the front,—the question stated in the first article of the declarations; namely, the condition of the masses of the Negroes living in the country. Two things were agreed upon: there had been a gain, but the condition was a very sad one. Particular stress, in Mr. Washington's question, was put upon the moral condition of the country people. One man replied, "Twenty degrees below zero." Father Mitchell said he would "thank his Redeemer to send a little morals to his people." Some of the elders present endeavored to break the force of these and similar statements, but were unsuccessful; and it would appear, indeed, that the elders are chief cause of the difficulty. They are like some other people, perhaps, in other sections of the country, who draw their salaries, and say nothing of the sins of the community.

By the conference as a whole the plantation Negro was declared to be sadly off for character in the majority of cases,—unreliable, not keeping his word, not paying his debts, as agreed upon.

After an hour's intermission for dinner the discussion or testimony was resumed at 2.30 P.M., and the second article of the committee's report was taken up,—the question of remedies; the question, in particular, of how far the ownership of land and home had improved the character of the people. Mr. Adams of Colder Station remarked frankly that he knew something about himself on that point,—"Since I own from forty to eighty acres, I keeps my own word better." There followed a great variety of testimony, quite unanimous, that property added to a man's self-respect and gained the respect of both his colored and white neighbors. One remarks, "A man can borrow better"; another says, "I sleeps better if I knows my neighbor owns his

FOLDING CRIB.

Some one asked an Englishman if he was fond of fish-balls. He replied that he really couldn't say, he never had attended one.

It is the same dilemma which troubles you as you glance at this picture. Here is a novelty. No one has ever seen a Folding Crib before. You really can't judge it unless you attend the store and see it in operation.

But then you will be no longer in doubt. It is one of the most charming Cribbs that ever was devised. It is a half-tester, or Arabian pattern; and it is equipped with our latest Safety Folding Mechanism. When not in use, it does not project over 25 inches from the wall.

The frame is of tubular iron, very light, but strong. It is finished in soft Ivory White, with complete trimmings of burnished brass. The tester rail is equipped with rings, to which the curtains can easily be attached.

The new Crib is a beauty in its artistic design and decoration. The engraving shows it open and closed. It is not at all expensive.

own house and land." Says Mr. E.: "The Negro won't build any better cabin tell he owns the land. The most reliable people in my neighborhood owns something. One colored man near me owns one thousand acres." Said a man from Mount Meigs: "Five, ten, or one hundred acres makes a man 'hedge himself around with a little homestead law.' His neighbor must respect this if he comes in his cabin. I have a four-roomed house," he says, "and can 'comfortably situate for a little crowd.' Since I got my land, I am a right-sized little man in my own mind." There followed a friend who confessed that he was very slow. "Never could learn nothing," he says, "but twelve children, ten boys and two girls; but I bought land, an' a man with a slow head can get on if he owns land. I now have two hundred and seventy acres, run five ploughs, my house cost me $400, I raises a plenty, eats a plenty, and never does something for nothing. 'Brethren, git out o' de ashes'"; that is, the one-room cabin. The next man stated that he married at fourteen, and had fifteen children. "My wife is the best woman in the world," he says, "an' my only one. I have five rooms in my cabin." Butler County produced a man with seventeen children, living in a six-room house, fortunately, and owning one hundred and sixty acres of land. The testimony was very strong as to the demoralizing effect of the one-roomed cabin.

Next on the programme, testimony as to length of school time. In no case was it reported that the public money furnished more than three months of schooling; but in all but two or three instances in the eighteen districts reported the people added two and three, and in one case six months, to what they called the length of the government school. Negroes were urged to pay their poll tax, and in this way extend their school term, as the poll tax money all goes to this purpose.

Testimony as to preachers and teachers showed need enough, but indicated some gains—in teachers who could themselves read and write, and in preachers who do something besides shouting on Sunday and setting a bad example during the rest of the week.

As to lawsuits, our friend Mr. Reuben Green got on to his feet again and summed the matter up. "There are plenty of people," he says, "quick to fly off the hilt. No gentleman will insult me, however. Let all the other kind o' men go."

As to starting local conferences among the farmers, one man reported a new conference started, representing eight towns from two counties; and Father Mitchell appeared once more, saying that he was going off on "that business," of starting conferences,— "will go 'round more heavy."

The next section in the committee's report, on "going forward and not complaining," so evidently represented the spirit of the conference that no time was wasted in discussing it.

On the matter of "business opportunities in the South" Mr. Beverley of Montgomery—a graduate of Brown University, by the way—declared that small capital could still do something in the South. Small suburban stores were better paying in the South than in the North. Push, politeness, and good sense, and a little capital were all that was needed. The colored man in the South has a fair chance over the counter, let his opinions be as you please, if only he is "genteel." Again, it was said there was no chance for colored mechanics in the North; but in the South he can work side by side with the white man. The first forge in a large blacksmith's shop in Atlanta is run by a Negro. It was remarked with a smile that the Southern white man did not like work anyway, so there was a chance for the industrious Negro, provided, like Northern people, he traded on merit, and not on sympathy.

The last subject of discussion was, "Shall we discourage the Emigration Agent?" One man, in particular, referred to the Africa craze of last year, told of some one who lost $400 through one of the agents,— in short, got "into the suds"; and he added, "We're here, an' here to stay until Gabriel toots his trumpet in the morning. Just now," he said, "Mexico was the cry. Families have been separated. Some Negroes who had gone into Mississippi expected to step from the top of a cotton-tree into heaven, and landed in slavery. They didn't own their heads. I'll have none of it in mine. When a man wants to find a good place, he can make it right about him: when we use our muscle and brain where we are, growling will cease." Still another man said he had immigrated to this conference; and he should immigrate back to his cabin, because there was something to draw him. Where there was no property, there was no interest; and a man didn't stick nowhere. "But in my case," he says, "de mammy an' de chil'ren have a nice place to sleep in. An' I'se goin' to raise all de peas an' corn I kin for Lucy Ann to bake."

The question was now upon the adoption of the report of the committee. With a slight modification, the declarations were unanimously adopted. The concluding word was then spoken by Mr. Simpson (his father a former slave-owner), a white man of property, coming from Snow Hill, Ala. Mr. Simpson took the platform, and quietly remarked that he was one of those men who owned land and rented it to many Negro tenants. He was one of those merchants who held many mortgages; but he had listened with approval to all that he had heard in the conference, and heartily indorsed its aims and methods. Mr. Simpson declared that it was a Tuskegee student who first roused his interest in the colored race. In his own county he had been watching the Negroes for several years. The Negro has improved. He has better teachers and ministers. God is working out a great problem. The two races are being taught to respect each other, to do away with prejudice. This is religion. The man who knows God and is true to his God will be true to his brother, whether black or white. The Negro is a large factor in all the interests of this section of the country, and must be treated as such. "If I have a cabin in my back yard," he says, "and will have nothing to do with it, a little later on, perhaps, my boy will be lost through that cabin. It is only what I deserve. God can teach us in no other way that we are members one of another. Let me conclude by saying that Tuskegee has been a great blessing to this State. The graduates of Tuskegee on my land show what it is doing."

So ended the farmers' conference of 1895, with its six hundred in attendance, including one hundred and eleven women and twenty-nine ministers. How the presiding officer managed to steer that conference as he did is a mystery to some of us. It is safe to say that he got more out of it than any other man could have. More or less of rambling and repetition there was, of course; and at times there was an approach to heated differences on trifles. But, on the whole, an important body of testimony was called out; and the conference proved to be a "day's school" indeed for the farmers and their wives, enlightening and inspiring. To visitors who were there for the first time it was a revelation,—a first-hand uncovering of ugly facts, but a still more remarkable showing of the sense the Negro has of the situation, and of his growing ability and determination to meet it.

Literature.

COIT'S "ETHICAL SCRIPTURES."

For the last month I have had on my study table a book published by Macmillan & Co. which aims to be, according to the title given it by Stanton Coit, its compiler, a book of "Ethical Scriptures," although on the outside cover this title is written, "The Message of Man." When I first picked up this book to review, I presumed it to be, like so many others of its class, the dumping together of such compilations and bits of poetry and prose as any literary man in the course of his work naturally gathers together. On a closer examination, it appeared that much care had been exercised in systematically arranging the various extracts, the order chosen being, not that of general headings or divisions, but of chapters having definite meanings, such as, e. g. :—

1. Our commerce, industry, and laws of property are based on selfishness.
2. Judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment.
3. The nation is a link between the individual and the world.
4. Spirits are not finely touched but to fine issues.
5. All good things are ours.

In turning to one of these chapters, I find a unique and valuable method of presenting the various quotations. In the ordinary anthology one extract follows another, much as in the so-called crazy quilt one color is put in a hit-and-miss relation with another, there being no coherency of parts. The mind, consequently, becomes very tired after the perusal of such disjointed sentences, much as it would be after reading a few pages of the dictionary.

Now, Mr. Coit has so logically dove-tailed his various extracts together, so harmoniously blended them into a single whole, that it seems impossible to believe, as one reads along, that he has not before him the thought of a single mind. To show how admirably the work is done, we append a brief part of Chapter XLII. :—

1. When the stag has waxed fat, he hides himself amid the thicket, conscious that his fleetness is impaired, should he be in need to fly. in the same way the human heart which is cumbered with superfluous attachments becomes conscious of its incapacity for the true life of service.
2. There are amusements involving passion and vanity which dissipate the soul; and there are others, only entered upon with simplicity, for recreation and refreshment, while the heart remains steadfast to its secret moorings.
3. Would a man attain to such a point that the outward things should not hinder the inward workings of the soul, that would be indeed, above all, a blessed thing.
4. But, if thou find that the outward work hinders the inward working of the soul, then boldly let it go; and turn thou with all thy might to that which is inward.
5. Ask for a bold spirit, free from all dread of death; that can endure labor, whatever it be; that knows not the passion of anger; that covets nothing.
6. The mind which is free from the bondage of passions is a citadel, for man has nothing more secure to which he can fly for refuge.

There are six or seven authors represented in the short chapter. Where the new thought of each begins a small number is placed. If the reader is curious to dissect the page, let him simply turn to the back of the book; and there he will find a general index. Looking under Chapter VIII., he finds the quotations to be from Mazzini's works, from Tolstoi, Shakspeare ("Macbeth" and "Julius Cæsar"), Job, and others. The book, volume, and number of page are given.

The practical value of the book has come directly home to the reviewer. Needing, as he does, every week a motto for the top of his calendar in harmony with the subject of his sermon, he finds "The Message of Man" the most helpful for the purpose,—not only because the quotations therein found are new and breathing the nineteenth-century spirit, but also because, by a suggestion obtained, he can turn to the original book from which it has been taken, and perhaps there find expanded exactly the thought for which he would otherwise have to search long and diligently.

For the general reader this book has great merit. As he reads, he can easily suppose he has before him but the utterances of a single author, treating in a modern way the great themes of life, while in reality he has the crème de la crème of many. No one writer could give so much that is rich and interesting and of permanent value. As with a composite picture giving the general type of face of a whole class of men, so here this composite gives the type of thought which to-day is pervading Western civilization and gradually moulding mind to higher and more spiritual purposes.

As Others Saw Him.

A Retrospect. A.D. 54. 16mo, $1.25.
A book of remarkable interest, written to show how the Jews of different classes, especially the ruling classes, were impressed by the words and works of Jesus. It purports to be written at Alexandria, about twenty-five years after the Crucifixion, by a Scribe who was in Jerusalem during the public life of Jesus, and was a member of the Council which delivered him to death. The unique interest of the subject, the perfectly reverent spirit of the writer, and the literary charm lend to the book a profound interest.

not mean, of course, that he has had no pleasure in writing except from the money-making; and yet it is something difficult to believe. But that money-making has much to do with it is evident from the way he spins his thread in "The Ralstons," which is a continuation of "Katherine Lauderdale," and which is to be continued in two other volumes, making six in all. The six might have been condensed into two or one. We will not say "easily," because to be diffuse is as natural for Mr. Crawford as his vital breath. He loves to hear his people talk, and he does not like to cut short their conversations. Some of them here are spun out at great length, especially that one which celebrates Katherine's tremendous row with her father. Then the lucubrations about this one and that are long drawn out. We will not say "much longer than they ought"; for they are vastly entertaining,—the talks of the dramatis personæ, and the writer's own. This is a story of the battle for the great Lauderdale fortune, and the end is not yet. There is another will, which has not yet been produced; and we must wait for the next birth of twins—the third instalment of the story—to be informed as to where it has been all this time. In the mean time the isolation of Mr. Crawford's figures impresses us as a defect in his art, especially if he is intending, as we are told, to give us a story of New York life in three generations. He is not a New Yorker. His residence in the city has been very brief; and though, evidently, he is quick at assimilating the color of a new environment, there is little evidence that he has done so in the case of New York. The story transpires in the domestic green-room, and not upon the social stage. Mr. Crawford's large way of talking about money is likely to do more moral injury than any other feature of his book. The Lauderdale fortune amounts to eighty-five millions. It will be remembered that in "Katherine Lauderdale" the rich uncle wanted to give Jack Ralston a check for a million outright, and the young man refused it. Here we have Katherine's father, with a million in the funds, playing poverty, and obliging his wife to paint miniatures for her pin money, and borrowing little sums from her which he never pays. Then we have Jack Ralston and Katherine secretly married because Jack has only $12,000 a year with his mother, and doesn't like to add another to the family lest his mother should be pinched for gloves and cab money. This sort of thing may reflect the standards of "the four hundred," but Jack and Katherine are not supposed to be "subdued to what they work in, like the dyer's hand"; and, anyway, the majority of those who read this book will know that these standards are absurd, and that thousands of families in New York are living on three, four, and five thousand a year, and less money, and enjoying "the best society" the great city has to give with an unchallenged right.

HELEN. By Oswald Valentine, author of "The Passing of a Mood." New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—It is impossible not to wonder if the writer of this story knew clearly what he wished to do. Did he wish to make us happy or to do us good? If the former, he has certainly not succeeded. No one can be happier for reading such a record of unhappiness, over which there is no triumph, from which there is no relief; and it does not seem likely that any one will be benefited, unless possibly some one is deterred from marrying until he has found his proper task, or the "not impossible she" has found a man who will not fool away her means of livelihood without providing something in their place. The hero of the book, if so he can be called, is altogether shiftless, passing from one literary experiment to another, his wife becoming alienated from him more and more as time goes on. Finally, she makes up her mind to leave him; but he resists, and eventually they discover some way of living together. That he is finally successful without any heightening of his ideals, and while treating his life as a burlesque affair, except as it concerns his wife, is not a consummation with which we can be devoutly satisfied; but it is the best that is provided for us here.

PHILOCTETES, AND OTHER POEMS AND SONNETS. By J. E. Nesmith. Cambridge: Printed by the Riverside Press.—The "other poems" are but few. There are four of them, all told; while of the sonnets there are sixty-two. Those who read the first, "Fortune," will not stop there; and, though they will not find all the rest as good as that, they will find in them a remarkable evenness of quality, and a high level maintained throughout, both in the level maintained throughout, both in the thought and in the expression. The poem which names the volume is deserving of the distinction which is accorded it. In it we have Philoctetes, the armor-bearer of Hercules, dying upon Lemnos, his active spirit chafing in captivity. The book throughout is rich in classical allusions, and in phrases which declare how much of classic aliment has passed into the writer's blood. But, with the classic element, there is a romantic strain which is an injury, a certain predilection for strong language. The poem "Philoctetes" does more than name the book. It is typical of its sense of hopeless struggle against fate.

THE DIVERS. By Hume Nisbet. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—This romance of Oceania is written for boys "who like racy stories," and introduces them to the islands of the cocoa palm and the banana, to coral reefs, cannibal savages, and equally dreaded white men. Bloodshed and cruelty, love-making with the natives, and numerous startling adventures make up the sum and substance of the book.

The Magazines.

The New World for March begins the fourth year of this able review of religion, ethics, and theology. These ten articles are contributed by writers in several religious communions, and fifty-five pages of careful book reviews sustain the high reputation of the New World in this field: "The Devil," C. C. Everett; "Race Prejudice," Maurice Bloomfield; "Oliver Wendell Holmes," T. T. Munger; "The God of Zoroaster," L. H. Mills; "The Truth of the Christian Religion," Allan Menzies; "The Preaching of Phillips Brooks," Henry G. Spaulding; "Some of Mr. Kidd's Fallacies," James M. Whiton; "The Origins of the Religion and History of Israel," F. Meinhold; "The Poet in an Age of Science," Charles J. Goodwin; "The Song of the Well," Karl Budde. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., publishers. 75 cents a number, $3 a year.

Literary Notes.

G. P. Putnam's Sons announce for publication early in March in Turkey: "The Armenian Crisis the Massacre of 1894: Its Antecedents and Significance, with a Consideration of Some of the Factors that enter into this Phase of the Eastern Question." By Frederick Davis Greene, M.A. The author, an American, is neither connected with nor representative of any society, political or religious, in issuing this book. He is simply discharging what impresses him as a duty to humanity. After many years of residence in Constantinople, and in the centre of Armenia, during which time he was especially engaged in work to improve the condition of Armenian schools, he was recently compelled to return to this country under the orders of his physician. One especial feature of the volume is the presentation of testimony in regard to the late massacre, much of it entirely new, in the shape of reports from American citizens in Eastern Turkey, who had opportunity of gathering information at first hand. This evidence is certified to by a number of prominent Americans, whose signatures are reproduced in fac-simile; and the evidence establishes beyond question the extent and the appalling character of the recent massacre in Sassoun. The volume will contain twenty illustrations from photographs and a new map of Asiatic Turkey. It is really a handbook on the Eastern question, various phases of which are treated in separate chapters; and its statements are based upon the most trustworthy authorities, and are supported by very full references to these.

why some dealers try to sell, and some painters use, other than genuine brands (see list) of White Lead is that their first cost is less. Quality should be the first consideration, and is the true economy.

"Life-Studies."

The immediate large interest in the two small cloth-bound books of the "Life" series, published during the last quarter of 1894 (each containing four papers), together with the general desire that similar brief essays or "studies" might be had singly in neat periodical form, leads to this monthly issue of Life-Studies.

The two books first issued in the bound series were "As Natural as Life," by Rev. Charles G. Ames, and "In Love with Love," by James H. West, subsequent volumes, uniform in size and general style, being promised from Rev. Dr. E. L. Rexford, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Rev. John W. Chadwick, Rev. Dr. M. D. Shutter, and men of similar power.

Some or all of the writers here named will appear likewise in the present periodical, in a single issue each, while to their papers will be added popular essays or "life-studies" from others among the best and brightest minds of America.

No. 1. By Rev. Marion D. Shutter, D.D. A Wayside Prophet, a unique and brilliant paper.

No. 2. By Rev. Samuel M. Crothers. Making the Best of It, a hopeful and encouraging study.

(Issues to follow.)

No. 3. By William C. Gannett,—one of his characteristic, helpful papers.

No. 4. By Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett,—a suggestive Life-Study (topic to be announced).

No. 5. By Paul Revere Frothingham. Beauty of Character, a forceful paper.

No. 6. By Celia Parker Woolley (topic to be announced).

Annual subscriptions to Life-Studies will be received for 50 cents (ten numbers, published monthly, except during July and August).

Single copy, 6 cents. Ten copies of any single issue, 50 cents. Sample copy free.

*Three annual subscriptions will be received for one dollar (to be sent to one address or each subscription to a different address).

IN CHURCH.

Just in front of my pew sits a maiden,
A little brown wing on her hat,
With its touches of tropical azure,
And sheen of the sun upon that.
Through the bloom-colored pane shines a glory
By which the vast shadows are stirred,
But I pine for the spirit and splendor
That painted the wing of the bird.

The organ rolls down its great anthem;
With the soul of a song it is blent;
But, for me, I am sick for the singing
Of one little song that is spent.
The voice of the curate is gentle:
"No sparrow shall fall to the ground."
But the poor broken wing on the bonnet
Is mocking the merciful sound.

—Our Sunday Afternoon.

THROWING STONES.

Brother Tom has been in great trouble, and it all came of throwing a stone. I was with Tom at the time. We had been to the baker's to get some New Year's cake and some little iced pound-cake for tea; and, when Tom picked up the stone, he carried it along for a good while, just tossing it up and down in his hands. I thought it would be nice to decorate. When we had a fair at the Sunday-school, auntie decorated some stones just like it, and varnished them, and sold them for paper-weights. I thought Tom was going to take it home to auntie; but, just as I was going to ask him, he said, "Look at that cat!" And, as I looked, the stone flew. Whiz it went through the air; but it did not hit puss. She flew away over the fence, half frightened to death by the awful crash that followed; for the stone went straight through the window into Mrs. Jepson's sitting-room. The glass flew about, and there were two dreadful screams; and then the door was dashed open, and out rushed Mrs. Jepson, wringing her hands.

"Oh, oh, oh, oh, my poor Willie!" she cried. "Where is the wretch that threw that stone? Can it be possible that it was you, Thomas?"

"O Tom, you have hurt some one!" I cried.

We ran to the door. There lay poor Willie Jepson on the floor, white and dreadful, and covered all over with red blood.

"I think you have killed him!" cried Mrs. Jepson. "Run for the doctor! Do that, at least! Oh, my poor Willie, my poor Willie!"

Tom ran. He came back in ten minutes, for the doctor did not live far away.

Before he came, Mrs. Jepson had carried Willie into a bedroom; and the doctor went in after her, and we were left alone.

Tom and I were sitting together, both crying, when the doctor came out. He had the stone in his hand, and it had a dreadful blood-stain on it.

"You are the young wretch who threw this, I believe," he said to Tom. "Do you know what they do to murderers?"

"Yes, sir. They hang them," said Tom.

"They do worse than that. They electrocute them," said the doctor. "You'd better say your prayers, young man." And away he walked.

"O sister, sister!" Tom gasped.

"Poor Willie must be dead; and I am a murderer, and they'll do that dreadful thing to me with electricity! The policeman will carry me off! I shall never come home again! O sister, what shall I do?"

"O Tom," I cried, "you did not mean to do it. It was really an accident."

"Yes," said poor Tom: "yes, it was. But I must run away, and hide in the woods."

"Then I will go with you, Tom," I said. "You shall not bear it all alone. There is the cave: we can hide there."

Just as soon as I spoke of the cave we jumped up, slipped out of the house, and ran for the woods. There was no one there, and only a dear little gray squirrel saw us creep into the cave.

"Now, Tom," I said, "we can hide here for a while; and then I'll go home some night and tell mother, and father will take you and hide you somewhere. Anyhow, we shan't starve with this basket of cakes."

"I shall never be happy again," he said. "I have murdered my best friend. Perhaps I'd better give myself up."

"No, no. What should I do, dear Tom?" I said.

It seemed as though hours and hours went by. After a while we made up our minds that it was time to eat something, only we must be careful of our food, like the shipwrecked people in books. It was awfully solemn. Now and then we went to sleep; and, whenever I thought it was meal-time, I gave out more cake. At last it was all gone, and it seemed to me that we must have been there a week. I said to Tom:—

"We cannot starve to death here. I'll creep out, and see if it is daytime. If it is, I'll run home and find papa."

Tom had some matches in his pocket, and had just lit one for me to see my way out, when overhead came the most dreadful noises,—shouting, screaming, blowing horns, and cries of: "Tom! Hello, Tom! Tom Halliday, here we are! Tom!"

"The police are after me!" groaned Tom.

"Hello!" cried somebody. "I say, I guess they're in the cave. I saw a light just now."

Then some one with a lantern crept through the passage.

"Here you are!" he said. "You've frightened your mother nearly out of her senses!"

Oh, goodness! Never shall I forget that moment; for this somebody was Will Jepson himself,—Will, with a blue bruise upon his forehead.

"I reckon you thought you'd killed me, Tom, old fellow," he said. "I know that is why you hid yourself. But all that happened was that the step-ladder fell with me and knocked my senses out for a while. It wasn't blood that I was covered with. I was painting the window-frames cherry-red, and upset the paint-pot on me. It did look just like blood; but none of mine was spilled, and I thought I'd come and find you."

"Forgive me, Will," said Tom. "I'll never throw stones again."

"Nothing to forgive! It was an accident," said Will.

Then we all crept out of the hole. And my papa was there; and he caught me in his arms, and kissed me and carried me home.

"Papa," I asked him as we went along, "how many days have we been away?"

"Days!" He laughed. "My darling, you have been away just four hours."—N. Y. Ledger.

BESSIE'S BONFIRE.

"O grandma! Why won't you let me go down to the oak-trees this afternoon and get some acorns? You know you said I might some day. The boys are going in a little while, and I want to go with them. Do say yes, grandma, dear!"

It was a glorious September afternoon, and Bessie Field's seventh birthday. She had come the day before with her grandmother from the city to spend a few days with her cousins on Uncle John's big farm. There were five of the cousins,—Will, Frank, and George, little Mary and baby Rob. The three oldest were real country boys, bare-footed and sunburnt, dirty and happy, and always ready for a good time. They were all devoted admirers of brown-eyed Bessie, who was an only child, but not wholly spoiled.

When she came to visit them, they could never do enough for her entertainment. The orchard was ransacked for the reddest apples and ripest pears. They scratched their bare legs and hands gathering the largest berries, and drenched their trousers catching shiners and polliwogs,—all for Bessie. On the other hand, Bessie entered into all their sports with great delight, and was seldom scared unless by an unusually big snake. So they all got on beautifully together, and had a very jolly time.

Now Bessie's grandma had promised to make her an acorn tea-set such as grandma used to play with when she was a little girl, and this was why Bessie was so anxious to gather the acorns. For the tea-set it was necessary to have two kinds of acorns,—the large ones with flat, shallow cups, and the smaller ones with rounder, deeper cups. The shallow acorn-cups made the saucers, and the smaller ones made the tea-cups. Then grandma knew how to make a charming tea-pot from a big acorn by adding a nose and handle from a burnt match, and by cutting off the top to make the cover. The pitcher was made by putting on handles in the same way, cutting off the top, and scraping out the inside of the nut. When completed, one of grandma's tea-sets was fit for a fairy queen; and it was no wonder that Bessie was so eager to have one for her own.

It was her birthday, and a lovely day; and Bessie saw nothing to hinder her going with the boys after the coveted treasures. But grandma saw with different eyes. As she looked out of the window across the garden and orchard toward the oak grove, she saw bright flames leaping up from behind the trees, and blue smoke curling up and spreading far away toward the horizon; and she hesitated about giving her consent.

"Well, dearie," she said, after a moment which seemed at least a quarter of an hour to Bessie, "I would like to have you get the acorns; but I see they are burning brush in the pasture, and you will have to go through the pasture to reach the trees. If anything should happen to you, your mother would never forgive me for letting you go. I think you had better wait till to-morrow. Then the fires will be out. One day won't make very much difference."

"But, grandma," said Bessie, "I won't go near the fires. I'll go through the pasture just as fast as I can run, and I won't even look at the fires!"

Just here came a pattering of bare feet on the stairs; and in another moment in rushed the boys, all out of breath, and all talking at once. Their hands were full of peaches and flowers, and at first it was impossible to make out what they were saying.

"One at a time, one at a time!" said grandma. "Let Willie speak first."

"O grandma! We're going to take a jug of molasses and water down to the men in the pasture. It's so hot working over the fires, they're thirsty; and we want Bessie to go with us. Do let her go, grandma!"

"Oh, yes, grandma! I won't go near the fires. Truly I won't!" pleaded Bessie, with the tears gathering in her eyes as she hugged grandma around the waist.

"No, we won't let her go near the fires," said Willie. "I'll take care of her; and, oh, the acorns are as thick as bees down in the grove!"

The children begged and coaxed till grandma finally consented; and then they started, the boys with the jug, and Bessie with a basket, all promising to be very good and obedient.

When they reached the orchard, there were bird's-nests to be shown to Bessie; and further on they came across the hollow trunk of a tree where some field-mice had a nest. Then Rover, the dog, scented a woodchuck in a stone wall; and altogether it was some time before they reached the pasture,—so long, in fact, that the children had almost forgotten about grandma's charge to them and their solemn promises.

The boys started toward the men with their jug, while Bessie stopped to gather some catnip for her pet kitten. She had picked quite a bunch when the boys rejoined her; and all were soon busy picking up the shiny brown nuts, which lay abundantly scattered on the mossy turf beneath the big, shady oaks. After filling the basket with carefully selected specimens, Willie began filling his pockets with the smaller acorns, which, he assured the others, were almost as good to eat as chestnuts. Bessie tried one, but found it far too bitter for her taste, and threw it away in disgust. The boys then picked up their somewhat battered straw hats; Bessie gathered together her catnip; and they started back through the pasture on their way home, intending to have grandma make the tea-set before supper-time.

So many things had attracted their attention since the children left home that they had wholly forgotten their promise, and stopped just a moment to watch the flames dance and crackle, and then disappear amid the smoke, only to break out again merrier and brighter than ever.

A big bonfire is such a fascinating sight! The temptation was too strong for Frank. His black eyes danced till they seemed livelier than the flames. At last he said:—

"Oh, let's get some sticks, and each make a little pile of them, and play that we are burning brush, too!"

The suggestion was no sooner made than all four began to gather a pile of sticks and leaves. Then Willie said:—

"I'm going to get a stick from the big fire and light mine, and then smother it with moss and leaves, and roast some of the acorns."

"So am I," said Frank.

"And so am I," said George.
"Light mine, too," said thoughtless Bessie.

"All right," said the boys.
Soon there were four little bonfires burning brightly on the edge of the woods. Each of the children was working with might and main to smother a tiny blaze. Willie went into the woods a little farther than the others to get more moss for his pile.

Bessie at last succeeded in smothering her fire, so that not a flame escaped; and, as she watched the pretty smoke creeping out from the edges, she clapped her hands, saying:—

"O boys! Just see how nicely I have smothered my fire!" Then she turned around to look at the others; and, as she did so, a sudden puff of wind brought forth the flames with a leap; and they seized the back of Bessie's dress. In a moment her skirts were ablaze; and she shouted to Willie, who came running from the woods and threw his coat about her. Fortunately, grandma had taken off the gingham dress which Bessie had worn in the morning, and put on instead a brown-and-white dress of wool. Fortunately, too, Bessie threw her hands behind her, and rolled her skirts tightly together, and so succeeded in putting out the flames; but her poor hands were sadly burned, and the back of her dress was almost entirely gone. If she had started to run, Bessie, perhaps, might never have seen her grandma again. As it was, she was burned enough to cause keen pain; but that was not half so hard to bear as the thought that she had disobeyed her grandmother.

"Oh, what will grandma say?" sobbed penitent Bessie. "I didn't mean to be so naughty. Grandma'll never trust me again, nor believe me any more. Oh, dear! Oh, dear! If I had only minded her, and gone right straight home!"

The boys stood looking at Bessie for a moment. Then Frank and George burst out crying, while Willie picked up Bessie's basket, and tried to comfort her by recalling her attention to a white rabbit skipping across the path just in front of them. But Bessie cared not for rabbits nor acorns. She was thinking of something far more serious.

Bessie and the boys left the bonfires to their own destruction, and the roasting acorns to burn to a cinder. Such a melancholy procession of naughty children slowly making their way along the little path leading from the pasture to the farm-house never was seen there before.

Grandma met them at the door, and listened gravely to their pitiful story of disobedience, which was told with all frankness. The wise old lady said never a word of blame, but set about making the acorn tea-set, and finished it that very night.

THE JOURNEY OF THE SLED.

Such a gay and frolicking little sled, jumping and bounding over the snow behind the big express-wagon like a big red bird! It was coming through one of the business streets down-town in New York, and going toward Broadway. When you see a red sled tied behind an express-wagon, you look for a small boy as a natural part of the sled. This sled had its small boy, or, rather, boys; for there were three. But such unhappy small boys that you stopped—you could not help it—to find out what was the matter. The three boys were half a block behind the gay, frolicking sled, running as hard as they could run to catch up with it. The story was told. They had tied the sled behind the wagon, expecting to have a ride, perhaps for blocks, when either they had been thrown off or the man had made them get off; and the sled had tied the rope so tightly that they could not untie it, and the beautiful sled went bounding away without them; and every minute it was further and further away.

As the express-wagon reached Broadway, a car was in its way; and the three small boys, with hope in their faces, stumbled and struggled forward, hoping to reach the sled. Alas! alas! The car moved out of the way, the man struck the horse, and he bounded forward; and the little red sled, as if hopeless itself, fell over on its side, and was dragged across Broadway. The wagon and cars closed in like great waves behind it, and hid it from sight.

"Tony, Tony! Run, run!" exclaimed one of the small boys, dancing up and down in terror, the great tears rolling down his cheeks.

Poor Tony dashed about, knocking against everybody,—the lamp-post, his friends,—just going about in a circle. Somehow, no one saw him. Tony and his friends wriggled between the horses and the carts, and stood on the other side of Broadway.

In the mean time the little sled, all helpless, dragging on its side, no longer bouncing and jumping gayly, was seen by a tall young man walking hurriedly along. He sprang into the street, put his foot quickly on the sled, and held it so firmly that the rope broke and the little sled was free. I think that young man must have taken high rank at college in athletics, he moved so certainly and so quickly. He looked about for the small boy who belonged to the sled, but did not see him. He knew that boy could not be far off, so he righted the sled and pushed it toward the curb with his foot, and passed on in a hurry. Just as he reached the corner, he spied Tony and his friends, who at this moment darted forward with a sharp cry. The young man turned and ran. The way he ran proved that he was trained. Down the street two boys of about fourteen and sixteen were running away with the sled. Did the young man have the famous seven-league boots? He caught them in a minute; and I think—am sure, in fact—that before that young man got through with them those boys wished they had not touched that little red sled. When he told them to go, they flew, never looking behind them. Tony and his friends, in terror, stood on the other side of the street, wondering, doubtless, whether that darling sled would ever come back. The young man took the broken rope in his hand, and, striding across the street, said: "Here! Don't tie the rope when you cut behind! Have the rope long enough to hold the end in your hand. Then you can let go when you want to drop off." The young man pulled on his gloves and straightened his tie as he swung on a Broadway car. Nobody thought he was a hero but Tony and his two small friends; and they, doubtless, in their little hearts said, "He is a brick."—Outlook.

SAVED BY ITS SONG.

A little thistle bird in Monmouth owes its life to its perseverance and habit of singing while in trouble. A man in that village had heard the small songster's persistent notes near his window for nearly a month, and at last called the attention of a friend who makes a study of birds and their ways to its song. This friend soon made the discovery that the bird was a prisoner to its nest. A ladder was brought, and the bird and nest were taken down and examined. One leg of the little sufferer had become ensnared in the wool with which the nest was lined, and it was only after twenty minutes of painstaking effort with sharp instruments that the limb was loosed from the snarl. This done, the spectators were surprised to see birdie fly away, apparently as well as though never tied to a near-by apple-tree. The bird's parents, or some other of his feathered friends had kept it supplied with food during its imprisonment.—Lewiston Journal.

PUSSY IN PRISON.

One day, when Uncle Will was passing by a building that was only half completed, he heard a cat crying inside. He asked the janitor in charge why he didn't let the cat out.

"She's under the flooring of one of the rooms," said the janitor. "I suppose she went in after a mouse, and the workmen boarded her up without knowing it."

Uncle Will made the janitor promise that the poor cat should be let out the next day; but a week later, when he was passing the building again, he heard the cat still crying.

He stopped and spoke to the janitor very severely. He told him the cat must be let out. The man said he had been too busy to see to the matter, but would attend to poor pussy that very day.

The next afternoon Uncle Will went to the building expressly to see if the man had kept his promise; and he found the cat was still there, but now her cries were growing very faint.

Uncle Will lost no more time, but sent a note to Mr. Bergh, who is the friend of all dumb animals; and that evening men with tools went to the building, tore up the flooring, and let the cat out.

She was still alive, but very weak; and well she might be, for she had been nine days in prison. She proved to be the pet of a blind old lady who lived near, and who had grieved very much for her, thinking poor pussy had gone never to return.—F. B. Hollowell, in Babyhood.

THE ELEPHANT REMEMBERED.

A British army surgeon, who has served in India, gives in the London Times a striking illustration of memory in an elephant. Recently he took his children to the "Zoo" to see the elephant; and, after they had had a ride on the monster's back, he held out to him a bun, and said, as is frequently done in India, "Salaam Kuro!" or, in English, "Make your salaam or salute!" The animal looked at the gentleman for some time, as if to recall the meaning of the words, and then, raising his trunk to his forehead, gave the salute in true Indian fashion. The keeper, who had watched the performance, was much surprised, and asked the visitor what it all meant, adding that he had had charge of the creature ever since he had been brought to England seventeen years before, and had never seen him do anything like it. This convinced the gentleman that the elephant had, with some effort, recalled the meaning of the words, "Salaam Kuro!"

A WASHINGTON RELIC.

Mr. George Henry Rattenbury of Detroit believes that he has a unique relic of one of the ancestors of George Washington in a parchment deed written in Norman French, dated June 9, 1590, signed by Richard Washington, and sealed by him with the Washington seal, from which the stars and stripes of the American flag are supposed to have been derived. Relics of the Washington family in England prior to 1657, when two of them came to Virginia, are scarce. Mr. Rattenbury's deed is said to be unquestionably authentic; and he believes it to be valuable, especially on account of the seal, which he thinks is the only impression of the old Washington family seal in existence.—Harper's Weekly.

BUTTONS.

Buttons are of more importance in the history of to-day than most people think. If workmen come across the bones of a dead soldier on the battle-field of Gettysburg, it is the buttons they find which show whether the soldier was a Union man or a Confederate. In England, if a family employs a boy with bright brass buttons on his jacket to answer their door-bell, they must pay a tax to the state for those buttons. They are emblems of distinction to the family. Buttons are symbols of law on a policeman's coat. They are an indication of a nation's art on a fine lady's gown; and, in general, they are a condensed history of a country's mechanical ingenuity.—Young People's Magazine.

A GREAT AGREEMENT.

25,000 Physicians of One Mind.

Food for Strength First.—Medicine for Cure Second.—The Least Food that will give Most Nourishment, the Kind.

In this enlightened age, the old theory held by physicians—to get as much medicine in the least possible time into the system of a patient, even at the expense of stomach, blood, brains, nerves, and often, in the end, life itself—has been abandoned.

The old way was to "dose." If the patient had a tremendous constitution, he sometimes "pulled through;" if not, which was more often the case, that special disease was considered more dangerous, as it had claimed another for its own. But this is all changed now. All prominent physicians agree on one subject, anyway. It is this—build the patient up first, give him new blood and strength, add flesh to his bones. He's then ready to receive the benefit of proper medical treatment.

To do this effectually, that must be given which will, in the least quantity, produce the greatest amount of vitality,—not a stimulant which quickly reacts disastrously, but a genuine food, a muscle, bone, and blood maker. Such a food was long sought for, and at last discovered in that original and only raw food extract—Bovine.

By the use of this wonderful life-generating preparation, every organ of the body becoming strengthened by nourishment, naturally begins to perform its ordinary functions, and at once the patient is on the road to recovery.

It is this result, obtained in hundreds of cases where Bovine has been used, that has caused its indorsement by 25,000 prominent physicians in America.

In addition, thousands who have been benefited can vouch for the wonderful results obtained by the use of Bovine, for invalids, the old, convalescents, the over-worked, or, in fact, all who have found it necessary to maintain strength, flesh, and vigor.

FILLING THE CUP AGAINST THE TURK.

Baron Münchhausen has not been left without posterity. Señor Ximenez, a Spanish traveller, says he was in the Sassoun district when the alleged disturbances occurred, and heard nothing about any massacres until he read the reports of them in the European papers. The Señor reminds us of the man who lodged in the same house with Robespierre all through the Reign of Terror, but never heard either of Robespierre or the Reign of Terror. The Turks themselves admit the massacres, and only seek to show that there was some justification for them. The Señor eulogizes Zekki Pasha for his humanity! Had he been a Roman, he would no doubt have proposed the erection of a statue to the merciful Nero, father of his people. Zekki Pasha himself admits, says the Times's Constantinople correspondent, that 1,720 persons have been killed. His reports have been removed from the Ministry of War by superior order. Once again the wavering Porte has ordered the subordinate Abdullah Pasha not to preside over the meetings of the farcical commission. Two thousand people attended a meeting at Lambeth Baths, and passed a resolution, moved by Prof. Agar Beet, and seconded by Rev. Copeland Bowie, calling on the government to take the initiative in insisting upon the immediate introduction of definite and thorough reforms in the administration of Armenia. A series of meetings have been held on behalf of the Armenians in Edinburgh, and special reference to the outrages were made at several of the churches on Sunday. The mayor of Bournemouth has received a communication from the head of the American Bible Mission at Stamboul stating that evidence increases to show that the great massacre, in which several thousand defenceless women and children perished most horribly, was carried out at the order of the sultan himself. Prof. Thoumaian addressed a large meeting at Bromley, Kent, on Sunday afternoon; and a resolution similar to that at Lambeth Baths was passed.—Christian World.

REV. WALTER CLIFFORD MOORE.

In the death of Rev. Walter Clifford Moore at Trenton, N.Y., on February 25, the Unitarian church of that place as well as the whole town suffers a great loss. Born at Belfast, Me., in the year 1857, he was cut off at the early age of thirty-seven. His early education was received in the public schools of Maine; and in the year 1881 he removed to Meadville, Pa., where he entered the theological school of that city. In 1886 he received from this institution the degree of B.D., and soon after was settled over the Unitarian church in Pepperell, Mass., of which he continued pastor till 1890. In 1893 he was settled as the pastor of the Unitarian church at Trenton, N.Y., and was meeting with great success here, and becoming greatly beloved by his people, when stricken with the fatal malady which, after six months of weakness and pain, at length removed him. He was highly esteemed by all who knew him, as a man of great modesty, sincerity, and unselfishness, exceptional conscientiousness and devoutness, and an earnest Christian faith, that never faltered in its hold of the great realities of the spiritual world.

LEWIS COLEMAN.

BORN IN WRENTHAM, MASS., SEPT. 25, 1817; DIED IN BOSTON, FEB. 10, 1895.

Descended from the Puritan yeomanry of New England, Lewis Coleman came to Boston at the age of nineteen, to seek his fortune. As clerk in the house of Carmi E. King, he quickly learned the details of business, and set up for himself. This was in the days of small things, when business methods were simple and direct, and the way from the bottom to the top was won by personal faithfulness, labor, and devotion to duty. Having been trained by a good mother in habits of the strictest honesty and economy, contented with steady earnings and small profits, Mr. Coleman soon acquired the confidence and respect of this community. Receiving into liberal partnership one after another of the young men whom he had trained, the firm of Lewis Coleman & Co. became widely known, and their drafts honored without hesitation all over New England.

Brought up in the old-fashioned church-going habit, Mr. Coleman early attached himself to the Unitarian church which is now Mr. Hale's, and was perhaps its oldest member. He was for many years one of its Standing Committee, always contributing generously to every branch of the work.

He represented his district in the General Court, was recognized there as incorruptible, and did efficient service on important committees.

In times of business depression Mr. Coleman stood ready to help those less fortunate than himself, and it may well be doubted whether any one in distress ever appealed to him in vain. His nature was sweet and sunny. He was slow to anger; and, though he could blaze with indignation at a mean, cruel, or dishonest act, he showed by his conduct that he thought forgiveness better than revenge. He was pure in heart and life,—almost a Stoic in his simple, frugal, and unostentatious habits. To him there was "no place like home"; and in it, both as youth and man, he was loved and honored. Courageous in adversity, patient in suffering, he has gone to his reward.

Spiritual Life.

If two angels were sent from heaven to execute a divine command,—one to conduct an empire, and another to sweep a street in it,—they would feel no inclination to change employments.—John Newton.

If easy times are departed, it is that the difficult times may make us more in earnest,—that they may teach us not to depend on ourselves. If easy belief is impossible, it is that we may learn what belief is, and in whom it is to be placed.—F. D. Maurice.

A blade is a small thing. At first it grows very near the earth. It is often soiled and crushed and down-trodden. But it is a living thing. The great dead stone beside it is more imposing, only it will never be anything else than a stone. But this small blade,—it doth not yet appear what it shall be.—Drummond.

Make yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts. None of us yet know, for none of us have been taught in early youth, what fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thought, proof against all adversity,—bright fancies, satisfied memories, noble histories, faithful sayings, treasure-houses of precious and restful thoughts.—J. Ruskin.

Begin with small things. You cannot enter the presence of another human being without finding there more to do than you or I, or any soul, will ever learn to do perfectly before we die. Let us be content to do little, if God sets us at little tasks. It is but pride and self-will which says: "Give me something huge to fight, and I should enjoy that; but why make me sweep the dust?"—Charles Kingsley.

Tenderly let us love Jesus; sincerely let us honor him; gladly and gratefully let us sit at his feet, to learn wisdom from his gracious lips and his matchless life. But let us not follow in the path of the ancient pagan peoples, and deify the man we would honor, even if that man be the great and incomparable Galilean. Rather let us be his so true and faithful disciples that in all our worship we shall be pointed by him ever to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God!—J. T. Sunderland.

Charities and Reforms.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES AND CORRECTION.—The Twenty-second Annual Conference of Charities and Correction will be held in New Haven May 22-28. There are no restrictions as to membership. Any one may become a member on payment of the annual fee of $2, which includes the annual printed proceedings. At the twenty-second meeting Robert Treat Paine of Boston will preside, and special attention will be given to the subject of "Charity Organization in Cities." Inquiries for information should be addressed to H. H. Hart, Corresponding Secretary, St. Paul, Minn.

Education.

A GIRL SCHOOL FOR ICELAND.—For some years past Mme. Segrid Magnusson, an Icelandic woman of rare intelligence and high education, whose home is at Cambridge, England, where her husband is sub-librarian of the university library, has been trying to establish a high school for girls in Reykjavik, and by the generous aid of English friends has been enabled to erect a fine school-house, where two winters ago she opened a school for girls for one term, at the end of which time her funds gave out, and she was obliged to close the school. In the high school which Mme. Magnusson wishes to found the subjects to be taught are: tailoring, sloyd, Icelandic language and literature, English, arithmetic, writing, and geography, history, Danish, and singing. Besides these ten subjects, cooking is to be taught, and metal work. They will have calisthenics half an hour daily, and half an hour's walk twice a day. The girls are taught plain sewing, and some sort of useful fancy work. It may seem strange to teach tailoring in a girls' high school; but it must be remembered that there are no tailors in Iceland, and women have always made the men's clothes as well as their own. Therefore, it is considered quite necessary that this branch should be learned scientifically, that the cutting and making of garments may be done to measure, and thus more economically than formerly. Mme. Magnusson is raising funds in America for the school.

Spirit of the Press.

The reviews of "Trilby" continue to appear. The February Atlantic ventures a wholesome prophecy concerning it:—

It is of slight consequence that one should try to predict the length of life of a popular favorite like "Trilby," and yet prophecy has its twofold attribute of foretelling and forth-telling. That the grace, the bonhomie of the book will appeal to another generation depends, we think, on how far another generation will be as tired as ours is of the fiction which wrestles with all the problems of life, or which plays the part of devil's advocate. That the story of "Trilby" will continue to fascinate will depend on two facts,—how far hypnotism becomes a commonplace of human experience, and how far writers of fiction come again to a sense of the sweetness, the strength, and the enduring power which reside in the pictures of life and character that are obedient to a finely sensitive perception of the everlasting beauty of purity in man and woman.

The St. Louis Christian Advocate has an article on the Armenian question entitled "Christendom a Unit":—

The time is probably not far distant when the Turkish government will be given to understand, if necessary, by a pretty sharp lesson that toleration must be taught and practised in Mohammedan as in Christian nations. That Christendom is a unit against Islam is shown by the bitter feeling everywhere excited by the news of the Armenian butcheries, and by the angry protests which, from a hundred leading cities of the Christian world, have gone to Constantinople. That the Ottoman government has an inkling of the manner in which this terrible news has been received is evident by the efforts it has made to discredit and falsify the intelligence from Armenia, but these efforts only serve to show that the Turkish government is itself aware of the common feeling prevalent in the empire against Christians, while the delay in investigation and the fact that the perpetrators of last summer's outrages have, in some cases, been rewarded instead of punished, demonstrates the sympathy of the government with the majority of its people. In spite of the captiousness of those who would have us believe that the world is retrograding, the conviction is forced upon the mind that Christianity has progressed to such an extent that all denominations are ready to make common cause against the persecutors of Christian people, no matter what may be the peculiar form of faith held by the unfortunates. In this case the sufferers were Armenian Catholics, but the meetings that have been held in Europe and America were addressed by men belonging to every leading denomination. Divided among themselves as to doctrine, forms, ceremonies, and practice, Christians are nevertheless a unit; and there will probably be in the next few months a combined protest which will show that in such an affair as this all shades of Christian belief are ignored, and common cause made against a common enemy.

Personals.

Gertrude, the daughter of Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York, a young lady not yet out of her teens, is said to have been studying Chinese for several years. She is proficient in French, Italian, and German, and now reads Confucius in the original.

The colossal bronze statue of William Penn, which has been on exhibition for the last two years, while the lofty tower of the new City Hall of Philadelphia was being reared for its pedestal, has been successfully lifted to its placed and firmly secured. The broad-brimmed hat of the famous Quaker will be clearly seen for a radius of twenty miles. The statue cost fifty thousand dollars.

DR. AND MRS. MOORS.—The Franklin Evangelical Association has expressed in resolutions the feeling of personal bereavement caused by the death of Dr. and Mrs. Moors. They were identified with the higher life and progress of the Connecticut Valley, with its educational, humanitarian, patriotic, and religious interests; and the churches and conference will greatly miss these long-time friends. In all but the name, Dr. Moors has for years been a bishop in Central and Western Massachusetts,—not by assumption of episcopal powers and prerogative, but by the free suffrage and instinctive choice of free Congregationalists.

The University of London has just conferred the degree of Bachelor of Music on Miss Florence G. E. Higgins, daughter of the esteemed office-keeper of the university, residing at Burlington House. This event is not only a striking proof of the fact that prophets are sometimes honored in their own country, but a pleasant reminder of the increasing number of women graduates in music. At the great music schools the women students outnumber the men by four to one; and it is natural, therefore, that some of them should pay attention to those higher branches of musical theory with which the examination for degrees is concerned.

People Who Weigh and Compare

Know and get the best. Cottolene, the new vegetable shortening, has won a wide and wonderful popularity. At its introduction it was submitted to expert chemists, prominent physicians and famous cooks. All of these pronounced a natural, healthful and acceptable food-product, better than lard for every cooking purpose.

The success of Cottolene is now a matter of history. Will you share in the better food and better health for which it stands, by using it in your home?

Avoid imitations—countless—worthless. Stick to COTTOLENE.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,

Monthly Magazine. Tenth Year. THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Pleasantries.

It is all right to dot your i's, but the wise man will go a long distance out of his way to escape crossing a pink tea.

"Did you say you wanted Shakspeare's works?" asked the bookstore clerk. "No," replied the haughty girl, "I want his plays."—Washington Star.

How is this for a specimen of pulpit oratory? "The splashing splume of the red-hot billows of oblivion!" It emanates from one of our Boston Methodist divines.

Waiter (to gentleman who is looking at napkin half full of holes): "I'll bring you another napkin." Diner: "Never mind. The holes seem to be clean."—Tit-Bits.

Where and How.—Willie: "Tommy Jones went and hit me an awful crack with an apple." Papa: "On purpose?" Willie: "No, on the nose."—Harper's Young People.

Bobby: "I wish my birthday was not the 22d of February." Jack: "Why not?" Bobby: "Oh, every one thinks because George Washington never told a lie, I ought not to."—Harper's Young People.

In a description of a revival service held in Boston recently the Herald reporter described the spirit of the gathering as "on a three-gauge level of enthusiasm going down grade." We confess that this is beyond us.

Shippin Clark (to his employer, leaving the office): "Oh, Mr. System! Haven't you forgotten your umbrella? It's raining." Mr. System: "Can't help it. I have made a resolution to have one here and one at home, to provide for all emergencies. Now, if I take this, they'll both be at home."

Clergymen will appreciate the story Archdeacon Farrar tells of Charles Kingsley, who used to approach the pulpit with fear and trembling. As he, Kingsley, said: "Whenever I walk up the choir of Westminster Abbey, I wish myself d-d-dead; and, whenever I walk back, I wish myself m-m-more dead!"

"Well," said Mrs. Bruggins, after a solo by a fashionable church choir tenor, "if that ain't the rudest thing I ever saw!" "What?" inquired her niece. "Why, didn't you notice it? Just as soon as the young man began to sing, every other member of the choir stopped; but he went right through with it, and I must say I admire his spunk."—Washington Star.

A witty member of our Unitarian fellowship was introduced one day to a Churchman of the stricter sort, who inquired: "Did you say you were a Unitarian? Ah! well, then, I can recognize you as a gentleman, but not as a fellow-Christian." "Oh, never mind about that," was the breezy reply: "I can recognize you as a fellow-Christian, but not as a gentleman!" Pacific Unitarian.

A certain old Scotch lady was once protesting against the resignation of her pastor. The worthy man tasted sweetness in her words, but, wishing modestly to comfort her in the thought that all was not lost in his departure, bid her not to worry. "You'll get a better man after I'm gone." But how was the fine edge of her compliment taken off by her remonstrating reply: "Na, na! We've had four pastors already, and every one's been worse than the rest!" Mid-Continent.

Two distinguished literary men were one day discussing certain peculiarities of our modern youth, when one of them remarked: "There is no more emotion among them. My children read books over which I used, at their age, to weep copiously; but they are apparently unmoved." The twelve-year-old daughter of the speaker sat near by, drinking in the discussion. At this point she felt it necessary to defend her class. "You are entirely mistaken, papa," she interpolated, with some heat. "It is not that emotion has gone out. It is that self-control has come in."—Harper's Bazar.

A STORY ABOUT GRIMM.

The prettiest of literary anecdotes has been related by William Grimm, one of the pair of famous story-tellers. One day a little girl rang their bell, and met him in the hall with the words, "You are the Mr. Grimm who writes the pretty tales?" "Yes, I and my brother." "And that of the clever little tailor who married the princess?" "Yes, certainly." "Well," said the child, producing the book, "it is said here that every one who doesn't believe it must pay him a thaler. Now, I don't believe that a princess ever married a tailor. I haven't so much as a thaler, but here is a groschen; and please say I hope to pay the rest by degrees." Just then Jacob came up, and the brothers had an interesting interview with the little dame; but they could not persuade her to take away the groschen which she had laid on the table.—Selected.

Editorial.

THERE are abundant opportunities for the spread of Unitarianism to-day, and no fields are more inviting than those opened by the new South and the new West; and there is no more important problem before the administrators of our missionary funds than to meet the needs of these vast regions. It can only be done, of course, by more abundant contributions to our missionary work, and by sending out apostles who have the Pauline gift of church planting. But there is still another need; and that is that Unitarianism, North, East, South, and West, shall be brought into more earnest and sympathetic co-ordination. There is no longer a theological East or West, so far as Unitarianism is concerned. Unanimity of thought and sentiment was never greater than at the present time; but what is needed is that there shall be a closer knitting, so that the seams of all sectionalism shall disappear. This is not to be done by filing off the individuality of local accent, but by uniting all voices into joyful unanimity of aim, purpose, and effort,—such a unanimity of voice as has made the last National Conference memorable. The American Unitarian Association is national in its aim and work. It ought to receive national support from the great body of American Unitarians. We believe it has never been more liberal in spirit, more generous in its aims, than it is to-day. If there are any modifications in its constitution which are necessary to make it more national and less local, let them be made.

THE expulsion of Prof. Woodworth of the University of California, and also of a student of the same university, from the First Baptist Church of Berkeley, Cal., is one of the latest cases of heresy on the ecclesiastical docket. In another column we give a summary of Prof. Woodworth's views. It will be seen that the action of the church in expelling him is simply an attempt to resist the march of modern thought and knowledge instead of adjusting itself to them. It is an attitude which the Church has taken through many centuries in various epochs of progress of thought and knowledge; and it is a position which it has taken to its own disadvantage, and has been constantly obliged to abandon. If Christianity is not capable of adjustment with modern thought, and with the facts and history of the world of nature, it is not a religion for this age, and belongs to an age of delusion and ignorance. But Christianity is a moral and spiritual religion, which could meet the life experiences and needs of men in an age when the Ptolomaic cosmology was accepted, and it has proved to be just as capable of meeting the wants of mankind under a new conception of the universe. For the First Baptist Church of California to take the stand it has is not a defence of Christianity, but an arraignment of it. The Church has often proved the poorest guardian of the trust committed to it.

THE Baptist body has some advantages in the case of heresy not enjoyed by other denominations, in which power is centralized in a synod or assembly: it is the advantage of pure, independent congregationalism. As noticed above, two members of the First Baptist Church of Berkeley, Cal., have just been expelled for heresy on charges brought against them by the pastor of the church. The case was tried before the church and decided by the church. There is no denominational body before which the case could have been tried, and there is no higher court to which either church or the accused can appeal. It is a great advantage to the Baptist denomination, as a whole, that it is not required to make a declaration or to pass a verdict upon a matter which belongs to the Berkeley, Cal., church. The whole denomination is not compromised by the action of this society; nor, on the other hand, is Prof. Woodworth excluded from the Baptist denomination by being excluded from the Berkeley church. If he wishes, he can apply for admission to some other Baptist church, and make a statement of his belief, and be accepted or rejected, according to the judgment of the church appealed to. It is possible that nine out of ten Baptist churches might reject Prof. Woodworth; but we should be surprised if the Baptist churches of Providence, Cambridge, Ithaca, and other university cities or towns expelled from membership a professor holding such views.

THE Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society is divided against itself, and also against many temperance leaders in the community. The ground of division is the Norwegian Bill now before the State legislature. The directors of the association are opposed to the bill. The president, Hon. John D. Long, favors it; and it is also favored by a large number of people who are total abstainers, and who contribute to the funds of the society. Under these circumstances it would seem that the best thing for the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society to do would be to keep quiet, and let the law take its course and have a fair trial in cities which are now committed to license. On the contrary, the society has deemed it its duty, against the protests of a minority, to attack the Norwegian system, and to print pamphlets and tracts, and to put orators in the field against it. The liquor men rejoice to form an unorganized alliance with the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society to kill a good temperance measure. This is but one example of many which might be found of the way in which temperance men by their divisions have helped the cause of intemperance. Let the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society do all it can to educate the people to do without intoxicating liquors, but let it not stand in the way of those who are seeking to establish in hopelessly license towns a better method of regulation.

THE fortunes of woman suffrage, like that of all reforms, are subject to some mutation. Thus last year the Massachusetts House of Representatives gave for the first time a majority for municipal suffrage for women. This year, by a strong majority, it has voted against it. The result was brought about largely by an organized anti-woman suffrage association formed by a few members in the House. On the other hand, the opposition outside among women, has become steadily less. Thus, while there have been as many as three thousand remonstrants against woman suffrage, there were only two hundred and eleven this year. But, though the Massachusetts House has gone against the measure, the Maine House has shown itself more progressive by voting for it; and in Nevada both Houses of the legislature have voted to submit the question to the people as a constitutional amendment.

OUR former consort, Unity, has undertaken a new experiment. It has enlarged its physical proportions: it has lengthened its keel and increased its tonnage. It is still registered as Unity; but it carries a "New" pennant at the mast, and is the flagship of another fleet. All of which, dropping the nautical metaphor, means that our contemporary has doubled its size and its price, and has become the recognized weekly organ of the American Liberal Congress. An official announcement of Rev. H. W. Thomas, president of the congress, to this effect appears in the first number of New Unity. In the present state of business it is somewhat hazardous for a journal to raise its price, even if it increases its size as a compensation; and this step must be considered as an evidence of the courage of New Unity, and its faith in its enterprise. It has attempted a task of great difficulty, that of uniting the independent churches in the West into organic activity. It has not been an easy task to unite Unitarians in organic work; and it will be still more difficult to unite independent churches, each of which has constituted a denomination by itself. There can be no question that organic union is what the independent churches need; but we think it would add much more to their strength, and more to the strength of liberal religion, to join their forces to those of some of the existing liberal organizations. Nothing is less needed than a new denomination.

WHILE we admire, therefore, the courage of Unity and its managers, we must express the fear that the Liberal Congress will be diverted from the original object proposed by it. At the outset it sought to represent a federation of different liberal religious organizations. That was a grand idea, and there are ways in which it could be realized. Each one of the States which forms the American Union is strengthened by its union with the other States, while the nation is strengthened by the consolidation of its parts. It would be a great help to each of the liberal religious bodies of America, and a strengthening of the liberal cause as a whole, if some such religious federation could be achieved. But now we fear that the Liberal Congress will become simply another new denomination, with a private purse and a private flag and an independent manifesto. Can a new liberal denomination be successful without diverting churches from affiliations already established, and what is gained by doing it? In the work of educating and developing liberal religious sentiment the New Unity has our warmest sympathy. The energy and faith it represents cannot be unfruitful, but an endeavor to create a new denomination would sacrifice rather than promote it.

THIS WORLDLINESS.

The breach of modern theology and progressive religion as well as sociology and the highest criticism (not the higher criticism) with the Church of the past has been in the acceptance of two terms as legitimate and righteous which were half a century ago significant of the most dangerous heresy, and, by inference, of the deepest depravity; that is, rationalism and worldliness. By slow stages of change the larger share of the people have come to the conviction that to love this world is not a crime, and that the highest exercise of loyalty to God is the best use of our reasoning faculties. Leigh Hunt helped us wonderfully when he invented the phrase "other-worldliness." Words are sometimes like flash-lights that go down a tunnel, and this was one of them. It brought out delicately the fact that a person might be very unworldly and at the same time very other-worldly, and that the real harm could not be in making much of this garden home of ours, but in seeing only the animal side of it. Mrs. Browning helped us with her "Earth and its Praisers":—

"O Earth,
I count the praises thou art worth.
Praised be the mosses soft
In thy forest pathways oft;
And the thorns, which make us think
Of the thornless river brink.
Praised be thy sunny gleams,
And the storm that worketh dreams
Of calm unfinished.

"Earth, we Christians praise thee thus:
Even for the change that comes
With a grief from thee to us;
For thy cradles and thy tombs,
For the pleasant corn and wine,
And summer heat; and also for
The frost upon the sycamore
And hail upon the vine."

This was a distinctive wedding of righteousness and world-love. George Eliot's doctrine of betterment went, perhaps, even farther to change the sentiments of Christians; for she reached very widely with the doctrine that the highest piety is to better the conditions of humanity. This exactly fitted to the encroaching teachings of science. Evolution, directly and indirectly, laid its emphasis on the environments, the this-world power for good and evil. No contrast could be greater than that between churches trying to fit people for another world and a church with its sleeves rolled up to make this world a decent one for souls to be born into. Yet that is just the contrast we have seen worked out in a lifetime. In every direction we find the doctrine of believing certain views about the unseen relegated to the rear of active service in the cause of social evolution. The abolition of poverty is a doctrine more discussed than the Trinity, and the question of profit-sharing shakes up the religious audience that is utterly asleep as to regeneration and baptism. Those who dream that the outlook is most hopeful toward religious pageantry find that the social agitation is too stout for them. There is very little present drift toward ethical fossilism.

Rationalism comes to the front with secularism, and the popes argue with us on our own plane. The encyclicals from Rome are the best illustration of the change from a despair and contempt of this world to an exalted hope and nery determination to save this world here and now. The latest crusade has been, not to conquer the East by force and create unity of belief from the Tiber to the Euphrates, but an effort to find a basis of union for the East and West in active beneficence. It is only casually that, in his appeals for social and political progress and this-worldliness, we catch in the pope's recent messages a gleam of the other world and its supreme importance.

Have we broken with Jesus? Did he not say: "Seek first the kingdom of heaven, and all things shall be added unto you. . . . Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on?" Did he not hold up the life and conduct of the raven as an ideal for man? Were we not pointed to the lilies that do not spin, and yet are clothed finer than Solomon? Well, science also has something to say about the lilies; and that is that no more constant and perfect weaving was ever done than that which brings into shape and glory of beauty the commonest flower, while there is no sociological system that involves more persistent toil and a measurable foresight than that of the birds. These are illustrations of this-worldliness, and they are also illustrations of the divine wisdom in nature. So that, if we are compelled to say that the Christian system is really something very else, we need not allow that the system of "our Father who art in the universe" forbids worldly wisdom. But is not the real lesson of Jesus a sharp contrast drawn for those who live in selfish indulgence in wealth and covetousness of that of others? And this is exactly where the modern revolt has brought us. It is a new presentation of a very old doctrine that to feed his own body is not the chief end of man, but neither is it the chief end of man to save his own soul. As Carlyle puts it, the first question is whether his dirty little soul is worth saving. And the best way to find out is whether he is willing to work for the souls of others; and science insists on adding their bodies, too. It relates the parable of the lilies this way: Behold the lilies of the field, how they spin and toil! for they weave in the sunbeam, and they weave in the soil. And, lo! not one of them lives to itself; for they breathe out their perfume for all the world, and their beauty goes into souls and poems and character.

Whatever the oldest gospel may be, the latest gospel is the gospel of wealth, that "no one owns what he gathers, but is a trustee of God in charge of so much as is intrusted to him." And no man owns himself; for has not nature (God-effort) worked these past five hundred millions of years to bring about the anthropoid and the anthropos, the "upward-looker" over the downward-looking beast? So it is that he who drives the thirteen million horses that drag Vanderbilt's engines across a continent daily, and he who spins a poem for the Atlantic, and he who shovels coal into a cellar,—all alike are under obligation together, and each according to the talents intrusted to him.

It is significant that our colleges have nearly all opened physical laboratories for the study of mind,—body and mind together. And henceforth it is to be recognized that you cannot dissect the soul from the body and save it, while the body is left to hunger and filth. We shall never hear again the doctrine that this is a wretched, damned world. Theology never was anything apart from science, and it never will be. Older theology was vitally one with older science. Modern science, admitted, has made inevitable a modern theology and modern religion. The science of environment and heredity drive us perforce to a religion of improved tenement-houses, fewer cathedrals and more hospitals, sociology in place of theology, and a determination to abolish poverty. Other-worldliness has been enormously minified, and worldliness has become the ideal of the Church.

The great episode of God and immortality that has occupied the thought of the centuries, is it to be relegated to the myths? Are we henceforth only to have great nature and the life in hand? There is no reason for the outcry that we are becoming materialists or forgetting God. The summing-up of the charge of Jesus was, Work out your own salvation because God works in you. Never before was the fact so vivid as now that this is not a purposeless universe, a soulless evolution. We are led by science to see that God-will has always worked in the universe, that Purpose has led on the lower to the higher, and that to work with God is the only wise aim. God and immortal trust in God remain. They are the inspiration of our hope, not, as before, the end. We look forward, not to rest in God and eternal peace, but to power in and from God-union, and eternal evolution of unselfish manhood.

THE NORWEGIAN BILL.

The legislature of the State of Massachusetts is once more asked to pass a bill to permit the Norwegian system of selling intoxicating liquors. The word "permit" in the title of the bill needs to be emphasized. The bill is not mandatory. The system is not compelled to be introduced throughout the State or in any places where, under the local option law, prohibition has been adopted. But the fact is that in most of the cities of Massachusetts the vote, with very few exceptions, has annually been for license. Recognizing this fact, the question arises, if half a dozen cities in the State are determined to have license, what form of license law shall be accepted?

It is to meet such conditions that the Norwegian Bill was introduced in the Massachusetts legislature last year. The details of the system have been fully explained in our columns, and also the modifications thought desirable in introducing the law in this country. The bill passed the House, and was defeated by only one vote in the Senate.

As now drafted, the bill is considered an improvement over that of last year in some respects. The hours of sale have been shortened, and the number of licenses which may be given has been placed at one in three thousand instead of one in two thousand. It is also provided that in case a company organized for the sale of liquor fails, or in case the company is not organized in any city where the Norwegian system has been adopted, another vote may be taken at the next annual election in such city instead of waiting three years, as is the case where the company is organized and maintained. Another provision devotes the first profits received to the creation of a reserved fund to protect the capital; but it is impossible, under the features of the bill, to get more than 5 per cent. profit.

It is to be noted that the conditions for the enforcement of the Norwegian Bill, as here proposed, are more favorable than for the enforcement of any other system of license. The saloon is taken out of politics. Cities or towns adopting it are given authority to employ a prosecuting officer; and an opportunity is given, likewise, to employ an additional police force by appropriating a portion of the net profits of the system for this purpose.

The Norwegian Bill is an attempt, made by men who have very earnestly and thoroughly studied the methods adopted in Norway and Sweden, to reduce the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquor. The value of the bill as a temperance measure may be gauged by the attitude of the liquor interest toward it. They have no fear of prohibition measures, for they know that they cannot be passed in the cities and large towns, and, if passed, that they cannot be enforced. But the Norwegian Bill makes them turn pale. It is a blow aimed straight at the saloon. As the bill is simply a permissive one, and requires a vote of cities or towns adopting it, it is in the line of the existing Local Option Law. It can only be applied to cities and towns where license now exists. Under these circumstances we hope that this bill, so favorable to temperance, public order, and good government, will pass. Let it, at all events, have a trial.

MARCH AND MARBLES.

Children have a calendar of their own which seems perfectly independent of the weather. How they know that March is the time to play marbles, or that March has arrived, is always a mystery. Rarely indeed does one see a group of children at marbles in February; but with the first dawn of the next month the boys, as they dress, fill their pockets with marbles till they bulge out in their fatness. All through the streets of Boston they were playing before March was twenty-four hours old, shooting them past little banks of snow or over scraps of hard, dirty ice. Hollows were scooped out of the frozen earth, and red were the fingers at play in the cold.

The girls with their skipping-ropes were not far behind the boys with their marbles; and a little later they will be trundling hoops, and marking off diagrams on the sidewalks and jumping from one division to another in "hop Scotch" and similar games.

When the warm spring days come, and it is a luxury to sit on doorsteps or on the young grass, the old Greek game of jackstones will spread through the cities; for it is not a common country play. During the long June twilights the little ones from the streets gather on the broad piazzas of Hull House in Chicago and play by the hour, undismayed and undisturbed by the inmates of that delightful home, and apparently thinking that the roomy porch is for their special pleasure. So in every city of any size they seize on any place that offers a chance for this ancient game. Later in the year there will be ball games of various kinds, kite-flying, and in the country merry times with Jack-o'-lanterns.

A love of these games helps to develop an alert eye, a skill of hand, and self-control. They are not always free from temptations to cheat. But, on the whole, boys left to themselves are pretty fair in their games; and the one caught cheating receives the upbraiding that he deserves. Games that have a happy mixture of chance with skill are usually found most interesting. Marbles would not be half so delightful if the muddy depressions were absolutely symmetrical. It is the opportunity to circumvent chance by a good play that gives zest. But, unhappily, there is now and then an evil side to even childish sports. Marble-playing develops a kind of gambling spirit which is unwholesome; and other games give frequent rise to rough words, bad temper, and, as the boys grow older, to betting over the results of contests. The stakes, naturally, are not high, and may be missing, the mere "I bet you he will" answering for the same thing; but the tendency is there. For this reason the children's almanac should be studied by the parents, unless they are already familiar with it. They should intersperse quotations varied from the old farmer's almanac, such as: "About this time warn the boys not to play marbles 'for keeps.'" "Look out now for danger from the jumping-rope. Warn the girls to skip, and not to jump." "From this time on for a few weeks keep an oversight of foot-ball and head off roughness." "Good time for planting lessons in politeness during tennis season." So the bits of advice might be sandwiched in up to the very fall; for even the innocent pumpkin, in the hands of a naughty boy, may frighten half a neighborhood, when he is left to his own ways.

We read with delight of kings who are caught playing horse with their babies, and of learned men throwing aside books for romps with the children; but too few American fathers and mothers enter enough into the good times of their boys and girls. They lose quite as much as the children in genuine good times, and they rob the young people of the pleasantest memories; for nothing is more delightful than to remember that in youth a wise father and a sympathetic mother shared in the fun and frolic, guiding with invisible reins of authority and shielding from danger by the strong arms of love. A boy whose father can beat him at jackstones, a girl whose mother has taught her to skate, often find in these simple things a pride and respect for their parents that would be amusing, were it not so real. It is a wholesome pride; and from that simple soil a deeper and truer respect is sure to spring, closely bound with the bonds of affection.

FAITH FOR TO-DAY.

The schoolmasters of life are abroad, giving us revelations of the eternal word,—not written in ink, nor in the passing alphabets of men, but moulded in the rocks, absorbed in rains and dew through myriad years, and struck with infinite sweep across the starry track of heaven.

As these revelations become clear to us, and by their majesty and splendor force themselves upon our attention, it is needful that we should adjust our minds to receive them.

Men and women to-day must either remain intellectually behind the age, their worship vague, tending to symbolism and ceremonialism, or else they must go forward with the advancing sweep of new knowledge, beneath the opening veil, along the wondrous corridors of the new temple of light, until they discover new hope, new trust, new faith.

Faith fit for to-day, a complete belief, must be not only clear to the mind, at one with the facts, but alive with the quickening vitality that belongs to absolute sincerity and the new force given by a better apprehension of the nearness of God.

Such a faith, while it has through many ages shone out in exceptional souls, unexplained, in flights of spiritual rapture, has now an opportunity to reasonably establish itself. It is to be found in thousands of hearts already made glad and strong and happy by its power. It is to be found hinted at in our journals and periodicals and records of passing events. The history of man's discovery of himself has been more intricate, more filled with dramatic incident, more exciting and marvellous, than any story of Stevenson's or Doyle's or Weyman's. We have been plunged in spiritual mysticism, and almost lost the reality of daily life; in fanaticism, and gone wild over many and many an entrancing illusion; in materialism, and lost every ennobling ideal; in scientific pessimism, and believed we were not only the descendants of apes, but destined for nothing even so good in the future. But at last the perplexing tangle has been restored to order; and man now knows himself as that which the teacher from Galilee, with prophetic insight, proclaimed him to be,—knows it not as an inspired vision, but as a well-established truth, with the evidence of the minute investigation of science, the able reasonings of philosophy, the laboriously wrought out experience of all the past. "What am I?" he cries to-day, and answers his own question with joyous heart: "I am a member of the mighty family of God. My genealogy includes the myriad living forms of nature's host, my inheritance the perfection of my Father, God. I stand upon this earth, and all within is mine; for I am of it, flesh and bone and pulsing heart. The dews have fed the flowers and the bees gathered the honey that has left its sweetness on my lips, the strength of the rugged rock dissolved in the pattering rain has strengthened me. I look up to the heavens, and they are mine. The constellations blaze and the stars sing, moved by the same power that moveth me. I am of this mighty whole. In the midst of the Infinite I rest secure. Root in the earth, stem in the air, flower in the sky,—one unity."

In the faith for to-day the modern man believes himself not an isolated individual, but an integral part of the great human race, all men of one spirit. No person so unimportant as not to affect the whole, all to be led on together to the stature of the highest.

"O rich and wondrous man, thou art the palace of sight and sound! Thou carriest in thy senses the morning and the night and the unfathomable galaxy. In thy heart thou hast the never-failing power of love, in thy brain the ever-widening thought of God, in thy soul the light of endless life."

Musings.

As a boy, I felt the greatest sympathy with Daniel when cast in the lions' den. It was in some respects worse than being cast into a fiery furnace, like Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; for, if the trio had not been miraculously protected, consciousness would have been immediately extinguished. But to be cast into a den of lions, which are known to prefer a meat diet to a vegetable one, and to have the animals rouse from indifference, smack their lips, and manifest a personal interest in the new-comer by opening their jaws, showing their teeth, and getting their claws ready to absorb him,—this is an experience which awakens the deepest sympathy in a youthful mind. There is a hymn entitled "Dare to be a Daniel"; but I suspect that many of the revivalists who sing it would hesitate about going into a den of lions, which, next to foot-ball, is the most dangerous of recreations. I was therefore a little shocked the other day to know that my friend Alexander Pope, the artist who has acquired a wide reputation as a painter of animals, should have gone unattended into a lion's den, and that a photographer had caught him in the act, and brought the proof to alarm his friends. I have seen Mr. Pope take a block of wood about the size of a soap-box, and go at it so vigorously with a chisel that the chips flew in all directions. Soon the block of wood began to show signs of life. It became evident that something was imprisoned there, and that Mr. Pope was seeking to release it. In a surprisingly short time the liberation was effected; and a beautiful game bird, feathers and all, eventually appeared, and flew to the walls of the Art Club, and then to some sumptuous dining-room, or, spreading its wings with the migratory birds, crossed the ocean and lighted in a Russian palace. But this occupation was not dangerous. The bird did not bite or claw; nor was it dangerous to paint a whole series of game birds, or a whole pack of hunting dogs, except for art lovers who were tempted to buy them. When Mr. Pope, however, began to paint lions, he entered upon a new field of adventure, personal as well as artistic. There are people who like to have their portraits painted; but the king of beasts is not credited with such vanity, and it is a dangerous thing to lionize a lion. To get an imaginary bird out of a block of wood is one achievement, to put a live lion on canvas is another. The problem is to release the bird, but to fix the lion. If the painter attempts to release the lion, he may get fixed himself. To paint a lion when he is caged is to take an unfair advantage: to let the lion out might interfere with his reputation and usefulness as a model. Mr. Pope seems to have compromised by going into the cage himself. People who think that compromises are dangerous might use this as an example, if it had not proved in this case to be a safe adventure. In the photograph I have seen the lion seems literally to be a model of behavior, as noble-looking as Trilby, if not as handsome; and the artist seems to be perfectly at home. Whether he would venture, as Benjamin West did with a cat, to use the lion's tail as a paint brush, I do not know; but I know that this picture has robbed the story of Daniel of all of its supernatural features. I now assume that the Hebrew prophet was an artist, and that he kept the lions still by promising to paint their portraits. Mr. Pope's example introduces a new epoch in painting; and we may expect now to see "life classes" making raids on the menageries, and ambitious young ladies setting up their easels in the cages of lions, tigers, leopards, bears, and boa constrictors, with the result that the animals will be well fed and the artist profession not overcrowded.

Brevities.

We call attention, under "Education," to the meeting of the Folk-lore Society in Boston on Friday night.

A Summer School of Theology is to be held at Cleveland. It is to be hoped that no hot theology will be added to the discomfort of the weather.

The grove meeting at Weirs has become one of our established institutions, and it brings summer appreciably nearer to read that the programme for next July is already being planned.

Dr. Simeon Gilbert, after giving the last twenty years of his life to the service of the Advance, has now retired from the editorship of that journal. Dr. Gilbert has given himself to his editorial work with great earnestness, ability, and devotion.

The Richmond Christian Advocate has some pithy paragraphs. It says: "The man who advertises his business may or may not have an eye to righteousness, but the man who advertises his righteousness is pretty sure to have an eye to business."

The Unitarian society of Greeley, Col., deserves the congratulations it is receiving. It has paid back the last $300 borrowed from the Church Building Loan Fund, and stands now a glad witness to the wisdom and usefulness of this form of church aid.

The Central Christian Advocate, in speaking of the Tuskegee Conference, says: "The influence of these conferences, elevating the social and moral standards of the Negro, ministering to his self-respect and self-support, and in many ways helping him to a higher manhood, cannot well be overestimated."

We print Mr. Dillingham's second letter from Tuskegee in regard to the Negro conference. One may judge from these interesting articles how wide-spread is the influence of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in the Black Belt. Such an institution deserves a great deal more support than it gets.

The Examiner, in speaking of the attempt in Hoboken to suppress Col. Ingersoll's lecture, says: "It was learned a good while ago that the Bible and the Christian religion do not need the machinery of the law for their defence. We Baptists have never believed in persecution, whether of Baptists or of infidels. There is a better way."

The Catholic Review finds something in Unitarianism to emulate: "The Unitarians have a 'Mission Committee' that will not only send publications of that creed free to applicants, but they go to the additional expense of paying for advertisements in secular periodicals to tell the public so. Their desire to make known their doctrines ought to stir up Catholics with emulation."

The Boston Herald has devoted a good deal of attention to the pastoral letter of the Episcopalians bishops. In a recent editorial it said: "Evidently, then, Bishop Potter is a little sensible to the saving grace of ridicule at having been caught fooling with an old blunderbuss, and attempting to create a theological panic with it, as though it were a legitimate modern weapon."

The fund for the memorial to Dr. Andrew P. Peabody amounts now to something over $3,000, of which the greater part will be put into a fund for needy students or a scholarship. This is a fitting remembrance of the ever-ready sympathy and kindness which gave Dr. Peabody so strong a hold on Harvard students. Any graduates or others who desire to increase the usefulness of this fund by their gifts may send them to Amory A. Lawrence, treasurer, 68 Chauncy Street, Boston.

Marion D. Shutter, D.D., and Rev. S. M. Crothers begin the new monthly series of "Life Studies," issued by James H. West. The one teaches trust and action, and bids us remember that a life of usefulness is a life of honor: the other tells us that there are no circumstances without their divine possibilities, and that faithful service brings with it a deathless hope. This little series deserves all the good words that have been said of it. The next number will be by Rev. W. C. Gannett.

The itinerant minister found a defender recently in one of two children. Said one to the other, "Which would you sooner be, a minister's child or an every-day man's child?" "A minister's child," was the answer. The nurse interposed, saying: "There are pleasant things and unpleasant ones in a minister's family. It is unpleasant to be always moving round and leaving your friends, for example." "Yes," was the answer; "but that doesn't matter, for it helps your geography." Methodist ministers will say "Amen!"

The Executive Committee of the Indian Rights Association passed a resolution recently expressing strong approval of "the humane and efficient efforts exerted by Capt. Constant Williams, United States Army, Acting Agent of the Navajo Indians, for the relief of destitution and suffering among this deserving but unfortunate people, who, through no fault of their own, are reduced to such extreme need as to become proper subjects for aid, both from the government and the charitable public." Capt. Williams provided, at his own risk, ten thousand pounds of flour for the relief of the Navajos in their distress; but the obligation was subsequently assumed by the government.

It is seldom that a church whose pastor has just removed to another field calls another minister to its pulpit within a week after the instalment of their former pastor at his new post. But Christ Church, Dorchester, has just achieved this distinction. Its devoted and beloved pastor, Rev. W. R. Lord, was called to Unity Church, St. Paul. The installation services took place February 27, and were recorded in last week's Register. The Monday following, March 4, at a meeting of Christ Church an account of the installation services at St. Paul was read to a sympathetic and interested audience. At the same meeting a call was extended to Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge of Harvard, Mass. One reason of this promptness was that the effort to obtain a successor to Mr. Lord began a month before his departure, and no one was more interested than he that the church should promptly find the right man.

Pro and Con.

NICHOLAS TILLINGHAST.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In J. W. C.'s review of "Potter's Lectures and Sermons," by Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D., in the Register of February 28, is a mistake in the name of the first principal of the Bridgewater State Normal School, which was Nicholas Tillinghast instead of Nathaniel. Having seen the same mistake in print a few years ago, I think it should be corrected.

Mr. Tillinghast married for his second wife Ruby H. Potter, sister of the late Rev. W. J. Potter.

By making this correction in your columns, you will oblige

THE SAN DIEGO CHURCH.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Your readers are aware of the great calamity that has befallen the Unitarian society in San Diego, Cal., in the loss by fire of its beautiful church. The struggles and sacrifices of years on its part, the generosity of the Women's Alliance, the American Unitarian Association, and Eastern friends, have not been consumed in the flames. The society will live, and do its work.

But it is homeless. It must have another and a suitable home. No word of appeal for help has reached my eye. Knowing the value of the place and the work that has been done there, no formal plea for help should be needed. The situation pleads for itself.

B. F. McDANIEL.

CLOTHING FOR ARMENIAN REFUGEES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Earnest appeals from trustworthy persons are coming daily from Armenia for aid for the refugees from the districts where the terrible massacre took place. The refugees are mostly men, as the girls and women were brutally killed by the soldiery. The entire family sewing is done by the hands of the women in the Armenian home, and now that their clever hands are gone there is special need. No ready garments are on sale in their little villages; and, even if there were, they have no money left to buy them. They are sorrowful, homeless, wanderers, suffering from cold and poverty, with no hope of bettering their condition for months to come.

Arrangements have been made by which clothing, second hand or new, for men and boys, can be sent from here to Constantinople at a moderate rate. If persons having garments that they are willing to give for this cause will mail a postal card with name and address to Mr. M. H. Gulesian, 16 Waltham Street, he will send a man to get them.

It is hoped that an ever-generous public will give a quick and warm response to this appeal.

DENOMINATIONAL ADDRESSES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

A series of denominational addresses having been given recently in the Arlington church, and the practice of having such addresses in our liberal churches having been criticised by a correspondent in a recent number of the Register, I should like to say a word in favor of them.

The addresses in Arlington excited the interest of the entire Protestant community. The large congregations showed that the people want to know what the different churches stand for. A great many members of other churches attended the entire series. At the last service, when an address on Unitarianism was given, there was a good attendance of the people of other churches, in spite of very stormy weather. The message of Unitarianism was probably heard by many who had not heard it before. This, however, is not the main point. For the meetings were planned, as I take it such meetings ought always to be planned, not primarily to secure a hearing for Unitarianism from otherwise unwilling ears, but to offer an opportunity to the people to hear the different interpretations of Christianity expounded from the inside by men who believe them. And the fact that no other church thus opens its pulpit to men of different creeds is the very reason why we ought to do it. If we do not do it, what claim have we on the name "liberal"? The world does not believe that there is such a thing as a church so liberal that it is ready to hear all sides, and so fearless that it invites examination, and fears only evasion and equivocation. But is not that just the kind of church we Unitarians want to build up? And is it not incumbent upon us to set an example in such matters? We have enough of the Christianity that will hear no side but its own. Now let us have a little of the Christianity that is not merely willing, but anxious, to hear all sides.

Undoubtedly there are some dangers and evils in these courses of denominational addresses. The danger most to be feared is that of fostering the mistaken idea that intellectual belief is the supreme thing in religion.

Another danger is that of evasion and equivocation on the part of those giving the addresses. No Unitarian should be guilty of this, for honesty of thought and speech are "nominated in the bond" of our faith. And, if the Orthodoxy presented at such times is different from the popular Orthodoxy, the reasons for its being so are none of our affair.

The course of addresses in Arlington did much good; and the experiment is, I believe, worth a trial by more of our churches.

SHORT PASTORATES!

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

We rejoice at such reports as that on "Long Pastorates," by "A. M. B." in a recent issue. Alas! there is another side to the story. And I ask, Why is it we do not have more "long pastorates"? Is it because we do not have more John W. Chadwicks and George M. Bartols, or is it because we do not have more parishes like the Brooklyn and Lancaster parishes? I fear there is fault on both sides.

Not a million miles beyond the moon there is a Unitarian parish of which the following is the best that can be said, I fear. Organized September, 1847, it called its first pastor, Rev. —, Oct. 15, 1847. He remained to Oct. 15, 1849. Church was without a pastor until Jan. 1, 1851, when Rev. — began his ministry, which lasted to Jan. 1, 1852. Church was without pastors from that date to Sept. 22, 1852, at which time Rev. — began his pastorate, which lasted to Jan. 1, 1855. Church was without pastors from Jan. 1, 1855, to Nov. 17, 1856. Called at that time Rev. —, who served until March 27, 1861. Church was closed from March 27, 1861, to April 13, 1862, from which date had "occasional supplies" until March, 1863. Rev. — was settled from March, 1863, to April, 1865. Church was closed one year to March, 1866. Rev. — was settled from April, 1866, to July 1, 1867. The next minister, another Rev. —, began his work June 19, 1872, and closed it Oct. 18, 1873. Church candidate from October, 1873, to August, 1874. Rev. — served as pastor from August, 1874, to June, 1875. Rev. — settled in Dec. 16, 1875, and served until June 1, 1879. Church was closed from June 1, 1879, to Feb. 28, 1882. Rev. — served from this date until June 1, 1887. Church candidate until April 1, 1888. Rev. — was pastor from April 1, 1888, to April 1, 1890. Church candidate from April, 1890, to April, 1891. Rev. — settled April 1, 1891, and was unsettled June 1, 1892. Church candidate until Nov. 1, 1892, when Rev. All-none Too-good began his ministry, which closed Feb. 1, 1895.

A study of the above facts shows the following results. Church has been in existence a trifle over forty-seven years. It has had thirteen ministers in all, and their pastorates aggregate twenty-nine years and one month, which leaves about eighteen years spent in candidating, hearing supplies, or with church doors closed. The average pastorate has been less than two years and three months.

"Can any other church make a similar showing?" ALL-NONE TOO-GOOD.

ON A MIDWINTER RAINBOW.

BY BURTON M. BALCH.

O winter, from thy blast has all hope fled?
Is every quick'ning thought beneath a pall Laid, like the gay-hued foliage of fall,
Dull, sodden, and despaired? Is fancy dead?
The winds wail wildly, and within its bed
Each stream is ice-locked. Winter witches call Through solemn grove, now but a wind-swept hall.
The fields with rime are rigid. Hope is dead.

"Hope lives" is written in the winter sky.
Illumed with the sunset's roseate hue,
An arching bow of violet and blue
And all the spectrum colors, and behind
Its pale companion shadow, greet the eye,
God's lasting promise unto humankind.

EVERY-DAY PHILOSOPHY.

BY REV. WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

V.

It is the mark of a vulgar mind to estimate all things by the standard of a coarse utility. Such a person ranks the hen above the humming-bird.

Geometry is the science of forms in space. Algebra is the science of motions in time. Psychology is the science of forms and motions in consciousness. Logic is the science of the structure of knowledge, the science of the functional forms of the mind.

Grace is the unresisting obedience of the physical tenement to the spiritual tenant.

Art is the revelation of the rational to the sensitive. What philosophy abstractly demonstrates, art concretely exhibits.

Why do so few gather the ripe fruits of wisdom? Because looking on is easier than planting, and harvesting is harder than either.

There are three supreme safeguards against pessimism. They are various employment, a beloved companion, faith in God. Either of these, if earnestly improved, ends in our reconciliation to life. With all three in experience the problem of reconciliation exists not, but has vanished in the joy of varied uses and the constant revelations of progress.

It requires great art to deceive a man without lying to him, but no art at all to lie to him without deceiving him.

One who has a sense of fitness is often tempted at a fashionable party to ask, "Is the music an accompaniment to the conversation here, or is the conversation an accompaniment to the music?"

When politicians are asked ethical questions, they are pretty sure to bungle badly in their replies. "What is merit?" was once demanded of Lord Palmerston. He answered, "The opinion one man has of another." This, plainly, is a gross blunder; for that opinion may be utterly erroneous. The merit of any man is the true measure of his worth. It is not the chance opinion another entertains concerning him, but it is the estimate he deserves to have formed of him in accordance with the facts of his character and conduct. Public opinion is only a measure assigned to our merit. The merit itself is what we are in the sight of God. He whose vices outweigh his virtues has a balance of demerit, and therefore merits blame and penalty in place of praise and reward. The equation for the sum of our merits and demerits is the universal reaction justly due to our personal action. Surely, this is something quite distinct from "the opinion one man has of another."

NO HOPE TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE.

The more we admire and love and expect and strive for, the greater our energy and happiness. The loss of enthusiasms bequeath not peace, but torpor or irritation and despair. We can be disenchanted into indifference or into contempt, but not into calm. There is nothing fuller of enchantment than calm. The departure of eager admirations and aspirations never heralds the entrance of love and repose, but it precedes the advent of hate on the heels of resentful disappointment. The old stoicism which began as a lofty scorn for the things most coveted by mankind ended in the cynicism which was an angry bitterness toward mankind themselves. Nothing can make good to us the decay of any cherished ideal except the replacement of it by the birth of a better one. True wisdom and true blessedness follow only that united act of faith and hope and love which steadily believes that the best which is conceivable in thought is destined to be actualized in experience. If the ideal good which man so vividly feels, and so intensely desires to see converted into reality, be forever unattainable, then a sardonic mockery is organized in the very centre of his being. To believe this is to be an atheist or a diabolist. For faith in God is identical with faith in Perfection. The real must be reconcilable with the Best. We should be superior to God if we could think of something better than that which God has thought. And it is impossible that what God has thought should be non-existent.

THE TUSKEGEE CONFERENCE.

BY REV. PITT DILLINGHAM.

II.

Let us now turn for a moment to the workers' conference of Thursday. Some seventy-five colored teachers were present, and perhaps twenty-five white teachers, for the most part principals of various large schools in the South. Dr. Frissell of Hampton presided, and opened the conference by saying that each school had its own particular work, and that the forenoon would be occupied in getting short reports from the twenty or thirty schools represented, the afternoon would be given to the discussion of subjects. Mr. Washington was called upon to strike a key-note, and say something for Tuskegee. He declared that the real problem of Tuskegee was the real problem of the South,—how to get close to the people. The danger of a great institution was in getting separated from the daily life round about. Tuskegee therefore tries to start local farmers' conferences. It has a women's meeting every week, in the neighboring town of Tuskegee; and those who come to market to stand or sit and smoke and gossip the day away are taken into a hall, and given practical talks on cabin and farm life. Tuskegee now has in its Bible Training School the ministers of the neighborhood, both colored and white, some coming to learn, others coming to teach. Our stress is upon the industrial side of life, but the rivalry between the industrial and academic department is generous. We are trying, above all, to put brain and dignity into common occupations. With the coming of the new inventions the Negro is in danger of losing his old work. Four-fifths of the girls here have been helped by the work of their mothers at the wash-tub: what part of the new kind of laundrying done by steam and electricity will the Negro have? The barber-shops in the North are already lost. The Negro knows how to whitewash; but can he become a house decorator? The old mammy got her living as a nurse: can the Negro become a modern trained nurse? Let us not forget that on the farms and at these homely occupations the masses must earn their living. Can we help them to do it?

Dr. Saterfield of the Scotia School for Girls in North Carolina gave an interesting account of his attempt to make the home fundamental, to train his three hundred or five hundred girls for better home life. "Into all our industrial work," he said, "we put the domestic idea; but we are not sending servants North, we are not manufacturing servants: we are not making followers, but leaders, people who can make their own homes."

Mrs. Logan of Tuskegee at this point made a deeply earnest plea for the children. "The various institutions," she said, "were looking after everything else, how to care for pigs and chickens and colts; but who was to prepare the colored mother for her greatest responsibility?"

The next report was from Berea College, Kentucky, and was given by Prof. Dodge. Berea stands alone in its successful education of whites and blacks together. It has a full college course, as well as primary and preparatory courses, and also a model school for teachers in its normal course. Said Prof. Dodge: "The Negro must be taught something besides common labor. We must have no caste system in education: the door must be kept open to the college chair and the seat in Congress."

Bennett College of North Carolina reported its first aim to be Christian education, its second to be intellectual training. Prof. Silsby, treasurer for Talladega, reported similar aims, and showed a large amount of missionary work being done by the students of Talladega.

President Johns of Clark University made a brief report of their preparatory college and normal courses, and laid special stress on the industrial side. Two hours are given every afternoon to manual training. Two of the students, or graduates, have recently put a steam plant into Spellman Seminary. The inspector from St. Louis declared this work first-class; and Clark steam-fitters and plumbers are especially busy, and have all the contracts they can fill.

At the close of the morning conference Mr. Simpson, the white planter from Snow Hill, was once more called upon, this time to speak of the educational work he was engaged in on his plantation. With the help of money from white patrons the public school term had been increased, the white people were opening their eyes and becoming interested. "We should work," said Mr. Simpson, "for the co-operation of the Southern whites. It can be had. Don't drive them away. Bring them to see it all. It is a mistake to suppose that the whites want the ignorant Negro: they want the trained and thrifty Negro."

Miss Georgie Washington, a graduate of Hampton, described her interesting work at Mt. Meigs, how she had gained the co-operation of the white people and raised $300 to buy three acres of land and build a school-house. The school-house proving too small, the neighboring church was now the school; and she was hoping before long to be able to adequately house two hundred children.

Miss Bowin, another graduate of Hampton, spoke of a work truly remarkable in another part of Mt. Meigs. During the ten years of Miss Bowin's work she has collected $800 a year from the Negroes, making $8,000 in all.

Mr. Kingston of the Reformed Presbyterian church described the work at Selma, especially the religious character of it. No scholars were allowed to come in who were not church-goers. Attendance was much cut down by this. Much was done in the way of committing Bible verses, so that children of six and eight years old, he said, had a better knowledge of the Bible than the preachers.

The Montgomery Industrial School was well and interestingly represented by Miss Beard. This school is strong on its practical side. Miss Tapley described the work done for girls at Spellman Seminary. Fiske University was represented by Prof. Harris. He told the story of the work of the graduates, one of them winning a Ph.D. at Berlin, and described the newly formed sociological club which is giving special attention to vital statistics in the city of Nashville. Fisk University goes in for the higher training, and puts no emphasis on industry.

The colored school at Calhoun was represented by Mr. Dillingham, who is acting as principal of the school on account of the illness of Miss Thorn, who has recently been compelled to go North; also by Miss Showers, the head of the academic department, and by Mr. Lemon, who has charge of the Calhoun farm. Stress was put upon the fact that Calhoun was essentially not a school in the old sense, but a settlement among the plantation Negroes, aiming to identify itself with the life about it, and to touch that life on all sides.

A distinguished visitor from the North, Miss Dawes, daughter of Senator Dawes of Massachusetts, begged all the smaller schools present not to try to become great institutions, and laid effective emphasis on the way in which the small school is needed to supplement the work of the large one. She also besought the Negro to drop his self-consciousness, to forget social distinctions.

The afternoon discussion of subjects took up Mr. Washington's problem of how to greaten and dignify common things. Mr. Washington thought that, if geometry was taught a boy, it ought to show itself in straight corn-rows. Again, he said: "We people in the South are a hungry people: the colored people are underfed. If we study chemistry, then let it show itself in forty bushels of corn to the acre."

Another question discussed was how to keep in contact with the graduates. There is danger that the alumni of the large schools may get discouraged and go to pieces. A friendly letter, above all a visitor from the school, means more than can be measured.

The last subject of discussion was the question of how to overcome prejudice between the whites and the blacks. Prof. Patterson, colored man, professor of the normal school, Montgomery, said that in Montgomery enemies had been turned into staunch friends by working together in business. Says another: "Let us avoid the social question of equality, teach manhood; and, as fast as merit shows up, prejudice will break down. There is prejudice on both sides. Keep out of politics, make any concession consistent with manhood. Let white men know you are glad you are a Negro. Don't push, but be proud of your blood."

One man described the union of whites and blacks in Greenborough in voting for a good mayor. Afterward the whites assisted in raising $500 for the extension of the school term.

Mr. Washington had a word on commercial intercourse as the great battering-ram to bring down social prejudice.

A certain editor in this place has grown broader since all his copy began to pass through the hands of a colored boy. This editor now sometimes sends copy to be filled in by this colored boy.

Another man added that sectional lines were defaced by the feet of those crossing the lines. Let the Negro get rid of his own prejudice and self-consciousness.

Thus closed the farmers' and the workers' conference of 1895.

There is no space left to speak of the meeting held Wednesday evening in the school chapel (may Tuskegee soon get a chapel adequate to its needs, and entirely safe for such occasions). The visitors from the North had opportunity to see on this occasion all the students of the institute, and hear them sing plantation songs. Addresses were made by Rev. George L. Chaney, by Dr. H. B. Frissell of Hampton, Dr. Saterfield of Scotia, Prof. Dodge of Berea, Mr. Dillingham of Calhoun, and others.

How impossible for one coming to Tuskegee for the first time to give an adequate account of these two days! They meant to all present the new South, the industrial South, the new education.

At the workers' conference nothing was more noticeable than the way in which modern industrial education is taking the lead, and modifying the old-fashioned, so-called higher training for the Negro. There was generous feeling all around, however; and doubtless the older institutions have something of a task on their hands in blocking too hasty a rush toward mere trade-school ideas.

As to the farmers' conference, it was the willingness of the Negro to know and state the worst about himself, his refusal to waste any time in talking up his grievances, his coming sense of self-dependence, his singular mingling of patience and hope, and, I must add, the humor with which he views his situation. Very sadly and grimly in earnest at one moment these men seemed to be, the next moment there was a flash and roar of laughter. Some of our friends from the North were much shocked by this, and undoubtedly it means a light mind and quickly shifting emotions; but, for my part, I should like to see a little of that humor in the North. It is a saving break in the stress of life down here: without it there would be uprisings and social chaos. With it there is hope, and the balance, the soundness, of the man who can laugh. As I see the farmers' conference riding away on muleback, over those unspeakable Alabama roads, into the gathering darkness of that Wednesday night, I bless the Negro for his irresistible and inextinguishable laughter.

AUGUSTUS CHAPMAN MERRIAM.

BY PROF. J. IRVING MANATT, LL.D.

Dr. Augustus C. Merriam, Professor of Greek Archaeology in Columbia College, died at Athens on the 20th of January, and was buried the next day in the cemetery beyond the Ilissos, where Schliemann sleeps.

Prof. Merriam had gone to spend his Sabbatical year in the land of his loving studies; and it was a cold contracted on the Acropolis, in pursuit of those studies, that passed into pneumonia, and cost his life. The Athenian press has found no words too warm or strong to speak his praises, and estimate his services to archaeology and to Greece. And all these tributes are well bestowed. He held a high place among American Hellenists, and as an editor made valuable contributions to our apparatus of Greek study. More than that, he had become an independent authority in at least one department of archaeological research; namely, epigraphy. The foundation of this special scholarship was laid firm and strong during his year (1887-88) at the head of the American school at Athens,—a year memorable for one of the most brilliant achievements of the American spade in Greece.

On his way to Athens Merriam had visited the historian Curtius at Berlin. Curtius told him that Dr. Milchhöfer—a special student of Attic topography—had just found an important inscription bearing on the site of Ikaria, the birthplace of Attic tragedy, and advised Merriam to follow up the clew. Accordingly, excavations were undertaken on the spot known as sto Dionysio, behind Pentelicus, and not far from Marathon; and, as a result, not only was the site of Ikaria absolutely determined, but there was brought to light a mass of inscriptions, sculptures, and architectural remains of high value and (some of them) of unique interest. The writer, who visited Ikaria two years ago, and studied on the spot the literature of the subject, is not singular in his belief that for many years past no more interesting section of antiquity has been uncovered anywhere than this which Dr. Merriam (ably supported by Dr. Carl D. Buck, now of Chicago University) revealed to the modern world. There, in a mountain glen (twelve hundred feet above sea-level), through which ripples a clear brook, overhung by ivy-mantled plane-trees, until it drops down a precipice of sixty feet into a lower dell,—with the nightingales in full choir at high noon, as we found them,—Ikarian Thespis came honestly by his inspiration; and, if one were seeking an ideal scene for the dawn of the new art, here of all places in Attica he would find it. Merriam's spade vindicated the eternal fitness of things, and added another to the fascinating certainties of old Attic topography. Before him the name Ikaria was a vagrant,—mapped everywhere except where it belonged; and it is provoking enough, three years after his absolute demonstration, to find an English historian of Greek literature, Mahaffy, still putting the deme of Thespis on the borders of Megara. Not that any living man, acquainted with the facts, doubts the demonstration: it is only an instance of ὀφθαλμία, of which no scholar should be guilty.

The discoverer of Ikaria was more than a "grub": he was master of a rare literary style, and nowhere does this find happier use than in his report on the topography and traditions of the ancient deme. That report, if shorn of some matters of detail, would be worthy a place among our school classics.

Dr. Merriam was an ardent Philhellene, not only in his classical enthusiasm, but in his sympathy with the struggling nation of to-day. And, if his last hours were not unconscious, there must have been a singular pathos in his death. For at the moment Athens was on the verge, if not in the very throes, of civil war; and it would appear from the Athenian press that nothing but the timely and spirited intervention of the crown prince (who is also head of the army) saved the capital and the country from scenes of blood and carnage.

His funeral was from the American school and the English church; and all the archaeologists of Athens—Greek, German, and English, as well as American—followed him to his last resting-place, above the Ilissos, where four years ago Dr. Schliemann was laid to rest. There Dörpfeld, Gardner, and Richardson, of the three foreign schools, paid their tributes; and the Greek ephor-general, Kabbadias, pronounced a eulogy, closing with these words: "The Attic soil, which guards the dust of Otfried Müller, of Lenormant, and of Schliemann, shall welcome and keep thee, too, Merriam, in peace."

His Sabbatical year proves longer than he dreamed; and enviable is his resting-place in Agræ, where Artemis first bent bow in the chase, and where the level morning shadows of Hymettus fall. But one place had been more fit,—by the rippling brook of Ikaria, where still in the branches of the ivy-mantled plane

"The Attic bird
Trills her thick-warbled notes the summer long."

Brown University.

FROM LONDON.

This English world was never more interesting than to-day. Yet it is a little difficult to focus the movements that are so suggestive. They lie around 'on every hand. The changes are all along the line of life. All barks seem sinking to another sea.

Nothing, however, is more manifest than the pressure of social necessities, considerations, and sentiments. Whether the humaner feeling and experimenting be the offspring of situations before which people may well stand aghast, it would be too curious to inquire. Fortunately, the problems of common life are more clearly perceived than ever before by such large numbers in England, and are being grappled with in a certain refreshing newness of spirit. One could almost say that the time of the indifferent individual atoms has past, and that this firm pressure of all the material, mental, and moral forces is making us into something more consciously solid and brotherly.

"A subtle chain of countless rings
The next unto the farthest brings."

The other day some of Abou Ben Adhem's tribe met at Toynbee Hall. They were men of the more scholarly and ecclesiastical type of humanizers. They start from sweetness and light. They fly the flag of culture. They are socialists, nevertheless. Some are priests; some, archdeacons; some, bishops, with quite respectable legs well-gaited; some, laymen, veterans and youth; nearly all, university men. And they came to discuss and resolve upon other University Settlements like Toynbee Hall for the salvation of the living human soul in all our large towns, like Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, etc. Socialism is just as real when advocated by such as these as when belabored by a mountebank before a growling mob. In neither presentment is it entirely satisfactory to the spirit critical. But, on the whole, that spirit prefers this æsthetic school to that of bluster, denunciation, and noise. Here thought is soberer, the situation seen in all its formidableness, and the patience rather than the impatience of hope much more manifest.

The University Settlement ideal is good. To build and beautifully furnish a splendid club-house right in the slums, where the sons of Dives may live some weeks or months in the year, and thus learn how Lazarus, with his innumerable progeny, fares in this London, or this Liverpool, or this money-breeding Birmingham of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, does seem a possible, a real means of grace. It is a bridge across the chasm between social extremes. Without the slightest discomfort one class may see in what discomfort the other class are obliged to live. And, as most men have the sensibility of the eye,—are touched by the things they see,—the probability is that sympathy will be called out, that effort will follow, that friendliness will be established, and also that confidence of the poor in the rich, of the ignorant in the cultured, will be evoked. This is the general outline and outlook of the endeavor. It is a worthy enterprise in many or most respects; and yet it has very perceptible limits, and, like almost all our doings, its seamy side.

A good many things came out at Toynbee Hall Conference. Canon Barnett, who presided, emphasized that much was to be learned by those who came to reside in such halls of residence. A forceful, earnest speaker, who seemed to have the gist of the whole human matter in him, himself at the head of a University Settlement, pointed out what were the things our golden youth who condescended to live amid men of low estate needed to learn, even before they came,—certainly before their coming would benefit others or even themselves. They needed to learn that they must put away their sense of superiority,—the consciousness of their superiority in material abundance, of their superior mental culture, and, above all, their great sense of moral superiority. All that this speaker said betrayed, did not try to cover, the fact that he was considerably aware of priggishness of divers sorts on the part of some who came to dwell æsthetically amid the lowly. This must be expected, for many of those who come are fledglings only.

Perhaps the best thing that can be said of this University Settlement movement, evidently growing among us, is that, like many other agencies, it keeps attention turned in the right direction. It is evidently discounted by the fact that all who come must be such short-timers,—a year or two after leaving college or before marriage, then rising up to the kind of heaven whence they came. Few become life heroes or martyrs to the good of the have-nots. To live among our social opposites, and to continue to live among them for them, would bring the blessing now but timidly sought. When the fashion of this thing rises to that passion, we shall have truer brotherhood. "Who is able for these things?" Able or not able, we shall come to them. Even now God is pouring his strength into our weakness.

Last Sunday Unitarianism began to interpret itself simultaneously to all London and its suburbs. It doth not yet appear what the result will be. Every house in the vicinity of our churches, perhaps for a mile around, was bombarded with a set-forth of how we came to be, and where in the great theosophical world we are. I have had some unexploded bombs returned with the crushingly "strange device" quite legible upon them, "Unappreciated." I hope Mr. Crowther will not despair when he learns that one of these rejected missiles is "The Faith of a Free Church"; for it is, notwithstanding its sending back, altogether admirable. Mrs. P. writes to say that she should be much obliged if the "Channing Hall Unitarians would cease leaving pamphlets and papers" at her house, "as she is not a Unitarian, and does not care to receive them." Mrs. S. gives her written assurance that she has no desire to follow us in our "quest after a new religion." Well, it is something to be made aware of so slight a reaction. What the remote effect of our simultaneous rising-up in explanation is a matter of surmise. "The worst policy possible. They will hate us worse than ever," says one. "We are sowing seed that will germinate after a time," says another. "It is the right thing to do," chimes in the third. "I don't think so," says sententious fourth. All the same, we are in the midst of it,—the forward movement. The bitter cold of the first onset last Sunday, February 10, prevented even many of the elect coming to hear their own ministers. Not only their water-pipes, but their theological zeal was frozen up. We hope for better congregations with a rise in temperature, and then—who knows? Perhaps the orthodox admiral will think it best, like Admiral Ting, to offer us all a bag of tricks and capitulate utterly, if we will, like Admiral Ito, guarantee the lives of all old-fashioned believers, and of such Unitarians as, for one reason or another, may be found in nominally orthodox camps. Peace on these terms may not come so early as the middle of March, but on these terms it eventually comes to our liberal Christian churches.

Now, dear American friends, kind attention all round, if you please! The editor of our London Inquirer—bless him!—with a splendid audacity suggests that perhaps you, the readers of my queer letters in the Register this quarter of a century or so, wouldn't mind following your kindly enduring appreciation into an historical act of love and praise. Only last week this bold John Bull of an editor—the mildest of all bulls that were ever pastured on this earth—actually submitted to all England that he "should not be surprised if American friends who read these lines, and who have these many years enjoyed Mr. Farrington's correspondence to the Christian Register, should mail him [we believe that is the correct phrase] substantial thanksgivings and good wishes." How easy it is for all one's natural and acquired meekness to submit to such "timely happy, timely wise" suggestion! Americans have done much for London churches. Go to St. Margaret's at Westminster, and before Archdeacon Farrar carries you away in the spirit see the beautiful windows American friends have placed in that Parliamentary church. Well, here at Richmond an old Boston boy, son of a Washington Street carpenter, is doing his level best to build a beautiful church for a liberal Christian congregation, in perhaps the most charming suburb of London. Is anybody disposed to "mail" him "substantial" aid? To our new church are to be two towers. Shall one of them be the American Tower,—built from base to summit with American good will transmuted into contributions for that end? If anybody at Concord, N.H., East Bridgewater, Mass., Janesville, Wis., Germantown, Pa., or wherever your readers are scattered forth, is moved by either Auld Lang Syne or by other kind prompting, let him or her not resist that influence. After the present Richmond minister has finished his work and gone his way, I imagine that other American preachers will have a welcome prepared for them here, and will, if this audacity builds its tower, rejoice to go in and out beside it as by the Gate Beautiful.

OUR NEW DEPARTURE AND ITS OBLIGATIONS.

BY REV. W. H. FISH.

The Unitarian denomination has recently taken a seemingly "new departure" toward a hoped-for more auspicious future than even their best past; and there has been generally manifested a much increased devotion and consecration to the advancement of the general cause, both in a spiritual and practical way. This improved state of things was, no doubt, largely brought about by the influence of the National Conference held last September at Saratoga, with its marvellous unity of spirit and of enthusiasm for "the religion of Jesus," the chief requirement of which is the love of God and love of man as the bond of union. Beforehand some division was apprehended, but it did not come; and nearly all, if not quite all, were practically of one mind and heart. It was wise to make "the religion of Jesus," rather than any theological or Christological speculations, the basis of fellowship and co-operation; and now what greater, better result than we have ever before witnessed may we not reasonably anticipate?

In proportion to its relative size the Unitarian denomination has been—if it be not now—the richest denomination in Massachusetts. But in its early days it was too much afraid of being thought sectarian and proselyting to do much or to give much money to extend its faith and influence, satisfied to remain at home and enjoy Boston and Cambridge as its most peaceful and happy centre, and almost circumference, not presuming to go abroad to see the people,—especially uninvited! It could not impolitely introduce itself widely into new regions to diffuse its light; and I have preached it and circulated its literature in many a town where it was hardly heard of before, not even through the writings of its great representative, Dr. Channing. Fifty years ago and later on the denomination usually gave some six or eight thousand dollars for its common purposes, including its missionary work; but in 1865 the proposition was suddenly sprung upon them—to their surprise—by the National Conference assembled in New York City, in the noble Dr. Bellows's church, to advance and try to raise $100,000. And it was done with ease. That was the era of a great and memorable awakening and working, presently, let us hope, to be followed by a similar contribution. That $100,000 contribution of 1865 had to be contributed largely, of course, by the very rich and prospering classes, as these have usually had the largest inheritances, the best positions and opportunities in the business world for making money, and are often specially favored by some good fortune,—for all of which, if they have only been honest and honorable, they may well be glad and grateful; but now, having the money, and much more of it, in many cases, than they know how to use in selfish ways, and as much of their property, perhaps, is to go to unknown and unworthy heirs, or in various cases to be lost in bad investments, is it not the dictate of wisdom and benevolence for them to distribute it generously where they know it will be wisely used and do good? And, if they are genuine Unitarians, the favored and happy believers in the good God and Father of all, in Christ and his gospel of "peace on earth and good will to men," and in the immortal life and the final triumph of good over evil, when "God will be all in all," what less or better can they do than to aid munificently in sending these good tidings of great joy throughout the world, to bless and cheer it with larger hope and diviner life?

In 1865, I think, there were a few single individuals or families who gave $1,000 or $1,500 each, and perhaps more; and it will have to be the same this year, if the hoped-for and anticipated $100,000 is raised. But, then, what is even such a sum out of the several millions possessed by not a few Unitarian families? Enough, of course, for the denomination to appreciate and be grateful for, but not enough for many of the benevolent donors to miss. And it should be a grateful pleasure that by giving generously they thus help the good cause and make lighter the burdens of the less favored, who have little money to give, but, nevertheless, give according to their ability.

And why may not the contribution of 1894-95 equal that of 1865, and then the general cause be pushed forward in the earnestness and enthusiasm awakened at Saratoga; the many unemployed ministers, if devoted and faithful, put into open fields for work; old and feeble churches strengthened and encouraged, and, where practicable, new ones formed, to the good of all interested? And, if the Unitarian faith is of God, certainly too much cannot be hoped from it,—so full of promise is it, both for the life that now is and for that which is to come; nor can too much be done for it. In those who fully believe it, it inspires a hope bounded only by the possibilities of the universe and the infinite Wisdom and Love presiding over and ruling it for a glorious end through the spiritual laws of evolution.

But, though only the rich can be expected to give money generously, how many more than at present would be able to give commendably, were it not for their delusion that cigars and stimulating drinks are among the necessities of life, and that they must spare enough money for these at any rate! One man told me, not long since, that his cigar bill amounted to $600 annually,—a shameful and wicked waste of money, all puffed out in smoke, and when so many are suffering for the necessities of life! Fortunate is it that our Unitarian women cannot be called upon to give up such indulgences, that they may save money to give to the cause they specially love! But, then, there may possibly be some ways in which even many women may save money to contribute to a good cause, and only by giving up some superfluous luxuries. Perhaps a thousand women, in our combined churches might devise ways in the line suggested of saving a few thousands of dollars to send to the American Unitarian Association. Suppose a class of them should send out a circular with a plan proposing this, headed by a subscription of $1,000 or more, if the women be rich; and, if not, the circular and plan alone might be fruitful of greatly good results!

But then, as much as the Unitarian Association needs money to carry out its large and generous plans for the promotion and extension of the great cause it represents, there is, nevertheless, a much greater need than money to make that cause the great liberal Christian, really catholic power and influence it should be throughout the country, and even the world. That need is a ministry and people with an inspired and inspiring faith in the Unitarian gospel and a grateful appreciation of it, with an enthusiasm for religion and humanity, and a united co-operation in plans and efforts to build up a church worthy the name of Unitarian and Christian, distinguished not mainly for its ethical culture, its æsthetic taste and refinements, and its social distinction, but much more for its religion,—its reasonable, spiritual, practical religion, "the religion of Jesus," the love of God and man. Henceforth the Unitarian Church should be what the Roman Church professes to be, but is not,—a truly catholic or universal church, with no such qualifying, limiting adjective as Roman, or any other. Channing eloquently says: "There is a grander church than any particular ones, however extensive,—the Church catholic or universal, spread through all lands, and one with the Church in heaven. Within this church are joined those whom different names have severed and still sever. We hear nothing of Greek, Roman, English churches, but of Christ's Church only. It asks not, Who has baptized us, whose passport we carry, whose badge we wear? If baptized by the Holy Ghost, its wide gates are open to us."

A BAPTIST HERETIC.

THE CASE OF PROF. C. W. WOODWORTH OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

The San Francisco Examiner of February 28 and 24 gives a detailed account of the expulsion of Prof. Charles W. Woodworth and W. C. Maxwell, a student of the university, from the First Baptist Church of Berkeley:—

Prof. Charles W. Woodworth of the University of California and W. C. Maxwell, a student at the university, have both been expelled from the First Baptist Church of Berkeley on account of charges of heterodoxy preferred against them by the pastor, Rev. W. C. Learned, and Deacons A. F. Eldrich and W. F. Clark.

Charles W. Woodworth has been Professor of Entomology at the State University for three years. He is a man of profound scholarship and a recognized authority in his branch of science. He has been active in ethical and religious work in Berkeley, and until last Sunday was superintendent of the Sunday-school at the First Baptist Church.

The story of his conflict with the pastor and the deacons and a portion of the members of the church involves differences of belief touching the Bible, the divinity of Christ, the atonement, and the efficacy of baptism.

Some time ago a university student, W. C. Maxwell, a member of Rev. Learned's church, began to express opinions in religious circles and elsewhere that were regarded by church members as heterodox in their nature. Finally, the young dissenter was brought before the pastor and deacons, and was called upon to answer charges of heresy.

The declaration of faith adopted by the Baptist church of Berkeley was read to him, and he gave his views on its teachings.

The pastor and the deacons were very much concerned; but they agreed that Maxwell's heterodoxy was the result of university teachings, and they prayed earnestly that he might see the error of his way and return to the orthodox fold. They were inclined to be patient with the student; but they told him that, unless he could ultimately see things in a different light, he could not belong to the Baptist Church in this world nor be numbered with the blessed in the next.

It was at this point that the Sunday-school superintendent, Prof. Woodworth, became involved in the controversy over the reputed heresies of the student.

Prof. Woodworth talked with the young man, asked him questions touching the salient points of Christianity, and came to the conclusion that, while the student was liberal and progressive, he was not a heretic. In defence of Maxwell the university professor made that statement to the pastor and deacons; but they produced the declaration of faith and compared it with the student's convictions, saying that the tenets of the church and the beliefs of the student were hopelessly irreconcilable.

Then Prof. Woodworth declared that the Baptist Church, as represented by its best and most scholarly clergy, had outgrown the liberal belief in the old declaration of faith.

In defence of the student and to explain his own beliefs, the Sunday-school superintendent had his views published and distributed them to the members of the church. The circular reads as follows:—

OBJECTIONS TO THE WORDING OF OUR DECLARATION OF FAITH.

I maintain:

That the absence of error is only true of the spirit, and not of the matter of the Bible;

That the trinity are only three of many manifestations of God;

That the fall of man was only from a childish innocence, not from true holiness.

That the death of Jesus, like the Jewish sacrifice, only saves symbolically;

That the righteousness of faith is not imputed to us, but is faith's outward manifestation;

That the Christian's special providence consists of his new environment;

That baptism is not prerequisite to church membership nor to the Lord's Supper.

C. W. WOODWORTH.

This printed document created a sensation in the church. Meetings were called, indignant protests against the heretical circular were uttered, and Prof. Woodworth was summoned before the Sanhedrim. Prof. Woodworth's defence was courteous and dignified. He was orthodox, he maintained, but not narrow or dogmatic. The circular, he said, clearly stated his views.

Nothing Prof. Woodworth could say would appease his accusers. The verdict of the ecclesiastical council was against him; and so, instead of being able to save Student Maxwell from expulsion, both professor and student had to leave the church.

PROF. WOODWORTH SPEAKS.

In an interview with a reporter Prof. Woodworth said: "I have been driven from the Berkeley Baptist church,—not because I am heterodox, however, but because the pastor and some of the members of the church are unaware that Orthodoxy, as interpreted by the best minds in the denomination in the country, has outgrown many of the old dogmas in the declaration of faith."

Prof. Woodworth spoke of the university and of the charge made by the pastor and members of the Baptist church that Student Maxwell's apostasy was due to the pernicious teachings of the State institution of learning.

"The University of California," said he, "is a big institution. Just what the tendencies of its teachings are would be difficult to state. Among the scientists there are as great differences in many things as among the churches. Personally, I can say that I teach evolution. It is true, and therefore I teach it. An entomologist cannot teach his science without presenting the indisputable fact of evolution any more than a physicist could teach physics and ignore the facts of vibrations.

"Instead of man being created perfect, he has been gradually evolving; and his primitive state was one of ignorance and animal innocence rather than that of holiness.

"And Christ Jesus came, not to restore man to his original unknowing innocence, but to exalt him, and to make him a perfect, rational being.

"Christ Jesus was a product of evolution, and as such is infinitely closer and dearer to common humanity than a denizen of another world, who for a brief season assumed the shape and station of man, could possibly be.

"I am a Christian,—a rational, tolerant Christian, I hope; and I am sorry I cannot be permitted to work in my chosen church."

Prof. Woodworth is a graduate of Harvard, whither he went after being graduated from the University of Arkansas. Hereafter he will attend the Congregational church of Berkeley. The expelled student, Mr. Maxwell, joined the Unitarian church in Oakland on Sunday.

Spiritual Life.

Do not think about distant events. This uneasiness about the future is unwholesome for you. We must leave to God all that depends on him, and think only of being faithful in all that depends upon ourselves. Fénelon.

For there is no seeing of the divine Countenance until the heart in its purity responds to the impression, and there is no purity of heart until the senses without and within act in deepest harmony.—Mozzomdar.

This day thou knowest ten commanded duties, seest in thy mind ten things which should be done for one which thou doest. Do one of them. This of itself will show thee ten others which can and shall be done.—Carlyle.

Shun all that is distracting and disquieting, both within and without. Nothing in the whole world is worth the loss of thy peace. Even the faults which thou hast committed should only humble, but not disquiet thee.—G. Tersteegen.

For myself, I am certain that the good of human life cannot lie in the possession of things which for one man to possess is for the rest to lose, but rather in things which all can possess alike, and where one man's wealth promotes his neighbor's.—Spinoza.

The fear of man brings a snare. By halting in our duty and giving back in the time of trial, our hands grow weaker, our ears grow dull as to hearing the language of the true Shepherd. So that, when we look at the way of the righteous, it seems as though it were not for us to follow them. J. Woolman.

The Sunday School.

Rev. Earl M. Wilbur, minister of the First Unitarian Church of Portland, Ore., has normal classes for Sunday-school teachers every Wednesday, meeting at 4.15 and 7.30 P.M.

From Charleston, S.C., we have the following pleasant news: "Our Sunday-school, I am pleased to state, keeps up in numbers and interest, and, I trust, means substantial support for our church in the future."

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, March 16. Subject, Lesson XXV., "The Greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, led by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The sixth regular meeting, twelfth season, 1894-95, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, March 18. Subject, "The Relation of the Sunday-school to Citizenship." Twenty-minute addresses will be given by Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham of New Bedford, Mrs. Fanny B. Ames of Boston, Mr. John O. Norris of Melrose.

The First Free Church of Tacoma, Rev. Alfred W. Martin, minister, has the following features. A five-minute sermon to children at every Sunday morning service. In the Sunday-school which follows there is a "young men's open question class," conducted by Mr. Martin. The sessions are devoted to the discussion of the morning sermon. We notice that, in this connection, there is a question box placed in the vestibule of the church. All questions of a theological or ethical character placed in this box are answered from the platform on the last Sunday of each month at the close of the service.

NEW YORK, N.Y.—The Sunday School Union was addressed on March 4 by Rev. Mr. Crowe of Newark, N.J. Mr. Crowe is the pastor of a flourishing Universalist church, which has a large Sunday-school; and he gave a series of systematic, detailed answers to the question, "How shall we Make our Sunday-schools Grow?" Mr. Crowe made four principal points. 1. The Sunday-school must be thoroughly and efficiently organized. A tireless superintendent, small classes, many teachers and officials, weekly cabinet meetings, much supervision, and numerous devices are indispensable. 2. The teachers must be faithful. They must be on time every time, with lessons prepared and with respect for the occasion. 3. The work must be interesting to boys and girls, no matter whether it is to the teachers or not. There must be orderly movement and variety in the exercises. There must be great simplicity and earnestness in the teaching, close personal contact in the classes, and plenty to do. 4. The life of the Sunday-school must be one with the life of the church, close to it in time, in intention and personality. But, first, last, and always, there must be method, careful and sustained. The Unitarians are ready for a great forward movement of practical endeavor. To-day the Unitarian body has upon it the responsibility of proving that religion may be both free and strong. It needs for this wise leaders, loyal followers, and good methods.

During the hearty discussion which followed Mr. Crowe's address many practical questions were asked him; and, likewise, constant reference was made to the weakness of the Unitarian Church in having no dramatic, definite doctrine to teach. Finally, Rev. Mr. William M. Brundage of Albany, who has just come among us from the Methodist Episcopal Church, protested against our emphasis of the advantage in definiteness and against our longing for crowded Sunday-schools. He said that his own denomination, which had both these apparent advantages, found reaching the moral natures of the children just as hard as we possibly could; and he urged this reaching of the individual child, and affecting his conduct through settled principles, as the foremost aim of a Sunday-school.

The meeting adjourned with the conviction that a good Sunday-school was a possibility, and well worth having.

Religious Intelligence.

THE next meeting of the New England Associate Alliance will be held in Lawrence on April 18.

REV. BENJAMIN A. GOODRIDGE of Harvard, Mass., has accepted a unanimous call to Christ Church, Dorchester, and will begin his work the first Sunday in April.

GROVE MEETING ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian Grove Meeting Association was held March 4, and officers elected for the ensuing year. It was voted to hold the annual grove meetings at the Wiers, beginning July 28 and closing August 4. A committee consisting of Rev. Mr. Phalen, Rev. Mr. Staples, J. C. A. Hill, C. A. Danforth, Miss M. A. Downing, and Rev. S. C. Beane was appointed to arrange for the meetings.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Dr. William Everett will preach March 17. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Rev. S. W. Brooke will conduct the half-hour noon service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, March 20, at twelve o'clock. All are cordially invited.

In the Church of the Disciples Mr. Ames will preach next Sunday morning on "Visions and Revelations."

Ministers' Monday Club: March 18, 10.30 A.M. Rev. H. C. McDougall will preside. Rev. Charles G. Ames will give the address, on "Preparation of a Sermon."

First Church in Boston: Wednesday afternoon services, at 4.30 P.M. March 13, Rev. S. M. Crothers; March 20, Rev. Francis G. Peabody; March 27, Rev. John Cuckson; April 3, Rev. E. E. Hale; April 10, Rev. Thomas Van Ness; and on April 11, at 8 P.M., Holy Communion. All seats are free at these services.

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Popular Sunday evening service, March 17, at 7.30. Speaker, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers. Subject, "The Principle of Fair Play." Music furnished by boy choir, twenty-three members. Mr. Percy J. J. Cooper, choir-master. All seats free.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon at 3.15; evening at 8, when Rev. George H. Hosmer will give a lecture (with lantern views) upon "Martin Luther." The subject for the Monday evening debate (March 18, at 7.45) will be, "Is the Present Industrial System (Factories, Division of Labor, etc.) Helpful or Harmful to Character?" All are cordially invited.

Second Church Chapel, Copley Square: Tuesday, March 19, 8 P.M., under the auspices of the Women's Alliance, Rev. Thomas Van Ness will deliver an address entitled "The Parsifal Play as seen at Bayreuth." Wagnerian music illustrative of the drama will be given before and after the lecture. ("Lohengrin," Vorspiel, piano and violin. "Parsifal,"—the Good Friday choral and motif will be sung.) Music in charge of Mr. H. G. Tucker. Tickets at 50 cents each may be had at the door.

BRIGHTON, MASS.—The closing services in the old church of the First Parish in Brighton will be held on Sunday, March 31, at 10.30 A.M. Mr. W. H. Baldwin will speak. On the same day at four o'clock the new church will be dedicated. Rev. E. A. Horton will give the sermon. This new building is on Chestnut Hill Avenue, near the Reservoir gate. At the morning service on April 7 Mr. William Lloyd Garrison will speak in the new church on "The Duty of the Church in the Social Work of our Time."

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—On Friday evening, March 8, the First Parish gave a reception to the Unitarian students of Harvard and Radcliffe. The vestry of the church was thronged during the evening with the young men and women from the colleges, and with their friends of the parish.

DES MOINES, IA.—The Unity Club, in response to an appeal for aid to the Young Women's Christian Association, which admits only members of evangelical churches to active membership, passed the following resolutions:—

"Resolved, That, in response to the appeal sent by the Young Women's Christian Association, asking for aid toward the proposed building for the benefit of the young and working women of Des Moines, the Unity Club would express its hearty sympathy with the humanitarian zeal manifested in such a purpose, and also its thorough appreciation of all the practical work and moral teaching which such an organization may do.

"But, on the other hand, it very deeply regrets that the conditions of membership in the proposed organization are such as to exclude a large number of philanthropic spirited people who might willingly give of their means, but who could have no voice in the direction of its use.

"Unity Club protests, and will continue to protest, against what seems to it to be illiberal religiousness; but it will not on that account refuse to lend a hand to help a good work."

GREENFIELD, MASS.—In October, 1894, the Unitarian women of Greenfield, Deerfield, Turner's Falls, and Montague met in Greenfield, and organized a Branch of the "National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women," to be called the Franklin County Branch. Mrs. James

C. Parsons was elected president. The other officers chosen were four vice-presidents, six directors, recording secretary, corresponding secretary, and treasurer. From the beginning great interest has been shown, increasing with every meeting, there being already forty members. The programme for the year consists of papers upon Unitarian ministers of distinction, beginning with Dr. Priestley and taking Channing, Martineau, and others in order. The March meeting was held on Thursday, March 7, in the parlors of All Souls' Church; and members from Deerfield, Turner's Falls, and Montague were present. The subject for the afternoon was "Channing"; and an interesting paper was read by Mrs. Wilby of Deerfield, who also presided at the meeting. Selections from his letters were read by Mrs. Henry of Deerfield, and James Russell Lowell's beautiful elegy on the death of Channing was read by Mrs. Arthur Ball. The following resolution was passed:—

"Resolved, That in the death of Mrs. J. F. Moors we have lost a valuable member. Her interest in the Women's Alliance dates back to its first organization many years ago. When health and strength were failing, her zeal for its reorganization was as ardent as in the early days. At that time she devoted herself to the Post-office Mission, and many persons were made happier by her contributions of Unitarian papers and tracts. May the remembrance of her interest and zeal stimulate us in the work we have pledged ourselves to do, and her pleasant memory remain with us!"

HAVERHILL, MASS.—Rev. F. A. Gilmore of the Unitarian church delivered an address before the Grand Army of the Republic Post 47 and Relief Corps 96 on "Frederick Douglass." A hundred members of the post and corps attended, and the service was greatly enjoyed. Mr. Gilmore paid an eloquent tribute to Douglass, and prophesied that by education, patience, and religion the race problem would be solved.

PLAINFIELD, N.J.—The W. P. Tilden Guild at its meeting March 3 was conducted by Miss Caroline Barber, one of the teachers in the high school and daughter of Rev. Stillman Barber of Barnardston, Mass. Her subject was "Loyalty." She applied it to the State, the nation, the home, friends, and to the Church. A discussion followed in which a number took part, the guild being well represented. Four letters from honorary members were read, two of them from the widow and daughter of Rev. William P. Tilden. These were listened to with much interest. As there had been no appointment of a meeting for Ash Wednesday, at the request of the pastor Miss Barber read the appropriate service from the "Leaflets for Lent," which were compiled from Mr. Tilden's manuscripts. We are not surprised to learn that Bishop Huntington is going to use these beautiful and appropriate services during the Lenten season, and that he has instructed them to be read during his absence. The attendance at the little church in Plainfield has doubled this year, and there is much unanimity of feeling among its members. A free course of lectures is to be given fortnightly on "The Five Great Humorists,"—"Thomas Hood," "Oliver Wendell Holmes," "Jeremy Taylor," "Sidney Smith," "Artemas Ward."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Rev. Lila Frost Sprague has been elected assistant pastor of the Second Unitarian Church, the society over which her husband, Rev. Leslie W. Sprague, is settled as pastor. Mrs. Sprague is a graduate of a theological school, and was ordained with her husband soon after their marriage. She preached her first sermon as his assistant a week ago last Sunday.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The regular monthly meeting of the Executive Board was held at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on Friday, March 8, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells presiding, and twelve ladies being present.

A communication was received from Rev. Charles W. Wendte of California, calling attention to the excellent work being done by Mrs. Sarah Pratt Carr in Central California. She has lately established a Unitarian society at Hanford, the county seat of Tulare County, an exceedingly fertile district, but somewhat notorious as the home of the famous Evans bandits and other desperadoes. Mrs. Carr has done wonders with the place, forming clubs among the girls and mothers and young men, and revolutionizing the whole town. She is now holding services twice on Sunday, preaching excellent sermons, and organizing church work of every kind. She receives nothing for her services, and incurs considerable expense in going to and from Hanford. Mr. Wendte writes that in all his experience as a minister he does not know of a more wonderful and noble work than hers, and he wishes the Alliance could give her a little help. If it were not for the wide-spread financial distress in that section, it would not be necessary to ask any assistance. It was voted by the members present that this appeal should be recommended to the Branches. If each Branch will send one or two dollars to the treasurer for this purpose, the sum needed can be readily made up.

Mrs. Wells spoke of a request to aid the Mozoomdar Mission Fund. As this would not properly come from the Committee on Appeals, Mr. Barrows was invited to appear before the board. Mr. Barrows spoke of the extent of Mozoomdar's influence, which has been materially augmented by his visit to America. An association has been formed to enlarge Mr. Mozoomdar's work in India, and the movement has received most cordial sympathy. Mr. Barrows told of the influence of the Brahmo-Somaj, which has been the leader in the enfranchisement of women, and has enabled Ramabai to accomplish what she has done. He also spoke of the personal sacrifices made by Mr. Mozoomdar in carrying on his work, and hoped that something more than sympathy would be given him. Mrs. Barrows, being present, added her testimony, and contrasted her own methods of work as a missionary in India with those of Mr. Mozoomdar. She mentioned the great advantage which Mr. Mozoomdar had over other missionaries in understanding the language, which has many minute distinctions and is difficult to acquire. It was voted that "the Executive Board of the National Alliance present to the Branches the excellent work of the Brahmo-Somaj in India as represented by Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar and administered by the Mozoomdar Mission Fund, that he may have means to pay travelling expenses incurred in preaching and also to print his message in Bengali and Hindostanee."

The corresponding secretary gave an interesting account of her recent visit to the Branches in Maine, where she had spoken ten times to four or five hundred people. Some of the Branches were found strong and well organized, others small and not yet in full touch with the work of the Alliance.

Reports from ten Branches were given by the director for Eastern New York. A new Branch has just been formed at Troy, which leaves the church at Trenton the only one in this division which has no Branch. Flushing continues monthly social meetings at the houses of members. Newburg is active, holding seven meetings in January and February. Yonkers alternates study class and business meetings. Lenox Avenue, New York, reports great activity and a constantly increasing attendance. All Souls' has held one meeting, addressed by Miss Deane. At Unity Church, Brooklyn, the meetings are held with the usual regularity; and the interest and vigor are unabated. The Branch at Second Church, Brooklyn, has held its annual sale and tea party, which netted over $700, which will be used in reupholstering the church pews, completing the renovations begun last year.

Mrs. Curtis sent reports of nine Branches. Syracuse has given $40 to Ithaca. The Post-office Mission Committee publishes and distributes Mr. Calthrop's sermons. Ithaca holds regular meetings, and expresses much gratitude for the response of Branches to its appeal for money. Rochester reports larger attendance than ever. Toronto is faithfully holding meetings and successful parish teas. The little Branch at Hamilton continues bravely, stimulated by a visit from its director and encouraged by friendly letters and contributions from other Branches. An instance of the growing feeling of co-operation among the Branches is a contribution of $2.18 from the little Branch at Pierre, So. Dak. Meadville has interested the young ladies, and is doing much socially and with an increasing Post-office Mission. The older Branch in Buffalo reports "growing in numbers and interest." The Branch at Parkside meets once in two weeks, reads sermons, and makes a study of the Unitarian belief. Cincinnati has devoted an afternoon to the discussion of Social Settlements, and celebrated Washington's Birthday by a children's festival, many persons belonging to other churches being present on both occasions.

The New Jersey Branches are said to be "strong agents for good." The May meeting of the New York League will be held with the Orange Branch. The Post-office Mission of this Branch supplies literature to motormen and conductors at Roseville. Plainfield reports a busy winter. Passaic is enthusiastic over the new minister, and Rutherford is working to pay the interest on the church mortgage due the American Unitarian Association in early summer.

The Philadelphia Branch shows much enthusiasm. The members are being increased by women outside the denomination. The next meeting will be held with the new Branch at Wilmington. At Pittsburgh they have readings from Unitarian literature, and sometimes a social supper. They feel that their church is now being recognized as a power in Pittsburgh, "much to the surprise of that orthodox town."

The Western Branches have been much occupied in relief work for Nebraska. At the Third Church Branch, Chicago, they are just beginning the study of Russian Religious history. The Chicago Associate Alliance reports activity, and a hope that the feeling for church as well as charitable work will grow. At the Church of the Messiah the Branch now embraces all the work in the church that is done by women, seven committees directing the work. These committees report at each meeting of the Alliance, so that each member knows all that is being done.

The reports from the Southern Branches show most genuine and active interest. At Richmond a choral meeting takes place every week, as the Alliance has charge of the church music; and the singing is congregational and without expense. The Branch is also reading Miss Clarke's lessons. Memphis reports the severe illness of its secretary. The Branch at Chattanooga has papered the halls and Sunday-school rooms of the church. At Atlanta the Branch has decided to study the "Lives and the Influence on their Times of Prominent Unitarians," beginning with Dr. Priestley. The Branch at Austin has never failed to have semi-monthly meetings, in which the members show a deep interest. It has "contributed not a little toward the maintenance of the church, and feels that in its growth and success it is amply repaid."

The following appropriations have been made: Philadelphia sent $40 to the American Unitarian Association and $16.50 to Hamilton. First Parish, Cambridge, sent $20 to Bath, $20 to Rev. H. G. Putnam, $20 to Redlands, Cal., and $10 to San Bernardino. All Souls' Church, Roxbury, sent $25 to Green Harbor, $10 to Ithaca, $50 to Rev. Mr. Chaney for Southern work, and $5 for the Japan library. Arlington, Mass., sent $10 to Green Harbor, $10 to Miss Putnam, and $10 to Ithaca. First Church, Providence, sent $10 to Green Harbor, $10 to Sharon, $30 to Ithaca, and $50 to Rev. Mr. Chaney. Arlington Street Church, Boston, sent $25 to Miss Putnam, $20 to Wolfeboro, and $20 to Ithaca. South Congregational Church, Boston, sent $20 to Miss Putnam, $15 to Chelsea, and $2 for Japan library. First Parish, Dorchester, sent $10 to Hamilton, $10 to Redlands, and $5 for Japan library. Lowell sent $20 to Rev. J. C. Gibson. Quincy sent $30 to Calhoun, Ala. Wilton, N.H., sent $3 for Japan library. Church of the Unity, Boston, sent $200 for a "Southern circuit." The following places are at present the important ones to help: St. John, N.B.; Hamilton, Ont.; Ithaca, N.Y.; Bath and Rochester, N.H.; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Austin and San Antonio, Tex.; Green Harbor and Sharon, Mass. At the next meeting reports will be due from the New England, Rocky Mountains, and Pacific Coast Branches.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

One of the cleverest satires of the season is that given in another column over the signature of Paine Furniture Co. It is a fact that one can buy Morris chairs (so called) at almost any price, just exactly as one can buy eggs at almost any price. It is equally true, though not always as clearly realized by the purchaser, that it is just as unwise to buy too cheap a Morris chair as it is to buy too cheap a grade of eggs. We really cannot do justice to the story by attempting to comment on it; but our readers should not miss this little piece of cleverness, which will be found in our advertising columns in this issue.

As Important as Planting.—Every bit as important as putting the seed in the ground is a careful selection of varieties and kinds to be used.

Though a little early to plant, it is just the time for action in making up your mind what you intend to plant. It would be impossible to keep run of the many wonderful and new varieties of both flower and vegetable seeds that are continually being introduced, were they not carefully tabulated and described in the seed-man's catalogues, which to-day have become volumes of no small pretence, filled with much useful information on matters pertaining to Horticulture and Agriculture.

DIABOLUS, THE DOUBTER.

Diabolus, the devil, is the doubter,
The caviller, the sceptic, who forever
Has doubts of being, love, and of the good
He ought to do; who, in his dark distrust
Of all the truth that stirs within his heart,
Would fain exempt himself from virtue's law,
From action, and at last ends in despair.

And wouldst thou know who is the angel now?
He who believes in all the good and fair
He finds in others, loves to find it there,— Finds love in God, and God's love everywhere
Throughout the universe, and gladliest
In his own bosom; who, to satisfy
His honor, to be worthy of himself,
So lives as if God always looked on him!
That man, and only he, who lives a life
Worthy of God, lives the true life of man.

THEORY AND PRACTICE IN RELIGION.

BY REV. FRANK L. PHALEN.

"If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."—JOHN viii. 31, 32.

In the realm where such sciences as mathematics and physics hold sway no one would think of doubting that theory plays a great and important part. There are very few applications of mathematics in the world of practical life which were not first the theoretical conceptions of some student or thinker. So it is in physics and chemistry, in geology and biology, and in all the other sciences. Theory is a universal and indispensable ally of progress.

We sometimes grow impatient with speculations and conjectures, and speak ungraciously of those who indulge in such matters. But this is because so many theories never bear any fruit, and serve only as false lights to mislead and bewilder. On the other hand, speculations and theories have always been, and always will be, the search-lights of humanity, dispersing the darkness and gloom and revealing the hidden path which leads onward and upward toward wider knowledge and deeper experience. Of all the myriad blossoms which make the fruit-trees so beautiful in spring, only a small proportion of them ever come to anything, and develop into the apple or peach. But we do not on this account refuse to acknowledge the beauty and utility of the blossoms. Who can tell, when the swelling buds are bursting into their lovely colors and odors, that this one will fall and wither, and that one endure and develop into the rich and mellow fruit?

So on the tree of human knowledge there are millions of budding theories that never survive the period of blossom; but many do endure and grow, at length, into ripe fruit, for the help and inspiration of the nations. Hence it is never wise to condemn, without qualification, theorists or speculators in any realm of thought or action. The stupendous mistakes of the past which led men to mistrust and oppose the leaders of thought ought to be a lesson never to be forgotten. What science or art, what rule of ethics, what discovery in medicine, what principle of law or religion, what forward step in education, has not been bitterly denounced, and, in instances too numerous to mention, its advocates ostracized, persecuted, poisoned, or crucified! And, if in these days of more light and a larger measure of human sweetness there are less violence and brutality displayed, still the champions of new ideas and the advocates of unpopular theories are likely to be welcomed, not with the imperial crown of a king, but with the stinging thorns of hostility. It is a strange fact that until comparatively recent years the world has never welcomed its light-bringers, but has greeted their advent and their ideas with a storm of malignant fury. To-day, however, under the influence of Science, which stands ready and glad to receive new truth and to welcome every man or woman who can do anything in any way to enlighten or elevate the world,—to-day, in that luminous circle of humanity where science is honored, the man of new ideas is cordially received and gladly heard. Outside of that circle, however, and particularly where ecclesiastical and theological notions are predominant, the man of progressive theories is still looked at with averted eye, if he is not also thought in league with Satan. In the minds of many good people the problems of religion never reach very much beyond the question of whether they shall go to church on Sunday morning. I do not mean that such people never have their hours of deep thought, when the great questions of life and time, of whence and whither, clamor for an answer. I do not mean they are never lifted up on the wave of a holy emotion till they seem to live for one rare hour in heaven. I do not mean they are not awed and subdued, bewildered, and at times almost overwhelmed by some tempest that carries them down to the very gates of the underworld. These are human experiences which all encounter. I mean that only a few persons think of religion as a real organic part of human nature, as much a characteristic of mankind in all ages and races as the sentiments which create and perpetuate the family and the State. The old outgrown and irrational notion of religion manifests itself in the common saying that this man "is religious," and that man "is not religious," that such a person was "converted to religion," and other similar expressions. Now it may be said in all truth that no man can be converted to religion. He may be converted to a particular conception of theology, as Calvinism, Romanism, or Unitarianism. But the religious sentiment, the religious affections, are as vital and organic a part of every normal human being as the heart or the brain, the nervous system, or the bony skeleton. The proposition that all men are religious beings is as sound and logical as the proposition that all men are human beings. A man without a trace of religious thought or sentiment in his nature would not be a normal human being. He would be a monster or a brute. This is what I mean by saying that no man can be "converted to religion." I know that in the popular sense the "convert" is one who has been turned from an unchristian life to a Christian profession, and to the practice of the Christian virtues; but you will see that he must have the germ of religion in his own nature before the divine life can appeal to him or move him to put away the old man and put on the armor of faith and love and service. If we were not religious beings, to begin with, we could not be converted to the Christian creed or to any other. All men are religious beings,—that is, they possess a religious nature; though there are exceptional individuals, of course, who seem almost destitute of religious sentiments, just as there are people to whom music and flowers are distasteful or indifferent. Religion as a sentiment is just as surely a part of our nature as patriotism or any other deep and strong human affection. This is the undeniable proposition, the doctrine upon which both the philosophy and the science of religion are now thoroughly agreed. For centuries the theologians of the Christian Church maintained that there were but two genuine religions,—the religion of the Jews and the religion of the Christians. All the other great creeds were regarded as the inventions of men or the works of the devil. Time and knowledge, study and travel, have changed this old notion. We now see that religion is one, though there are many varieties of religion, and that the religion of the Jews and the religion of Jesus himself are not the only creeds in the world which have ministered to human needs and solaced men and women in their struggles and sorrows.

The World's Parliament of Religions at Chicago did more than any other event that has occurred since Pentecost to show to Christians and Pagans that we are all seeking the same God and trying in dim or clear light to read and follow his eternal Word.

The great word of science to-day is the unity of all life and all law; and it is only a step from these well-established conclusions to that unity of faith and worship which shall practically realize the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

I said further back that we often take too narrow and provincial a view of religion. We look at it through the microscope of our church or our ideas, and therefore see it in a small and limited way. We ought to take the telescope of thought and sweep the whole horizon. Then we should see what a universal power religion has been and now is in the life of all humanity. Everywhere, in every age and nation, it shows itself as a force that has got to be reckoned with by anybody who proposes to look at life and humanity as they really are.

The man who lifts his eyes above the narrow circle where he earns his bread and passes his days finds himself in the great stream of human history which is bearing him along on its tossing breast. Its source is far back in the dim twilight of the past. Its ending is ahead, somewhere, how far we do not know, in the infinite ocean of the Eternal God. He is a curious and strangely constituted being who is never sobered and set face to face with great thoughts by this mighty stream of time and life; and he cannot look at it, even superficially, without seeing that religion is one of the features that is always present and always potent. "Even if religion were only a madness of humanity," says Edward Caird, "as materialistic pessimists have suggested, even if it were an illusory form of consciousness destined ultimately to disappear, there must be a method in it which we are interested to discover. We cannot suppose any great province of the life of rational being to lie outside of the general development of reason. Even atheism or agnosticism involves a definite attitude toward the ultimate problem of human life." Philosophy and science must have some sort of a theory of religion, whether they see in it a star of hope guiding men heavenward or a will-o'-the-wisp luring them into darkness and destruction. The old notions which once satisfied men before the light of knowledge was spread abroad no longer satisfy, because they are seen to be not only inadequate, but also blind to some of the plainest facts of history. The introduction of the doctrine of evolution into the field of religion has worked a marvellous change in the way every thoughtful mind now regards, not only Christianity, but every other historic type of religion. One thing stands out clearly as we review the field; namely, that "the movement of religious thought in all the great creeds of the world has been toward a conception of God as one, and not as many, as manifested both in nature and in spirit, but as reaching a higher and clearer manifestation in spirit than in nature, as, indeed, revealing in man's highest intellectual and moral life much that is hid or only imperfectly prefigured in nature. Thus far we might go without looking beyond the most obvious "facts of history." And, besides this, "the great process of history," stretching from the beginning of the world to this present day of grace, "has at last set the problem of religion in a new and a definite light, both for those who accept and those who reject it." This is the way the matter stands, and this is the way it must be looked at by radical and conservative, heretic and orthodox: "Either there is no God and no revelation or knowledge of him, or the revelation of God must be sought," not in the Bible and in Christendom only, but "in the whole mighty evolution of nature and history and humanity regarded as a divine development which finds its ultimate end and culminating expression in the life of man as a spiritual being," bearing the image and guided by the spirit that was in Christ. This is the idea of God and the theory of religion which scholars and men of thought are agreed to attack or defend with all the earnestness of faith or the sophistry of unbelief. This is "our highest faith, our deepest doubt," the faith which is supported by "the most powerful utterances of modern poetry and philosophy, the doubt on which all the scepticism and agnosticism of the age are concentrated."

Slowly, but surely, the spirit of an intelligent religious philosophy is working itself into the minds of the people, and the world stands to-day upon the threshold of a profound and inspiring revival of faith which shall fill the earth with light and hope and love. "Go, my children, saith the Spirit," in the words of Samuel R. Calthrop. "Inhabit new worlds. Gather new experiences. Fight new obstacles, gain new victories. Grow to new power." This is the word of God that speaks to us from the mountain peaks of science and history and philosophy, and its message is echoed back to us by the prophets and seers of the Bible and by the ever-living spirit of the unseen Christ. Our religion does not stand or fall with Scripture texts and disputed dogmas. It is not stated completely, neither, indeed, can be, in any ancient or modern ecclesiastical creed. It stands four-square to earth and heaven, throbbing and inspiring in the heart and life of humanity, in whom God is forever incarnating himself. So much for the theory of religion as it is understood by the leaders of modern thought. What, now, of its application to our personal lives and the every-day needs of men and women?

In mechanics, as theories improve, machines improve; and we have in our modern railway service and in our magnificent ocean steamers the best of evidence that every new theory will be put into harness the moment it is proved to be practicable. It is so in medicine. As the result of theory and speculation, a new remedy is discovered that will successfully stay some plague or disease. At once every progressive physician who is convinced of its efficacy arms himself with the new medicine and goes forth to battle. So it should be in religion and in the Church. What is all our talk of progress and freedom worth? What is all the advance of science and the decay of false notions of Christianity good for, if we are no better men and women after we accept the new theories than before? Must there not be something wrong in a world which sounds forever its praise of truth, but does not live that truth, and work it into every common detail of its life? It is an imperfect civilization and a shallow and devitalized religion which increases the brain power of men, but dries up the life-blood in their hearts, and weakens their will to do the right. It is better not to know so much, and to live close to the skirts of God, than to be very wise, and yet far from the kingdom of heaven. For every step in advance we take in knowledge there ought to be a step forward in practical righteousness and in Christian service.

"The day in its holiness,
The night in her silence,
The stars in their calm," ought to be more glorious and splendid to the man or woman who is sharing the wonderful revelations God is giving us in these latter days. If it is not so, then be sure there is something wrong, and we ought to set to work to make it right. "If ye continue in my word," said Jesus, "then are ye my disciples indeed." "If ye continue,"—that is the point, not to stand still, nor to slip backward, but to go on, to grow and develop. That is the law of spiritual life by which we must all be judged. We may have a perfect theory of religion, and yet fail to do any vigorous work in the world, or to be one whit better for our theories, unless we put into practice what we say we believe.

There are two or three points about practical religion I want to mention. First, religion, to be of any help to us, must be not merely a creed to believe, but an experience to cheer and help and sustain. A great deal of precious energy has been devoted all through the ages to establish and perpetuate a correct theory of religion. The creed has been persistently pushed to the front. Now, I will not speak disparagingly of creeds or their defenders. But the creed without life and character behind it is an empty shell, hollow and lifeless. "First thought, then feeling, then purpose, then will, and, last of all, character,—that is being," says Mozoomdar. "The interval between thought and being is immeasurable. Yet the universal self-delusion is this: when a man has a good thought, he fancies he has become what he thinks for the moment." Good thoughts, good creeds, good theories, are very good. Let us have all we can discover or formulate. But, unless they are followed by results in the practical life of the world and in an impersonal character, they are no better than bubbles that glitter for a moment and then burst into nothingness. The business of religion is not to find a perfect creed, but to nourish and develop a perfect life. The creed is only the portal, and to stop there would be like calling the porch of a house the complete building. The way to God may be smoothed and made pleasant by planting the trees of knowledge all along our pathway, but we shall never understand the help and blessing of the divine life until our thoughts and beliefs are transmuted into personal experience. We learn to know God best not by debate and discussion, but by reverent prayer and worship and a life that is conformed to his righteous will. "Only believe, and you shall be saved," is not the cry that satisfies to-day. Live, live with God, continue in the path of spiritual experience; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. This is the word of Jesus and the word of highest reason. You may tell me of rare, sweet music, and describe it in the most faithful and lucid language; but, unless I can hear it myself and feel its magic spell in my own heart, I shall know little of its power. So we may listen to theories about religion and about God until doomsday; but, unless in our own personal experience we can live at peace with God, we shall not hear the sweetest music of earth nor the divine songs of heaven.

Then another point in practical religion is that which makes our faith an inspiration rather than a restraint. Many people have wholly misconceived religion in thinking of it as a check or rein to hold them back from committing all sorts of sin. Such people wear their religion very much as unruly sheep do a poke to keep them from jumping fences and getting into all sorts of mischief. Now, religion is not a negative force. It is a positive force. It is not here to keep us from doing the wrong. It is here to spur us on to do the right all the time. If one's life is filled with the joy and gladness, the strength and courage, of religion, if the inspiration of great thoughts and great hopes takes full possession of the heart, then there will be no place in it for base passions and evil temptations and secret sins. A pitcher filled with the sparkling water at the fountain cannot hold any more. So a life filled with the divine Spirit has no room for the spirits of darkness and evil. I do not believe in a religion of gloom and melancholy. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all"; and, if the professed followers of Christ comport themselves as if they were going to a funeral instead of climbing with songs on their lips toward heaven, there is a mistake somewhere. They are on the wrong road, for the King's highway grows brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.

Finally, the religion of Jesus is not to be thought of as an insurance for the next world, but as a programme for this world. One of the best signs of the times is to be found in the deep interest that the laity all over the land is taking in the practical work of religion. The men and women of our churches are no longer content simply to support and maintain the churches and worship of their choice. They are awake to the importance of spreading their helpful faith and of training the children in their homes to love and service. Sadly belated and indifferent are we if we do not see that the time has come, not merely "to enjoy" our religion, but to put it to some productive and helpful labor in the affairs of this great needy world. How can we who have inherited all the faith and work of the ages, who have entered into the labors and sacrifices of those who went before us,—how can we keep peace with our own hearts or with God, if we do not labor, and labor in love, to spread our faith and to do some noble work that will live when we are gone? Degenerate sons of noble sires, unfaithful stewards of a divine legacy, are we, it we sit idly in the glory of the present, and fritter away our noble birthright for a miserable mess of pottage! "Pleasant it is," as Martineau says, "to entertain the picture of ourselves in some future scene, planning wisely, feeling nobly, and executing with the holy triumph of the will; but it is a different thing—not in the green avenues of the future, but in the hot dust of the present moment—to do the duty that waits and wants us."

What is our religion to us? What is it worth? Is it worth any self-denial, any strenuous thought, any brave experiments, any sacrifice of ease and pleasure, any loyalty which will send us bravely to battle with a song in our hearts? If it is not worth some of these things, then we may be sure it is a poor, feeble ghost, a sickly sentiment, a corpse out of which all vigorous life has fled, a theory without the glow of earnest feeling or the power of a conquering will.

Let us beware of all delusions, worst of all that subtle self-delusion which dulls our ears to the clarion call of God. The day is breaking: the world and its work is waiting. We are here, not to dream, but to achieve. Right here and now there are opportunities as great and splendid as any that ever came to saint or hero in the past.

"O Golden Age, whose light is of the dawn,
And not of sunset, forward, not behind,
Flood the new heavens and earth, and with thee bring
All the old virtues, whatsoever things
Are pure and honest and of good repute,
But add thereto whatever bard hath sung
Or seer has told of, when in trance or dream
They saw 'the New Jerusalem' of God."

MR. KIDD'S REPLY TO HIS CRITICS.

The author of "Social Evolution," in the Nineteenth Century for February, thinks that the principal defect of the criticisms of his book is the lack of a due sense of proportion and relation. The objections are chiefly directed toward certain details. Therefore, he proceeds to a reaffirmation of his fundamental purpose, "The attempt to state in simple scientific terms, and without the necessity for starting with any equipment of teleological assumption, that which presents itself to me as a natural law of human evolution hitherto unenumerated." He then gives an outline of his position: "The fundamental fact of human evolution that we have to recognize is that, from the beginning, we are concerned with a creature which possesses two associated characteristics not encountered anywhere else in life, and the influence of which marks off by a strict line of demarcation the evolution from that of all the forms of life that have preceded him. The first characteristic is human reason: the other, associated with it, is the capacity which man possesses of acting under its influence in contact with his fellows in social groups." The difference between man and all lower forms of life appears to consist simply in this. His reason has given him power to outwit and therefore to suspend the onerous cosmic process to which his progress is due, and which consists in continually resisting the law of retrogression. Yet he has never suspended it. In human affairs we are concerned with a creature subject to the law of retrogression, and therefore only able to hold his place, much less make progress, by submitting to an onerous process of evolution, the benefit of which is remote, far beyond the limits of his own lifetime, and in the success of which he has, as an individual, absolutely no interest. If, therefore, he holds this world to be a mere sequence of materialistic cause and effect, and if he possesses the power to suspend the process or to escape its effects, it follows with almost the cogency of mathematical demonstration that his own reason can never supply him with any effective sanction for submitting to it. To understand this is to reach at one bound a position in which we get a most vivid light thrown upon all that immense class of social phenomena which we have in the religious systems of mankind.

When we remember the scale upon which these phenomena exist, and to what a large extent the history of the world is merely the history of religions, it seems to be impossible, if we proceed in the spirit in which evolutionary science has carried on its investigations elsewhere, to avoid the conviction that the explanations hitherto given of the function of these beliefs are altogether trivial and insufficient. The explanation accepted at least must be of a kind to justify the magnitude and universality of the phenomena we are regarding. The conclusion to which we seem to be carried is that it is these systems which constitute the subsidiary factor in human evolution. It is their function to supply the ultimate sanction for that effort and sacrifice necessary to the continuation of the process of evolution proceeding in society, but which man, as a reasoning creature, subject to the law of retrogression, is in the nature of things precluded from ever finding in his own reason.

Mr. Kidd maintains that the principal features of his book affect every department of science concerned with man and society. Moreover, he has no doubt of the truth of his main positions, and that in the future they will be the commonplaces of knowledge. He gives as an illustration of the way in which a distinct type of civilization is produced:—

The history of Western civilization is, in fact, simply the natural history of the Christian religion. It is this religion which has contributed the causes that have tended to the production of the type of social efficiency developed therein which has differentiated that civilization from all others. And the significance of the entire order of social change that Western peoples have undergone under its influence consists, as I have endeavored to show, in the single fact that cosmic process in operation from the beginning of life has tended therein not toward interruption, but toward obtaining the fullest, highest, and completest expression it has reached in the history of the race.

Nor is there any room to doubt as to the two main characteristics through which it has contributed to this result. The central element in all religions is the ultra-rational sanction provided for conduct. It has provided such a sanction of extraordinary strength and efficiency. The principle in common to all religions is the merit of self-sacrifice: it has provided, as it still provides, the sublimest conception of self-abnegation that has ever moved humanity. It is to the first, the character of the ultra-rational sanction provided, that we owe that integrating, world-building spirit which found its earliest significant expression in outward forms when Leo III. places the crown of the Cæsars on the head of the Northern barbarian, and which still renders the Catholic dogma and the English Puritan faith the two most powerful antiseptic influences in our own Western civilization. It is to the second, to the softening influence of the spirit of that unexampled conception of self-abnegation, that we owe the evolutionary force that has been behind the entire process of social development which has transformed a military organization of society into the modern State, and which is still pursuing its course unchecked among us. Beginning with the abolition of slavery, it has slowly undermined the position of one after another of the ruling classes who obtained, under an earlier social organization, powers that have steadily been undergoing reconstruction; extended political power, in ever-widening circles, to the people; and at last brought us to a time when men have set before their minds as an object of practical endeavor a State in which, for the first time in the history of the race, all the excluded masses of the people shall be brought into the rivalry of life on terms of equality of opportunity.

Mr. Kidd expresses his surprise that so little attention has been given to the study of social phenomena in contrast to those sciences which deal with physical phenomena, and urges a broader treatment of the subject; and, in applying his thought to the science of history, he gives an illustration to show how limited has been the method hitherto pursued. To illustrate his meaning, we have the following:—

If there is any attempt to discuss the matter at all in the light of cause and effect, it will not be suggestive of the methods which science has followed elsewhere. Let him take up the representative organ of educated opinion like the Spectator, and he will find an historical critic in a recent number regarding with a kind of dim wonder the connection between a few ignorant men "who started forth to purify a world of which they knew nothing, by ideas which the world held to be contemptible," and in the fact that they have, nevertheless, so transformed it that to-day the effect of their work and thought "is regulating the acts and the laws of the guides of all mankind." He will find the same critic equally impressed with "the spectacle of the half-naked ascetic sitting under his banyan and giving out to brown men, ignorant as fishes, thoughts which to-day form the only antiseptic in the minds of a third of the human race"; and not less by that of "the epileptic camel-driver who wandered for months among the mountains of Arabia, to descend with thoughts which, bad or good, were so powerful that they bound the very tribes of the desert into an indissoluble brotherhood, and hurled them out a nation of warriors, to tread down the highest existing organizations of the world." But he will find no explanation. It is all part of "the romance of history," the critic tells us. That is the formula of the writer, who, however, evidently is moved by the conviction that there must be some law underlying it all. But he has nothing better to send us to work with in this last decade of our scientific century.

In conclusion, Mr. Kidd thinks that the time has not yet come for a full reception of the principles of his book, and, from the present condition of human knowledge, hostile criticism is inevitable. The results are in the future; and "it is to the rising generation of workers, to those whose mission it will be to assimilate, in the spirit of scientific continuity, the vast store of new knowledge with the old, that 'Social Science' is addressed."

DR. FURNESS'S VOICE.

Dr. William H. Furness, the oldest living graduate of Harvard, ninety-three years of age, seventy years a minister, preached in this city on Sunday last on "The Historical Christ." A common phenomenon occurred. He seemed so feeble when walking that he had to be assisted into the pulpit; but, as soon as he began to preach, his voice resounded through All Souls' Church.

Methodists are familiar with such phenomena from the oldest of men. It is easily explained. The vocal apparatus is more closely connected with the nervous system, and more responsive to general nervous excitement, than any other part of the body. It has been well said that the voice is nearest to the soul. One of the most eloquent men that ever lived in this or any other land, Dr. Thomas H. Stockton, chaplain of the United States Senate, was for many years so weak that he could not stand; but who that heard his voice could ever forget it?

We have stood by the death-bed of men that could not lift a tumbler to their lips and heard notes that would have made the reputation of some speakers. Christie, the great bass singer of the Continental Vocalists, who died of pulmonary disease, sang as well as ever a week before his death, though he could scarcely stand.

At the close many congratulated Dr. Furness on his voice. He replied; "When I am in the pulpit, I never think of my voice or in what manner I shall speak. If one has the spirit of his sermon, the voice and the power to use it will come to him." This philosophy we unequivocally indorse, with an addition,—that it is well for a man to ascertain the keynote of a building during the preliminary exercises.—Christian Advocate.

“THE MESSIAH OF THE GOSPELS.”*

Of Dr. Briggs's projected series of volumes on the "Messianic Ideal," the first, which appeared somewhat more than eight years ago, was confined to the study of Old Testament prophecy in general and Messianic prophecy in particular. The recently issued second volume treats of the Messianic idea as embodied in pre-Christian Jewish literature and in the Gospels of the New Testament canon. The third and last volume, to appear presently, "will discuss the Messianic ideas of the Jews of the New Testament times and the Messiah of the Epistles and the Apocalypse." When completed, this will unquestionably be the most satisfactory and exhaustive treatment of the subject to be found in the English tongue.

Dr. Briggs finds the Messianic idea taking on as many forms in the New Testament as in the Old. The Day of Yahweh; the Advent of Yahweh; the Messiah as Father and Shepherd; the Messianic Ideal of the Holy Land; the Messianic King; the Idea of the Kingdom of God; the Messianic Idea of the Holy Priesthood; the Ideal Man; the Messianic Ideal of the Victory over Evil; the Faithful Prophet; the New Covenant; and, crowning, and in some sense fulfilling all these, the Second Advent,—such are the varying lights in which the Biblical student is called upon to view that persistent hope for "the good time coming" which not only sustained Israel during long ages of waiting and suffering, but which from the very beginning furnished Christian faith with its most powerful motive.

This is not the place for a discussion of the question whether or not Jesus looked upon himself as the promised Messiah. We are content at present with the dubious answer, "Yes and no," which is in fact the answer of Dr. Briggs, though in his case with very much more emphasis upon the affirmation than upon the denial. The book under consideration aims to be and is a careful and thorough consideration of all those passages in the Gospels (excepting only the Logos portion of the Fourth Gospel) which may be conceived as having their root in the fundamental Messianic concept. If, interwoven with this, there is, after the fashion of the day, a great amount of speculation as to the sources, and the authenticity, and the proper order of the numerous passages which are analyzed in the course of the inquiry, so that sometimes the main object of the book seems almost to be lost sight of, yet it is true that without all this one can hardly be sure at any time that he has gone to the very bottom of the subject. At most, this is only a fault of superabundance.

Notwithstanding his reputed heresies, Dr. Briggs displays in the present work no dogmatic tendencies which need cast suspicion upon his Orthodoxy. True, he displays that critical freedom which it is not easy faithfully to cultivate without running great risk of weakening old foundations; but, as in the case of so many of the German critics, his faith and his scholarship, for the most part, seem to live in separate houses, and so to have no controversy. However, the present work being, in the main, exegetical and critical in its character, few articles of faith ever come under consideration, and never formally. Such a book could hardly be written and not contain some outline of a doctrine of the Advent; and such outline, though vague, is here met with.

Dr. Briggs is to be thanked for several excellent bits of original exegesis as well as for casting his weighty vote in favor of certain of the old interpretations the validity of which has hitherto not been sufficiently recognized. We must, however, express our astonishment that, when Jesus "called God his own Father, making himself equal with God," his words should be thus interpreted in the language of the modern creeds: "Jesus was now saying that there was God the Father and God the Son, and that he, as God the Son, was equal with God the Father." Certainly, interpretation of this sort should free the book from any possible suspicion of having been written in the interest of a lax Orthodoxy.

“THE COLONIAL CAVALIER.”*

We have in this little book of Maud Wilder Goodwin—which, she tells us, makes no pretensions at being a history, yet fulfils all the requirements of a good history—a most admirable picture of our Cavalier ancestors of the South. It shows the home life of the Cavalier, and it was that which made him what he was. To the Cavalier the home was the one sacred spot of all the earth most dear. There he was baptized, married, and there his funeral was held. From the cradle to the grave every day, and every finished task, brought him home. His plantation was his kingdom. He was a lord, and his wife a lady, in the royal English sense of the terms. He had his peasant dependants in his slaves, and led a life of as much luxurious ease as the country could afford, in which respects he was so unlike the Puritan of New England. To the Puritan there was no place so sacred as the church, and no life so desirable as the pure democracy of the town. These two classes repeated in America the two leading types of English life,—the village democracy and the life of the Cavalier English estate. They gave us the town and the parish respectively in the North and South. Every plantation of the South repeated the English estate, while every Puritan village was a new Scrooby. The one was as true an example of aristocracy, and the other as truly an example of democracy, as could be set up in the New World.

We may study either the Puritan or Cavalier alone in the earliest colonial period; but in the later periods of the colonies the two must be studied together, for they were thrown together in the War of the Revolution, from which time on we can trace the adoption of Cavalier manners by the Puritans of New England, and the Cavalier began to take on some of the traits of the Puritan. In this way the Cavalier did much to shape and color the national life, vastly more than some of our historians and critics have been disposed to recognize. Nowhere have I met a truer picture of the life, the thought, manners, customs, and character of my Virginia ancestors who came to Jamestown in 1613 to take part in defending the place against the savages while the settlers were cultivating their tobacco in the door-yards and streets. There is not in print to-day so valuable a contribution to the history of the Cavalier, but that this little book will live as a dear picture of their fathers to the descendants of the old Cavaliers. To any one who may wish to know how the Cavaliers lived, what filled their lives from the cradle to the grave, I wish to recommend this little book.

“THE RELIGIONS OF JAPAN.”†

The chapters in this book were originally lectures on the Morse foundation of the Union Theological Seminary, New York. They do not impress us as well adapted to their original use. Certainly, they must have required very close attention; for they do that in the reading, and even then they do not leave a very definite impression. To speak frankly, Dr. Griffis has not the art of putting things. His book is not well written. Its style is not attractive, and it is not well put together. We have heard a lecture of an hour's length on the same subject, which was more instructive than these dozen lectures, or, at least, left a clearer impression of what one really wants to know. Dr. Griffis has spent several years in Japan; and, while there, he had abundant opportunity for studying the living organism of Japanese religion. We find no fault with him for not giving us the results of his study, for he did not set out to do that. He has written a history, and he has gone to books for his material; but it is surprising that something more of color has not floated off from his personal experience to illuminate and adorn his page. There is this negative fault; and there is also the positive one that, lecturing in a theological school and to students who might be embryonic missionaries, he has felt called upon to make many invidious comparisons between Christianity and the religions of Japan, some of them no doubt justly conceived, but all having a perfunctory air.

He begins his first chapter by telling us that "comparative religion is Christianity's own child." Shall we say "the child of her old age"? What is more to the point is that it is not her own, but an adopted child. The science of Comparative Religion is a scientific birth, and its adoption by Christianity has been a matter of slow development. The Christian heretics were first inclined to welcome the terrible child, and among the orthodox there is still a good deal of comparative religion that is not scientific. Of Dr. Griffis it can certainly be said that he is always ready to acknowledge what is good in other faiths, however natural his conviction of the superiority of his own.

We have first a chapter on the primitive faith, "The Religion before Books," then two on Shinto, two on Confucianism, then five on different aspects of Buddhism, one of these on the mixture of Buddhism and Shinto, a depressing chapter on the Roman Catholic mission, and, finally, "Two Centuries of Silence," with hardly a word in regard to the present situation and as little of the future as if the author had heard the admonition of Hosea Biglow ringing in his ears, "Don't never prophesy unless y' know."

A DICTIONARY OF THE TARGUMIM, THE TALMUD BABLI AND YERUSHALMI, AND THE MIDRASHIC LITERATURE. Compiled by M. Jastrow, Ph.D. Part VII. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons; London: Luzac & Co. 4to, pp. 107.—This part of Jastrow's Dictionary, coming down to the end of the letter Kaph, and finishing the first volume, is marked by the succinctness and clearness which have been referred to in preceding notices of the work in the Register. The definitions are concise, the citations from the literature are translated, and technical terms are explained. It is something to be thankful for that the author takes the vowel-letters in hand. Every one who consults Levy's Dictionaries of Targum and Talmud feels painfully the tohu-bohu of the matres lectionis. One can never tell in what region of the alphabet Levy will put a given word. Jastrow attempts to hold to the simpler spelling, but inserts the word also in the place required by the vowel-letters, referring to the simple form. He wisely inserts as separate words a large number of variant forms, a proceeding very convenient for the beginner in Talmudic literature, and indeed for all readers. As is well known, the criticism of the text of the Talmud and the Targums is still in nascent shape, waiting for some man to devote his life to it; but Dr. Jastrow here and there calls attention to MS. readings, and will doubtless enlarge this feature of his book as the material increases. A number of interesting words occur in this part. Yeser, "disposition, nature," is one of those terms in which the Talmud touches on theological psychology. It deserves special consideration, both as bearing on the old Jewish conception of man's ethical nature and as possibly illustrating parts of the New Testament thought; and we may regret that the necessary limits of Dr. Jastrow's work made it impossible for him to give a fuller account of it. Under Yeshu are given several Talmudic passages (suppressed in most editions of the Talmud) in which Jesus of Nazareth is referred to. This also is a point that has not yet been properly worked up. One of the citations under Keneset, "congregation, synagogue," states that there were four hundred and eighty synagogues in Jerusalem, and each had a school. The "Great Synagogue," however, should be described, not as "a supreme authority established under Ezra and Nehemiah," but as a fiction of the later Jewish writers. In general, Dr. Jastrow's work is worthy of hearty praise, and should be in the hands of all students of Hebrew. The author declares his indebtedness to the Jewish Publication Society of America, whose generous subvention will materially aid the progress of the work. The title-page of Vol. I. will be furnished with Part VIII.

FROM A NEW ENGLAND HILLSIDE: NOTES FROM UNDERLEDGE. By William Potts. New York: Macmillan & Co.—This is the record of a year of country life. It might have transpired in any one of a hundred New England villages, and been much the same in its inclusion of the fleeting pageantry of earth and sky; but not every New England village has a "Miss Porter's School" to dash with local color the bucolic scene. Mr. Potts uses this color sparingly, but with good effect; and Farmington, Conn., if it has waited long for its idyllic annalist, may be glad that he has come at last. Ellery Channing may not be sound in his conviction that "Only those who in sad cities dwell Are of the green trees fully sensible," but it is certain that on almost every page

of Mr. Potts's book there is the joy of his escape from the habitual grind of city life. Yet, but for its reflections of certain aspects of city life, his book would be less entertaining and far less valuable. Never does he discourse more pleasantly than when talking of his city club, the Century, and of his city friends, unless it be in the section that is warm with his grateful admiration for his friend, George William Curtis. An ardent lover of the country, Mr. Potts has not the bucolic mind. He is in touch with current literature, and with current questions, social and political, as those to the country manner born and bred generally are not; but these things, as "recollected in tranquillity," have a more proportionate value than for the busy citizen. Not only has Mr. Potts been a dweller in cities, and returned to them from time to time during his pastoral year, and brightened his page with these excursions, but he has been as far as Virginia, and writes pleasantly of that; and then he allows himself to draw upon his memory for a little voyage to Bermuda, concerning which he is "still vexed," so bad a sailor did he prove. But, when all this is said, it remains to say that the most closely personal part of the book gives it a more unique value than its "intimation clear of wider scope," its lucubrations on a great variety of matters, the most consoling being those which are more or less convincing of the insignificance of material resources as a factor in the happy life. "Rice to eat," said Confucius, "water to drink, the bended arm for a pillow,—the superior man is content with these things." Mr. Potts is of quite the same opinion. Like Dr. Holmes's contented man, he "only asks a hut of stone"; or, rather, the first stories are of stone, and the upper ones of wood. We follow the process of its building on the hillside with much interest, and the building of the hen-coop,—a "lordly pleasure-house,"—and the digging of the well, the planting of trees and shrubs, the making of the garden, and all that. At other times we go with Mr. Potts upon his walks, and he tells us many pleasant things about the flowers. The long drouth of last summer does not dry his page, but the welcome rain at length gives it a fresher hue. Best of all is the unaffected love of the country which breathes from every page. It has a double operation, assuring us a sympathetic enjoyment, but, alas! also making us more conscious of our chain. But "after April, when May follows," we shall have a brief foretaste of "the glory that shall be revealed to us" (revised translation); and the next month is June, and then we shall see whether "this boasting" of Mr. Potts is the loudest that there is in Arcady.

LITERARY AND SOCIAL ESSAYS. By George William Curtis. New York: Harper & Brothers.—We have here a collection of lectures and reviews and other papers, some of which are evidently not of a character that would include them in the "Orations and Addresses" of which three volumes have been published. But why "Sir Philip Sidney" and "Washington Irving" were not included in those volumes it is difficult to imagine. They were certainly deserving of a place among the best. Probably no lecture delivered by Mr. Curtis enjoyed a wider fame than the "Sir Philip Sidney"; and it will be a delight to hundreds to read it here, and try to estimate how much of their original delight in it was owing to the matter and how much to the manner of the lecturer. It will be interesting, also, to compare this example of his earlier manner (1857) with the "Washington Irving" (1889). The difference is not obtrusive, but it is there. As we have the former here, it has ear-marks of its adaptation to a much later time than 1857. There is no acknowledged editing of the volume; but, whosever the hand, it should have given us a few notes of explanation. The lecture on Sidney, for example, has a history that should have been briefly told. The first two papers are on "Emerson" and "Hawthorne," from "Homes of American Authors" (1854). They reflect in a pleasant fashion Curtis's life in Concord. Could he have been consulted, he would probably have advised the omission of some things, especially the nicknaming of Alcott. The man of sixty was even kinder than the man of thirty. Two of the articles are of the nature of reviews,—those on "Hawthorne" (a second paper) and "Holmes"; and, as reviews, they are not good, because the loitering, discursive manner of the essayist asserts itself in them. They are much better than good reviews. The "Longfellow" is a very pleasant paper, with a strong accent of personal acquaintance with the poet. "Thackeray in America" is delightful. The subject was ever one that made Mr. Curtis memorably reminiscent. But, alas, why not the lecture upon "Thackeray!" than which he never wrote a better? We understand that the manuscript is unaccountably missing. This is a great misfortune. We trust that it has not, like the manuscript of Carlyle's "French Revolution," lighted some refractory fire, and that the forgetful borrower will produce it in time for its inclusion with some other "precious things discovered late."

NEIGHBORS OF OURS: SLUM STORIES OF LONDON. By Henry W. Nevins. New York: Henry Holt & Co.—These stories, ten in all, are written as if by an East Londoner, born and bred to the manner of that region, and dropping his initial aitches in a manner absolutely universal, while losing few of them or none,—what is missing in one place turning up in another. This trick doubtless gives a greater appearance of verisimilitude to the things narrated, but it is very wearisome. The author seems to be acquainted with the things whereof he writes. It is a miserable, sordid, vulgar, wicked life that he describes; but it is relieved by elements of pathos and tenderness, and sweet human pity. If the narrator is to be trusted, the people in the slums are not so unhappy there as in the imagination of the more well-to-do and rich. And yet that people can be happy in such circumstances is of itself a dreadful tragedy. "The Saint George of Rochester" is certainly one of the most effective stories of the series, but it has a dramatic insensibility to the requirements of a conventional morality that makes "Tribby" seem comparatively respectable. "Mrs. Simon's Baby" is the most of a comedy of all the pieces. More than one celebrates a devotion which transfigures the sordid misery with a heavenly light. And yet "how long, O Lord, how long?"

THE STORY OF BABETTE. By Ruth McEnery Stuart, author of "Carlotta's Husband," etc. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Because this story has Mrs. Stuart's characteristic touch and manner, it is very good to read. Written for the younger people, while it will have for these an engrossing interest, it will have quite as much for children of a larger growth. It is the story of a lost child and her ultimate recovery. This, we trust, is not telling too much. The children lost in stories are always found. They are lost, in order that they may be found. There is a special providence in the recovery of Babette. It is none other than that of Mrs. Stuart herself. She has taken little pains to bring about the happy consummation, but has accomplished it with a flat stroke of her pen. Gladly would we have had a little more of likelihood in this particular. But the charm of the story is not in its happy goal, but in its course, and especially in the life of Babette with the old gypsy woman who carries her off with an eye to "the recompense of reward" when her loss is advertised in the papers. There are several interesting characters and many interesting situations.

THE ADVENTURES OF JONES. By Hayden Carruth. New York: Harper & Brothers.—The preposterous stories of this book are amusing only when taken in homeopathic allowance. They are what our English cousins would probably call beautiful specimens of American humor, depending, as they do, on exaggeration for their fun. Jones rides a battery shell into the enemy's centre, disables a pack of howling wolves by dropping spruce gum into their jaws, thus effectually closing their mouths. He drives his horse on skates, invents a cat-motor for the supply of electricity, and so on. And all these statements are accompanied by the most circumstantial proof of their veracity. These things may be funny, but the present critic is too old and serious to appreciate it.

SKIPPED STITCHES. Verses by Anna J. Grannis. Keene, N.H.: Darling & Co.—The writer of these verses is a working-girl in a mill, who has used her daily experience amid the rush and jar of machinery as a starting-point for cheerful philosophy and encouraging thought for others. She is the author of the "Old Red Cradle," sung in "The Old Homestead"; and there are many poems here that deserve to be quite as well known. The best ones are those of the mill, and of "the toilers who earn their rest," and of the throb of the great wheels, and of the truth that "life is better taken day by day." Best of all is the prelude, which is evidently written from the heart, a reflection of genuine experience.

Miscellaneous.

"Die Werke der Barmherzigkeit," by W. H. Riehl, has just appeared in Maynard's German series. It is rather a unique and interesting tale of the Thirty Years' War, and gives a pretty clear picture of the sufferings of the peasants through oppression, war, and pestilence. (New York: Maynard & Merrill.)

Literary Notes.

The eleventh edition of Kidd's "Social Evolution," published by Macmillan & Co. in paper covers at 25 cents, will be a novelty, in that it is a really cheap edition for the general public. It is worthy of note that this edition contains the author's latest revisions and an entirely new preface, not to be found in any pirated edition.

Messrs. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn will publish in March: "Cicero de Oratore, Book I.," by Prof. W. D. Owen, Lafayette College; "Burke's Speech on Conciliation with America," by Prof. L. DuPont Syle, University of California; Macaulay's "Life of Samuel Johnson," edited by Gamaliel Bradford, Jr., Instructor in Literature, Wellesley and Boston. In April or May a "Latin Prose Composition" for colleges, by Prof. H. R. Fairclough, Leland Stanford University; "Scott's Lady of the Lake," by Prof. James Arthur Tufts, Phillips Exeter Academy; and a "Surveying and Navigation," by Prof. A. E. Burton, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, are expected from the press.

"Life-Studies."

The immediate large interest in the two small cloth-bound books of the "Life" series, published during the last quarter of 1894 (each containing four papers), together with the general desire that similar brief essays or "studies" might be had singly in neat periodical form, leads to this monthly issue of Life-Studies.

The two books first issued in the bound series were "As Natural as Life," by Rev. Charles G. Ames, and "In Love with Love," by James H. West, subsequent volumes, uniform in size and general style, being promised from Rev. Dr. E. L. Rexford, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Rev. John W. Chadwick, Rev. Dr. M. D. Shutter, and men of similar power. Some or all of the writers here named will appear likewise in the present periodical, in a single issue each, while to their papers will be added popular essays or "life-studies" from others among the best and brightest minds of America.

- No. 1. By Rev. Marion D. Shutter, D.D. A Way-side Prophet, a unique and brilliant paper.
- No. 2. By Rev. Samuel M. Crothers. Making the Best of It, a hopeful and encouraging study.
- (Issues to follow.)
- No. 3. By William C. Gannett,—one of his characteristic, helpful papers.
- No. 4. By Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett,—a suggestive Life-Study (topic to be announced).
- No. 5. By Paul Revere Frothingham. Beauty of Character, a forceful paper.
- No. 6. By Celia Parker Woolley (topic to be announced).

Annual subscriptions to Life-Studies will be received for 50 cents (ten numbers, published monthly, except during July and August). Single copy, 6 cents. Ten copies of any single issue, 30 cents. Sample copy free. *Three annual subscriptions will be received for one dollar (to be sent to one address or each subscription to a different address).

THE FERN FOLK.

BY FANNIE A. COMSTOCK.

Sheltered under a bending tree,
Where shadows lay long and cool,
The fern folk held a merry rout,
Down by the wayside pool.

Never a breeze so faint and soft
But the ferns could answer it;
And, when the wind blew, they frolicked wild
In a crazy, jolly fit.

They heard what the butterfly said to the bee,
And what the bee replied;
They knew the secret the birch-tree told,
They wept when the wild rose died.

The goldenrod proudly counted his gold,
The aster held up her face,
The scarlet cardinal flower grew tall;
But the ferns were queens of the place.

At last, when the year was growing old,
Dame Nature, who loved them best,
Washed her darlings as white as snow,
And laid them down to rest.

THE STORY OF "HIGHFLYER."

BY SYDNEY DAYRE.

"Highflyer" was not a race-horse or a steam-tug or a greyhound or a locomotive or a windmill or an American flag. It was neither more nor less than a sled, and Roy Haynes was the happy owner of it.

He had the name painted on it himself, for it had no name when it came that bright Christmas morning. That suited him all the better. He lingered long in deciding between "Speedaway" and "Highflyer." None of your common, clippy names, like "Eagle," "Dart," "Victor," "Prancer," or "Stag," would do for a sled like that. At last he made up his mind; and the wagon-maker painted "Highflyer" beautifully, with a flourish before and a flourish behind and two flourishes under.

There was not a sled like it on the coasting hill. Even the boys who did not like Roy said that. Any boy who has had the finest sled in a crowd of one hundred other boys, more or less, can tell how Roy felt as he started down hill with a long

"Hi-i-i-i-i! Track! Track! Track!"

The hill was as good as the sled. It was in a suburb of the lively town,—a long stretch down the bluff, with two or three zigzags to it. It required skill to round these zigzags successfully. At the last one there was a turn in two directions,—one, which was usually taken, leading off into a large vacant space, the other into one of the business streets.

"Say, let me have just one ride."

A boy of his own size said it to Roy, a very pleading expression in his face, as he laid his hand on "Highflyer's" rope.

"On my new sled!" exclaimed Roy, in surprise and indignation, giving a jerk to the rope. "No, sir. This is for me to ride. Ride on your own sled."

"Mine's broke," said the boy, whose name was Tony Lee.

"Mend it, then."

"I have, lots of times. But it always breaks again. It's no good."

"Hi! Isn't that a stunner?"

Along the street which crossed the coasting hill at the top came a pair of horses on a swift gallop. A chorus of sleigh-bells kept time with the light feet, and the tails of the fur robes in the sleigh behind them flew out with the quick motion.

"Hur—rah!"

A shout of admiration arose as the coasters paused to watch the gay outfit.

All but one. Quick as a flash Tony Lee saw his chance. Roy had dropped his rope; and, with one swift, noiseless movement, Tony had slipped on the sled, and shot away under its owner's very nose.

The coasters watched the sleigh around the corner, then turned to their sport.

"Why?"

Roy stared in bewilderment at the empty spot which "Highflyer" had brightly filled but a moment before.

"Why, where's my sled?"

Plenty of boys were starting down, plenty more coming up. Very little attention was paid to Roy.

"I say," he called more loudly, "who's seen my sled? White and gold."

"Seen it a dozen times," came in careless reply.

"Where? Just now?"

"Oh, may be so. Or a while ago."

It was plain that no boy had troubled himself much over even such a sled as "Highflyer,"—white and gold and big name notwithstanding.

"Thought I saw you on it near the foot of the hill just now."

"It wasn't me. It must 'a' been that Tony Lee. Wasn't it? His ulster and his fur cap are 'most like mine."

But no one waited to answer; and Roy, full of wrath, started down the hill at full speed, watching all the way for a cap and ulster like his own mounted on a white and gold sled. Of course, it must be somewhere on the hill.

He was interrupted by boys going and coming, sometimes obliged to wait to let merry loads pass him, every moment expecting to see Tony coming up with "Highflyer."

"He's a mean fellow. How dare he take my sled!" Roy's anger grew the longer he watched in vain for his sled, much helped on by the feeling away down in his heart that he himself had been very mean and selfish in refusing a ride to the boy whose sled was no good.

Up and down the hill went "Highflyer's" owner, more and more dismayed and bewildered as the minutes went on. Again he asked, but asked in vain. No one could give any news of Tony Lee or of "Highflyer."

The sun set, twilight was closing in. One party after another of jolly, shouting boys took their latest slide, and went home. Quiet had fallen on the coasting hill by the time that Roy, with tears nearer his eyes than he would be willing to confess, went home.

"Where does the boy who took your sled live?" asked his mother.

"I don't know. I only see him at school."

"Well," she said comfortingly, "you will be sure to find him on the hill with it in the morning. Forgive him, dear. Don't quarrel with him."

Roy was there early, on the eager watch; but no Tony Lee waited to be forgiven. Hour after hour passed.

There would be no school for a week, and he could not find Tony.

The next day Roy, meek and dejected, was on the hill with his old sled.

"Who-o-o-o-p!"

Tony did not dare to give his hilarious shout until he had turned the first zigzag on "Highflyer." Then he let it out with a will, as he scudded down the white surface.

"Who-o-o-o-p!" again. "I'm a steam-engine! I'm lightning! I'm the wind!"

What delight was in the crisp air cutting his cheek! What enjoyment crowded into the few moments before reaching the zigzag from which the two ways turned!

There was something of a crowd of the larger boys there, and the track was impeded. The little fellows always had to look out about getting into the way of the big ones. It took Tony but a moment to decide upon the turn down to the busy street.

It was a little risky; and, if a policeman chanced to be about, he always frowned at such a thing. But Tony was just in the mood for taking risks.

Out into the middle of the street he flew. There was a prancing team of horses coming down the hill; but he knew he could get out of their way, and he did.

Just as he leaped off "Highflyer," and stood to see them pass, a lady had crossed the street in front of them. Behind her walked a boy smaller than Tony, leading a pug dog. The lady was turning to hurry the boy, when the dog, appearing to take fright, set his pudgy feet firmly before him, pulling back on the string, refusing to go on.

With a whimper the boy stopped and jerked.

The lady gave a little exclamation, and started toward him; but Tony was before her. He dashed toward the dog, now exactly in front of the horses, and with a huge jerk fairly flung him out of the way.

But, alas!

In his haste he had forgotten about his sled. Without thinking, he had kept hold of the rope; and, just as the pug was landed beyond danger, the white and gold flashed directly at the horses' feet. They reared, shied, then, at a sharp word from the driver, flew on; and "Highflyer" lay in their track,—a heap of shining splinters.

Tony gazed in blank despair. Roy's sled—the finest one on the hill—smashed beyond all hope of mending! and he had done it!

The lady touched his arm, and he looked up.

"You are a brave boy," she said, "a real little hero. If it hadn't been for you, poor little Tip would have been killed. And your sled is spoiled. Come this way, and I'll get you another."

She led the way to a store near by, the small boy following them, hugging his pug all the way.

"Take your choice," she said. "This is the nicest, I think."

"The—nicest!" Tony caught his breath. He had believed that never before had been seen such a sled as "Highflyer"; but this was, if possible, even finer. Swans' necks arched up in front, and the gold was mixed with pale blue.

A perfect buzz of thought filled Tony's brain, as, after many more thanks from the lady, he drew it away. What a sled for a boy to own!

But it was Roy's. No: was it, though? It had been given him for saving the dog's life.

But it had been given to take the place of Roy's sled.

"I should have done it just the same if 'Highflyer' hadn't been there. It didn't have anything to do with it."

"But, if I hadn't taken Roy's sled, perhaps I shouldn't 'a' been there."

"If I hadn't taken Roy's sled, this would 'a' been mine."

It was a dreadful muddle, and grew more muddled with every thought, as in despair and misery Tony went slowly home.

He could not go to the hill the next day. He went to one away off in another direction. There was little fun sliding among strange boys, although they admired his sled till it became more and more of a torment.

The next day and the next he tried it, and then the burden became too heavy. Toward night he turned his feet toward the street on which he knew Roy lived.

"P'r'aps he'll be so glad to get it back, he'll let me have some rides sometimes. Or—p'r'aps he'll be so mad with me he never will."

He found Roy near his own gate. Roy looked sharply at him, then with surprise at the sled.

"That's a dandy of a sled you've got," he remarked, caressing one of the swans' heads.

"It's yours," said Tony.

"No, it ain't," said Roy, confidently.

"That ain't the one I lost."

"It's yours all the same, though," persisted Tony. "I took 'Highflyer' that day,—yes, I did. And I slid down on to Grand Street; and there was a pug getting foul of some horses,—just skitin', they were! And I slung the dog out of the way, but 'Highflyer' got smashed into kindling wood. And the lady that the pug belonged to, she took me to the store and bought this sled; and—I've brought it back."

"Phe-w-w-w!" whistled Roy, seeming to think the story a most remarkable and interesting one. "You did that well, Tony. I'd like to been there to see. Right in front of the horses?"

"Yes," said Tony.

"Rearing and plunging and prancing,—hey?"

"Yes. Here's your sled. I'm—real sorry!"

With a wistful look at the swans' heads and the blue and gold, he turned and walked quickly away.

"Stop," said Roy, hurrying after him. "That's your sled."

"No, 'tisin't," Tony shook his head.

"I say 'tis. Wait till I tell you. My Uncle George came yesterday, and he thought it was too bad I'd lost my new sled so soon after Christmas; and he thought it wasn't my fault, so he bought me another. Come and see it."

What a torrent of delight swelled in Tony's heart as he looked at the other sled! It was not quite so handsome as the blue and gold, but Roy declared he would not change.

"Won't we have rip-roaring jolly times on the hill!" he exclaimed, as Tony at length said good-by. "Only,—see here,—your sled hasn't got any name yet. Would you just as lief name her 'Fleetaway'?"

"Just exactly."

"Don't you think it's a good name?"

"Tiptop," said Tony.

THE MONEY THAT DID NOT BELONG TO HIM.

The quiet of Franklin Street was broken in upon one day last summer by a raft of noisy boys, who, finding a little stretch of shade thrown by Mr. Foster's tall, new house, took advantage of it for their game.

I don't know just what the game was; but it kicked up a great deal of dust and a great deal of noise, and seemed to be very exciting. One thing I could not help seeing from my window that disquieted me. It was that pennies were passing from one pocket to another. When the whirling top reeled and fell on one side of a certain mark made in the dust, there would be a whoop among one side of the crowd, and pennies tossed from hand to hand. I didn't like the looks of that.

Presently a rather grim-looking old fellow, with a gray mustache and a patch over one eye, came along, walking stiffly on a wooden leg. He stopped long enough to see what the boys were doing, and then I heard him call out in a resonant voice,—

"George Maxwell!"

"Sir," answered a young voice, promptly; and a handsome, straight little fellow stepped out from the crowd.

"There's a little story I've been wanting to tell you for a long while, and I think this is a good chance."

A look passed among the boys which seemed to say that they didn't agree with him about this being a good chance, but he took advantage of their silence to begin his story.

"When we were all surrounded at Appomattox," began the old Confederate, "a friend of mine had several hundred dollars in gold belonging to the Confederate government, which had been put into his hands to buy ordnance stores abroad."

"What am I going to do with this gold?" said he.

"Why, colonel," said I, "come with me. We'll look up what's left of the Confederate government, and turn it in."

But almost before we had gotten out of Virginia Davis had been captured, and the Confederate government was a thing of the past.

"Now, what am I going to do with this gold?" said the colonel.

"Well, colonel," said I, "you are as much the Confederate government as anybody else now; and I advise you to keep the money, and use it to get a start somewhere."

"He didn't seem to like this idea, said he wasn't in the habit of using money that didn't belong to him. But everybody he consulted gave him the same advice; and so after a while he gave it to two friends of his, young soldiers, who had come out of the war without a cent, and set up in business in a small way."

"We'll make you partner in the concern, colonel,' they said; and so they used his name, though he never touched a cent of the money after he turned over to them that Confederate gold. They failed, poor fellows, and lost all the money, and got in debt besides.

"Meantime the colonel was earning his living by his wits, and going right on to success. I don't mean that he was getting rich; but he was serving his country and her broken fortunes and her discouraged people, and was everywhere relied upon as a man of men.

"Just before he married the woman he had been waiting for, I saw him, and congratulated him on his good fortune. 'That Confederate gold gave you the first start, didn't it, colonel?' said I.

"Then he told me what had happened to it. 'But do you know, major,' said he, 'I've never felt right about that money? It wasn't mine to give away or lose, and I've made up my mind to take it out of my own pocket and give it to some State institution.'

"Oh, come now,' said I, jeeringly: 'the day for Don Quixotes is past.'

"I didn't see this old comrade again until a few months before his death. Yes, boys,"—the old soldier's voice grew husky,—"he's gone forward, his tent is struck, he's gone into camp with old Stonewall and 'Mars' Bob' and the rest. 'Well, colonel,' said I, 'I hope you didn't steal that money from the fine boy I hear you are growing at Fair Oaks'; for I knew he was ready to brag about his baby.

"Well', said the colonel, 'when I came to think about the fair and square man I wanted George to be, that Confederate gold bothered me. I knew in my secret soul, after the heat of war cooled, that that money belonged to the United States government; and so a few months ago I spent some hard work finding out the compound interest on it. And I paid it to the United States Treasury, interest, compound interest, and all. Money is rather scarce with me now; but, if I had but one shirt to my back, I'd enjoy looking that boy squarely in the face and daring him to touch a cent of money that wasn't honestly his!'

"George, did you ever hear that story before?"

"Yes, sir," said the lad, proudly: "that was my father."

"Certainly, it was your father,—the bravest man, the best friend, and the truest Christian I ever knew.

"And is it possible that you are putting pennies into your pocket by betting, by gambling? George Maxwell's boy handling dirty money!"

The soldier stumped away, and there was a dead silence out on the shady sidewalk. Then I saw several coins flung down in the dust; and, as the boy sprang after the halting steps, I heard him say:—

"Never again, sir! Never!"—Elizabeth P. Allen, in Independent.

AN EXCHANGE OF FLOWERS.

It was in the early afternoon of a certain Memorial Day that two little girls were walking up Church Hill together. They were of about the same age and size, and both were dressed in white; but there the similarity stopped. Rose Quonn's face was nearly as black as her tightly curled hair, while Lily Standish was almost as fair as the flower for which she was named.

"Are you going to ride in the omnibus?" asked Lily.

"No," Rose answered with a short laugh. "I reckon they don't want any but white folks there."

"Oh, that wouldn't make any difference," said Lily, sweetly; "and I wish you were going with me. I rode last year, and it's lots of fun to wave your flag all along the route. Papa threw a kiss to me when we passed our house, and I threw one back."

"Oh, it must be nice!" cried Rose, her eyes shining. "But I am going to walk in the procession, and that'll be fine. I wish I could ride, though, just for once, to see how it would seem!"

"I do wish you could go!" said Lily. "The omnibus is almost better than a carriage. I'd rather be in that than to go in the landau with Uncle Jack and mamma."

"I shouldn't care what I was in if I was only riding," said Rose. "It must feel beautiful to be rolling along. I'd like to feel it just once," she added, wistfully.

"Why," said Lily, looking puzzled, "do you mean that you never rode in the cars or a carriage or anything?"

"Course, I never did in my life!" answered Rose. "How'd I ride? We haven't the money. Pat Doolan was going to take me in his wheelbarrow around the square, one day; but he made me get out. He said I was too heavy."

Lily was silent as they went up the steps of Red Cross Hall, where the ladies that had charge of the flowers were to meet the children. Never had the difference between herself and this little dark-skinned girl seemed so distinctly marked. She went driving nearly every day with papa or mamma or Uncle Jack, while Rose had never been in a carriage during all her ten years. And now she was to have the long ride in the flower-wreathed omnibus, and Rose must walk! Must she? There might be a way! But Lily was to sit next to her very dearest friend, Virginia Cowles. They had planned it all the night before. Could she give up her pleasure? But she was the only one who knew that Rose had never had a ride. She thought very hard for a moment, and then she went straight to Mrs. Russell.

"If you please," she said, "I wish you would give Rose Quonn my seat in the omnibus, and let me have her place in the line."

"Why, certainly," said the lady, "if you wish; but it is a long walk, dear: you will enjoy the ride much more."

"I would rather march, please," said Lily.

"As you will, then," returned Mrs. Russell, lightly. "It will only be an exchange of flowers: the infantry shall have the Lily, and the carriage shall have the Rose."

"Be good to Rose, and let her have a lovely time," Lily whispered to Virginia, just before she ran off to take her place in the line; and the rapturous face of the little colored girl at the window of the omnibus was enough to repay Lily for her small sacrifice.

HE KNOWS.

"I need oil," said an ancient monk. So he planted him an olive sapling.

"Lord," he prayed, "it needs rain, that its roots may drink and swell. Send gentle showers." And the Lord sent a gentle shower.

"Lord," prayed the monk, "my tree needs sun. Send sun, I pray thee." And the sun shone, gilding the dripping clouds.

"Now frost, my Lord, to brace its tissues," said the monk. And behold the little tree stood sparkling with frost. But at evensong it died. Then the monk sought the cell of a brother monk, and told his strange experience.

"I, too, have planted a little tree," he said; "and see, it thrives well. But I intrusted my little tree to its God. He who made it knows better what it needs than a man like me. I laid no conditions. I fixed not ways nor means. 'Lord, send it what it needs,' I prayed,—'storm or sunshine, wind, rain, or frost. Thou hast made it, and thou dost know.'"—Selected.

A BABY SAVED BY A PIGEON.

An accident occurred recently in the family of a dealer in Japanese curiosities and a member of the Pacific Coast Pigeon Society which proved to him in a most impressive manner the valuable services which may sometimes be rendered by the carrier pigeon, and probably explains some of his enthusiasm in that direction. His little baby-boy was taken suddenly sick with most alarming symptoms of diphtheria. The mother, watching by the bedside of the little one, despatched a message tied on a carrier pigeon to her husband at his store. In the message she wrote the nature of the child's alarming illness, and made an urgent appeal for medicine to save its life. The bird was started from the home of the family, five miles from the store.

The bird flew swiftly to the store, where the father received it. He read the message, called a doctor, explained the child's symptoms as his wife had detailed them in her message, and received the proper medicine. Then, tying the little vial containing the medicine to the tail of the pigeon, he let it go. The pigeon sped away through the air, straight for the cliff. It made the distance, five miles, in ten minutes,—a distance which would have required the doctor three-quarters of an hour to cover. In twenty minutes from the time the mother's message was sent to her husband the baby was taking the medicine. Naturally enough, the owner is partial to pigeons; for he considers that he owes his baby's life to one.—San Francisco Examiner.

A DOG'S CONSCIENCE.

Jack's master was a painter; and Jack, being a lively little fellow, on two or three occasions tipped over a pail of paint in the course of his gambols. Whenever this happened, his master called him up, gave him a lecture, and by way of impressing the matter on his mind rubbed his nose in the paint, much to Jack's discomfort. One day, however, Jack was playing about the paint-shop all alone. Suddenly he ran against a paint pail, and over it went. He looked sadly around for a moment; and, when he saw that his master was not there to inflict the usual punishment, he walked slowly up to the paint, plunged his nose into the hateful mess, and ran whimpering away.—Selected.

HON. ABIEL S. LEWIS.

Hon. Abiel S. Lewis, one of Boston's oldest commission merchants, passed away after a brief illness March 2, in his eighty-first year, at his home in Framingham. Mr. Lewis was born in Boston July 15, 1814, coming from one of Boston's oldest and most respected families. The deceased was a life-long member and constant attendant of the Unitarian Church, and was very highly respected and universally esteemed for his strict integrity, liberality, and kindness toward every one with whom he came in contact. In 1856 he was a member of the Massachusetts Senate. Mr. Lewis was identified with several new industries, among them being the Lucifer or common friction match; but he was best known in the commercial world as a merchant and ship-owner, having large importing and exporting interests with Africa and the West Indies. A widow and four daughters survive him.

A DEAR OLD LADY.

Among the aged saints of our denomination is one whose years have numbered the full fourscore, but whose mind and heart belie the record of time. Mrs. Julia A. Drury of West Bridgewater, who has made her home all these long years in the town of her birth, has proved one of its most cherished possessions. Born in the early part of the century, she has seen three generations rise up around her, and has been to all an example of dignity and beneficence. Her marriage early in life to Hon. Otis Drury was the beginning of a happy and prosperous union; and, although no children came to their home, they failed not to befriend the children of others. Eleven years ago Mr. Drury died; and his faithful wife took up the burdens of life alone, carrying them bravely and cheerfully.

Before his death he was very active in superintending the building of Howard Seminary in West Bridgewater; but, after its completion, his health failed, and on the day of its opening he died. To this institution he bequeathed his whole property, to be held in trust by his widow during her lifetime. This noble legacy has been carefully guarded, and amounts now to many thousands of dollars. Mrs. Drury's interest in the seminary has been felt in various substantial donations since his death. A large picture of her, a benignant and gracious presence, was recently hung in Drury Hall, where it will be a reminder to all of her wisdom and goodness.

Mrs. Drury was christened in infancy in the church at West Bridgewater by Dr. John Reed, and has all her life long been a stanch Unitarian and a supporter of the society there. To herself and to Mr. F. E. Howard, son of Capt. B. B. Howard, to whose munificent bequest of one hundred thousand dollars the seminary owes its existence, is largely due the support of the church in that town. Three years ago a fine organ was presented and put in place by her.

The Theological Library in Boston acknowledges a generous gift in money from her; and many other interests, great and small, have received liberal donations.

Now the shadows are lengthening as she looks down the western slope, and day by day in her quiet room sits waiting the summons to join the loved ones gone on before. Not unmindful of the needs of the humanity around her, she still studies to send some brightness into other lives, still seeks to advance the Master's kingdom on earth, rounding out a long life of service in thoughtful, kindly deeds and words.

It may be said of her, as she "Sits beside the silent sea,

And waits the muffled oar," that

"All the jarring notes of life
Seem blending in a psalm,
And all the angles of its strife
Slow rounding into calm."

Spirit of the Press.

The Presbyterian says:—

It would be a master stroke of policy on the part of the young czar of Russia if he would deal justly with the Stundists. It would add greatly to the prosperity of his realm, show proper recognition of religious freedom, draw to him the sympathy and gratitude of Christendom, and bring down the divine blessing on him and his people. They are an honest, industrious, God-fearing, and gospel-loving people, and are entitled to protection from the government under which they live. They are growing in numbers and in power, and Russia cannot afford to persecute or exterminate them.

The Interior on the Armenian question:—

The horrors of the Armenian persecutions are too dreadful to detail. This is permitted by the European nations because they are too jealous of each other's land-grabbing propensities to interfere. There will be a settlement of these accounts by and by,—always is. The European powers will pay their score to the last mark. God is looking down and listening. Not a groan of despair nor a shriek of agony escapes him; and he never forgets nor fails to make things square. England promised at the treaty of Berlin that the persecution of the Armenians should not again occur. England had better look out for herself.

The Boston Daily Advertiser, in an article entitled "Christians in Turkey," printed an account of affairs in Turkey in 1856 that might have been printed last week:—

I believe that they are now treated worse by the Turk than before. The latter knows his power and the weakness of his victim; and we may be sure of this, that no Turk will ever be punished for violence on a Christian, unless through the interference of a foreign power. The well-known case of the pasha of Varna and the girl Nedele will be remembered by all. I was at Scutari at the time that the investigation was going on, and I well remember the indignation expressed by the Turks at the French for their interference with their liberty to do what they liked with their own; i.e., the persons and property of the Christians. The following account, which I have translated out of a Greek newspaper, the Sun (Helios), will show that the Turk is still the unchanged Oriental despot he ever was: "At Philippopolis a certain Christian celebrated the marriage of his son, to which he invited all his friends and relations. For six days they kept up the rejoicings with music and dancing. On the fifth day the pasha of Philippopolis, unfortunately, happened to pass by, and saw the ladies elegantly dressed, adorned with flowers, jewels, and strings of pearls. On learning the occasion of the festivity from the father with whom he was acquainted, his excellency was angry because he had not been invited. He was therefore invited on the following day, and was a spectator of the profusion and wealth of the family. About midnight he attacked the house, carried off everything, and slaughtered twenty-five persons. On the following day, which was Sunday, the neighbors, consulting together, knocked at the door; but there was no reply or sound of anything within. At last they broke open the doors, and became spectators of the twenty-five corpses, with their fingers mercilessly cut off,—a sad sight for Philo-Turks!

Here and There.

One of the latest inventions is an electrical rocking-chair.

The manufacture of ribbons for typewriting machines is an industry which gives employment to a large number of people. On nearly all first-class typewriters these inked ribbons are used.

It is said that less than half the available water power of Maine is now used for manufacturing purposes. Active measures are being taken by many towns to stimulate the construction of industrial plants.

A model has recently been made to illustrate the currents of the Atlantic. The water is blown out of various nozzles representing the mean direction of the permanent winds. The movement of the water is made perceptible by a dust sprinkled over its surface.

An exchange makes an interesting comparison between the number of physicians practising in civilized and uncivilized countries. Thus New York City has three thousand five hundred physicians for her two millions; China has twelve hospitals and twenty-five physicians for four hundred millions.

The fashionable enthusiasm of the hour is for a new perfume from a marvellous lily that grows in African jungles. Mr. Stanley found this flower, and brought back a large jar of its leaves to his bride-elect. Mr. Stanley says that the natives call this flower Kanonga, and that botanists call it Anona odoratissima.

The old saying that "goods well bought are half sold" is true of Pure White Lead. Dealers cannot afford to sell, or painters to use, unknown or inferior brands (see list genuine brands). Reputation is capital, and can only be acquired by selling or using the best materials. Responsible dealers sell, and practical painters everywhere use these brands.

Any desired shade of color may be easily produced by using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors. Sample card of colors and pamphlet is sent free.

Education.

BARNARD MEMORIAL.—Mr. Parker B. Field will give two more lectures on the "White Mountain Region," illustrated with over two hundred lantern views, on Saturday, March 16, and Saturday, March 23, at 8 P.M.

AMERICAN FOLK-LORE SOCIETY, BOSTON BRANCH.—Negro folk-songs by a Hampton quartette: At the meeting at 8 P.M., Friday evening, March 15, at Steinert Hall, Mr. R. R. Moten of Hampton, Va., will give an account of the folk-songs of his race. This presentation with musical illustrations is the result of inquiries into ante-bellum Negro music lately carried on by Hampton teachers and students. The "corn songs" and "spirituals" are particularly interesting, and illustrate a type of music now becoming obsolete. Mr. Louis Elson and other musical critics will contribute to the discussion of Negro music following the concert. Any profits from the performance will be given to the Hampton students, to enable them to buy a phonograph, with which to make a permanent record of their music. Reserved seats at 75 cents and others may be obtained at Ditson's, Steinert's, and Estes & Lauriat's.

MASSACHUSETTS AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.—The thirty-second annual report of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, giving a full account of the work of the institution, is now ready for distribution. The faculty number twenty, two new members having been added in the departments of zoölogy and botany. Two hundred and six students have been enrolled during the year. Special lectures, seven in number, were given by Sir Henry Gilbert of Rothamsted, England, summing up the results of fifty years of experimentation; and twelve by Dr. B. E. Fernow of Washington, D.C., on "Forestry." Three courses of instruction are offered,—a graduate course, leading to the degree of M.S.; the regular four years' course, leading to the degree of B.Sc.; and a shorter two years' course. A special course in dairy instruction will be opened in the fall. The library now numbers sixteen thousand volumes. The military department has received from the United States government two modern breech-loading guns for artillery practice. Full descriptions, with plans and illustrations of the new barn, are given. A new herd of cattle, born and reared on the plains of the West, has been procured, and every precaution taken to guard against tuberculosis. In the experiment department soil tests, fruit culture, and remedies for plant diseases and insect pests are fully discussed. In the appendix are three valuable papers of special interest to gardeners and surveyors. The first, by Mr. Lounsbury, is an illustrated monograph on a recently imported greenhouse pest, the Orthesia insignis; the second, by Prof. Washburne, is a description of the Eckhold Omnimeter, an instrument greatly simplifying the task of the surveyor; the third is a scientific but practical discussion of "Plant Diseases" by Prof. Stone.

Personals.

The Unity Club of Wilton, N.H., adopted resolutions on the death of Rev. Walter C. Moore, expressing their deep sense of bereavement in the loss of one who has labored with them in all parts of the church work, and their recognition of the beauty and nobility of his character, both as a man and as a preacher.

That remarkable child, Helen Keller, is far better informed than most girls of her age, although she is both blind and deaf. She was dumb also, but has now been taught to speak. Her sense of touch has been developed to the highest capacity. Passing her hands over a dead-mask of Keats the other day, she expressed her admiration for the evidences of intellect which she found there, and even detected the smile that parts the lips of the dead poet. A bust of Napoleon Bonaparte was then given to her. After passing her hands over it she recognized the features of the great warrior, and remarked that she supposed the bust must have been done during the emperor's years of victorious conquest; for the expression was less anxious than in the bust of Napoleon which she had seen a day or two before!—Outlook.

Temperance.

UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—The Unitarian Temperance Society has become incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts. In order that we may push our work sets. In order that we may push our work forward more effectively, we appeal to all Unitarians who are interested in the temperance cause to lend us their aid. We need more memberships and to have a larger number of people actively interested in our work. Especially do we ask our ministers to join with us as members and coworkers. The membership fee is only $1 a year. On the payment of $25 (or that sum within five years from the date of the first payment) a person can become a life member. The Richard Clap Weis Fund of $1,000 is now established, and we shall be glad of additions to it. Address membership fees and all communications concerning the finances of the society to the treasurer, Mr. Frank B. Thayer, 198 Aspinwall Avenue, Brookline, Mass. Our tracts can always be had free, with a few exceptions; and we desire for them as wide a distribution as possible. We wish to have the subject of temperance frequently presented at our conferences, before the churches and Sunday-schools, clubs and guilds. We hope that all these organizations will give the subject at least one hearing during the year. In these, and in as many other ways as possible, we are seeking to extend our work. We therefore ask your assistance by gifts of money, by securing new members, by interesting others in temperance work, by having this work brought forward in your church. We ask the more hearty co-operation of all those who have the cause of temperance and total abstinence at heart. C. R. Eliot, President; George W. Cooke, Secretary.

Charities and Reforms.

The thirty-fourth annual report of the Home for Aged Men shows the present number of inmates to be forty-seven. Bequests have been received during the year amounting to about $59,000.

An interesting report of the Pennsylvania Training School for Feeble-minded Children shows the benefit of careful grading and standards of promotion in the training of these little ones. The manual and industrial work of the classes has grown steadily.

The Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society finds hope in the present outlook, despite the many discouragements; and its recent annual report urges systematic effort to obtain more signers of total-abstinence pledges and a general movement against the saloon as an institution.

The Chicago Board of Education deems it as essential that a child should know the value of soap and water as that of mathematics. So it has introduced the bath-tub as a factor in education. The basement of the Jones School, corner of Harrison Street and Plymouth Place, will be at once fitted up with bath-tubs, and so will the basement of the Washburne School, Fourteenth Street, near Desplaines. The plan originated with Mrs. J. M. Flower, who recently retired from a three years' service as a member of the Board of Education to become a candidate for trustee of the State university.

The crèche idea is a good one. Perhaps an even better is that of forming the leisured women of a congregation into a society whose members should, during one of the Sunday services, each take charge of a working-class home, and so secure to the mother, and perhaps to the father, the opportunity of worship. To the members of the society this would be a religious experience full as edifying as listening to a sermon; and it would bring about a friendly rapport between the visitors and the visited which would deserve, in its beneficial results, to be placed side by side with the direct religious teaching for which it secured the opportunity.

The annual report of the Indiana Board of State Charities shows how the work of the School for Feeble-minded has broadened and developed within the past year. The school has now control of four hundred and thirty acres of land, upon which are three farm-houses. Here live the farmers employed by the school, and a number of the larger and stronger boys, who are physically and mentally better fitted for farm work than any other kind of industry. The value of this farm land is threefold: it provides suitable employment for a class of inmates, leaves vacancies in the dormitories, and the farm products reduce the annual expense.

LIKE EGGS.

"What are these eggs marked 35 cents a dozen?" asked the purchaser.
"Those were all laid this morning, sir," the dealer replied.
"What are those marked 30 cents a dozen?"
"Those were brought in from the country, sir; fine fresh eggs," replied the dealer.
"What are these marked 25 cents a dozen?"
"Those are Canadian eggs,—nice fresh Canadian eggs. They came down in crates."
"Oh, yes, I see," said the purchaser. "But now what are these eggs marked 9 cents a dozen?"
"Those," said the dealer with a slight hesitation, "well, those —is—JUST EGGS!"

The purchasing public has recently had a counterpart of this story in the price of Morris chairs. A Morris chair has been advertised at a figure which corresponds to the eggs at 9 cents a dozen. It was "just a chair." There was absolutely no possibility of its withstanding any wear.

Meanwhile we are having an immense sale for our Carved Morris Chairs. Here is a new pattern just completed. It is a study in beauty. Every detail is harmonious. Such a chair will last a lifetime, and the frame will age as richly as an old painting.

We carry a great variety of Morris Chairs of all grades and prices.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

Important Works.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

Uplifts of Heart and Will. Religious Aspirations in Prose and Verse. By JAMES H. WEST, author of "The Complete Life," etc. Second thousand, with additions. 106 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"Full of a happy sense of Nature's beauty and bounty. One unceasing aspiration towards the 'Moral Ideal,' the 'Blessed Best.'"—William C. Gannett, in Unity.

"One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression. Mr. West is a devout and earnest religious writer."—Boston Herald.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Is this a Good World? Four Discourses by MINOT J. SAVAGE. 60 pages. Paper, 25 cents.

"Why do Minot Savage's sermons go twice as far as any other sermons among us, and with thrice the welcome? Because, without paint, each one is so limpid that anybody can see the thoughts outlined, side by side, like fish at the bottom of a pool."—W. C. Gannett, in Unity.

Monthly Magazine. Tenth Year.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Pleasantries.

Scissor Grinder: "How is business?"
Rag Man: "Picking up. How is yours?"
Scissor Grinder: "Pretty dull."

The woman who laughs in her sleeve in these days must develop a loud tone, or her efforts will be lost.—Pacific Unitarian.

A choir, after a fine musical effort, was surprised to hear the preacher announce as his text, "When the uproar had ceased."

A minister startled his audience by saying, "I have forgotten my notes, and shall have to trust to Providence; but this evening I will come better prepared."

Clerk: "How long will you be here, sir?" Guest: "What are your rates?" Clerk: "Five dollars a day." Guest: "About five minutes."—Selected.

Church Treasurer: "Why do you limit your contribution to a nickel? Don't you know that the Lord loves a cheerful giver?" Brother Amen: "Oh, yes! And that is why I give only a nickel."—Ram's Horn.

Murdoch: "O mamma! See the carriage-wheels making successful rebellions!" Mamma: "What do you mean, dear?" Murdoch: "Why, mamma, teacher said that revolutions are successful rebellions."

"Papa, do you think that God helps those who help themselves?" "Yes, why not?" "Because a man broke into a window and helped himself to some jewelry the other day, and was sent to prison for six months."

"Mamma," said Willie, "do you pay Jennie fifteen dollars a month for looking after me?" "No, sixteen," said mamma. "She is a good nurse, and deserves it." "Well, I say, ma, I'll look after myself for ten. You'll save six by it."

"For what were the Spartan soldiers distinguished?" asked a teacher in the Cambridge Latin School the other day. "For their bravery in battle," answered the sixteen-year-old. "They never went off the field till they were dead."

Jones found Smith engaged in vigorously polishing his shoes. "What are you doing that for? I thought you always wore patent leather." "These used to be patent leather," replied Smith, painfully bringing his spinal column into its normal position, "but the patent on them has expired."—Washington Pathfinder.

Alexandre Dumas has told the Paris press a characteristic story of the author of "Monte Cristo." One day he went to visit his father, who complained of being tired. "I said he ought to take a rest," says M. Dumas, "whereupon he opened a drawer, and, showing me two twenty-franc pieces, said: 'My dear Alexandre, when I came to Paris in 1823 I had fifty-eight francs. You see I have only forty left. Until I have made up my eighteen francs, I cannot leave off work.'"

The Scottish Hymnal, recently issued, failed to contain Sir Walter Scott's inimitable hymn, "When Israel, of the Lord beloved." Whereupon a correspondent of the Scotsman asked the reason of the omission. "A. K. H. B.," the editor, replied that the lines "were not up to the standard of the Hymnal, being lumbering and unequal." An equally amusing case was that of a Greenock paper, to which "On Linden when the sun was low" was offered, whose editor inserted, under notices to correspondents: "T. C. Your lines are not up to the mark. Try again."—Examiner.

THE LITTLE WHITE DOG.

A lady, who spoke a very little French, was getting into a train for Dieppe at Paris last summer. She had a little white dog under her arm. One of the railway guards stepped up to her, and, touching his cap, said somewhat pompously,—

"Madam, you cannot take your dog on the train."

"But I take my dog"—the lady began brokenly.

"Madam, the rules admit of no exception. You must put your dog in a basket, and pay his fare."

"But my dog is different, sir"—

"Your dog must go as all other dogs do!"

The American lady was becoming excited. "But my dog is—is—is—oh, I can't think of the word—I'll put him in my valise!"

"Impossible!"

"Oh, sir, take the dog yourself," the lady exclaimed.

"I cannot take the dog, madam. It is contrary to regulations."

A great crowd had gathered by this time. The lady was beginning to cry; but suddenly she thrust her dog, willy-nilly, into the guard's hands, and then he discovered, to his intense astonishment, that the animal was stuffed.

The crowd roared with laughter, and the guard gave way with as much grace as he could summon up for the occasion.—Selected.

Editorial.

PERSONALITY may help a cause, or it may harm it. There are those who use all their power and influence to float their cause, and there are those who use the cause to float themselves. Many of the differences and quarrels which prevent the free and successful working of organizations, whether religious or philanthropic, political or social, arise from purely personal considerations. There are always people who cannot work in an organization unless they can have their own way, and the cause is sacrificed to their ambition or prejudice. On the other hand, an organization moves on swiftly and smoothly when every one who enlists in it merges his individuality into the cause, or directs it so that the cause is strengthened, not weakened, by personal advocacy.

Two classes of men are needed in the establishment of every reform. There are the idealists, who see things as they will be in the millennium, and who wish to introduce the millennium at once. There are, in the second place, the practical reformers, who believe that the millennium cannot be brought in at once, but that we must move step by step toward it. The idealists are needed to set before us a dream of perfection, but the practical men are just as much needed to put that dream into shape. The idealist is often uncompromising. He will have nothing unless he can have all he asks for; and he wants it to come all at once,—the new Jerusalem let down from heaven to replace the old. The practical reformer, on the other hand, believes that the new Jerusalem must be built step by step and stone by stone; that, if you are to have a superstructure, you must have a foundation. And so he toils for what can be done to-day, hoping that something more may be done to-morrow. He will not do evil that good may come, but he is content to have a part until he can get the whole.

It is somewhat surprising to have Mr. Elbridge Gerry, the president of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children of New York, asking the question, in the North American Review for March, "Must we have the cat-o'-nine-tails?" and answering that question in the affirmative. Mr. Gerry finds precedents enough for flogging. One has only to turn back a century, and he can find precedents for almost anything in the way of cruelty and severity. When it comes to arguments, Mr. Gerry has nothing to offer us beyond these precedents. He makes a great mistake when he says that "corporal punishment is to-day the principal method of enforcing obedience to the rules and regulations of the prisons in which convicts are confined." On the contrary, if Mr. Gerry will examine the records of the Wardens' Association at the meeting held two years ago, he will find that in the discussion on this subject the majority of wardens expressed a strong opinion against it. Mr. Gerry also says that "the application of corporal punishment is recognized in every household in the land as a speedy and effective method of reducing an unruly child to submission." Mr. Gerry has evidently not learned that there are a large number of households in the country where it is not considered necessary to resort to the means which he records as indispensable, and that there are many schools in which the rod has been banished. He ought to know, as president of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, that a great deal of the brutality which renders the existence of such a society necessary comes from the practice of beating children. If Mr. Gerry will turn his attention toward the extinction of corporal punishment instead of trying to extend it, his society will have less work to do.

THE concessions made by Rev. Mr. Savary in regard to the Norwegian Bill are, it seems to us, fatal to his objections. At any rate, it does not seem to us to be any justification of the hostile attitude of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society. Certainly, there is room for honest difference of opinion; but, as this is a matter which can only be settled by adequate experiment, and as the experiment in Norway has proved remarkably successful, it would seem that theoretical objections might yield to the practical test. Mr. Savary objects "that we are to have saloons changed in their nature, and yet saloons." But at present we have saloons without any change in their nature, in spite of all that the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society can do. The fact that the business "is to be called back into the control of the best element of our city population," as Mr. Savary remarks, would ensure a regulation which it does not have at present. Though, personally, we believe in total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, we cannot exclude from the ranks of temperance men moderate drinkers who never lose their self-control. The Norwegian plan does not make the saloon in itself attractive or virtuous; but it takes the saloon out of politics, and puts a ban upon it which it does not now suffer. Education is fundamental to temperance reform; but, so long as the majority in any community insists on drinking liquor and having places where it can be procured, we do not think it is a good temperance practice or principle to oppose temperance regulation which regulates instead of a prohibition which does not prohibit. Some day we hope that peace principles will so prevail that there will be no occasion for the use of gunpowder in war; but, until that time is reached, we hope Mr. Savary will not object to the regulation of the traffic by law for the protection of the community.

THE Massachusetts legislature recently sent one of its regular committees to the South to make commercial investigations. There was a colored member on this committee. He belonged to it by virtue of his membership in the House and his assignment to this duty. When it was decided that the committee should go South for commercial purposes, the colored member went along with the rest. The Boston Transcript criticises the committee for not maintaining its own dignity and the dignity of the State in accepting hospitalities from which the colored member was excluded. We are not told whether the colored member had to ride in the "Jim Crow car," but that he could not be received as a guest in hotels where the other members of the committee stayed. To relieve the committee from embarrassment, the colored member accepted private hospitality. If this man had been Irish, German, French, Italian, or even an expelled Russian Jew, the question would not have been raised; but, though born on American soil, he could not enjoy all the rights of an American citizen. In a private capacity the members of the committee could accept such social attentions as they pleased, but in official relations something is due to the State they represented; and the committee seems to have forgotten this.

THE statement of belief made by Prof. Woodworth to the Berkeley, Cal., Baptist church which we published last week, and which is developed more fully in another column, is a rational one, but not the less ethical and religious. The beliefs which he rejects are none of them essential to Christianity, but are rather obstacles to its progress. The doctrine of an infallible Bible, of the Trinity, of the miraculous birth of Jesus; the doctrine that he died to propitiate God, or the dogma that man fell from true holiness in the Garden of Eden,—have nothing whatever to do with the vitality and power of Christianity as a spiritual religion. These doctrines are mythological and extraneous. Some of them are Hebraic, and some mediæval. They are survivals, not of faith, but of superstition; and, instead of expelling Prof. Woodworth, the Berkeley Baptist church ought to have passed him a vote of thanks for doing what he could to save young men from materialism by showing them that Christianity and science are not in conflict. But it was the fate of Jesus to be cast out because he taught a better doctrine than people could receive, and this has been the fate of many who have followed his example.

A PROTESTANT EPISCOPALIAN.

The title "Protestant" prefixed to the name Episcopalian is not grateful to many members of that church, and they would like to drop it. But there is an Episcopal minister in Cohasset, Mass., who shows by his action that the title still is of significance. This man protests not against the doctrines of Popery, but against the conceits and errors of his own church. We publish in another column his letter in the Boston Herald of March 14. The occasion that called it forth is the publication of the bishops' pastoral, which, considering the flame of discussion it has kindled, might be called an incendiary document. If that document had awakened opposition only outside of the Episcopalian Church, the bishops might view it with more complacency. But the fact that it has awakened criticism and opposition in the Episcopal Church shows that the letter is not calculated to produce the unity of thought and sentiment it was intended to create.

Rev. Mr. Ferguson is a Protestant of the right stamp. There are men who confine their criticisms to the errors of other religious bodies, and pay little attention to those of their own. But Mr. Ferguson strikes out squarely at what he calls "conceits and pretences contrary to the truth" existing in his own church. He protests strictly against the assumption of an infallible book or an infallible oracle; and he denies that the bishops, officially or otherwise, have any right "to speak conclusively for God, or to dictate terms of faith to other men." He protests against putting theology in the place of faith and love, and he denies that the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds are other than symbols of the Catholic faith. He protests against treating the incarnation as a miracle and a prodigy. He regards it, not as a miraculous event, but as a natural one; and he denies with equal emphasis that the doctrine of the virginity of Mary is an essential of Christian faith. He refuses to regard his ordination vows as manacles, but holds that vows to forever hold and teach a certain body of doctrines are "unmanly and immoral and infamous."

Thus Mr. Ferguson shows that he is as good a Protestant as Episcopalian, and he would undoubtedly maintain that he is as good an Episcopalian as Protestant. His letter certainly is an illustration of a very free exercise of the right of private judgment; and, undoubtedly, he does not stand alone in his denomination in his views of the pastoral letter.

It remains to be seen whether the Episcopal Church will take action against this minister. It has been the habit of the Church in former days to cast out men who have protested against its errors and tried to improve its religious theory and practice. It is to be hoped that the Episcopal branch has grown wise enough not to excommunicate the men it most needs. But, if Mr. Ferguson is not tried and excommunicated, it will show what Bishop Potter has maintained, that the Episcopal letter has no conciliar authority, and may be regarded as simply the opinion of the men who wrote it. It would thus render it null and void as an official declaration, and would show that the theology of the Episcopal Church is even broader than the bishops are aware. If the six bishops would now sign Mr. Ferguson's document, they would do more for their own church and for the cause of Christianity than they did in signing the pastoral letter.

THE ARMENIAN ORISIS.

More than half a year has passed since the frightful massacre in Armenia; yet, so far, nothing official has been published by this government concerning it from consular despatches. But there are, happily, Americans who have ventured, almost at the risk of their lives, to send hither the sad tidings of the fate of their fellow-Christians in Armenia. One of them has even returned to this country, and prepared a book entitled "The Armenian Crisis in Turkey," which gives absolutely trustworthy accounts of the state of things there. •

It is a striking commentary on the sultan's method of government that the testimony in this book must be given in such a roundabout way. Letters are printed from sixteen different writers of seven different cities, more than a hundred miles from each other. The writers are men of absolute integrity, and are all American citizens. Yet so little protection have American citizens in Turkey (if they wish to tell the truth) that it is impossible to give the names of these writers, or even the names of the cities from which they write. The original letters were read by twenty responsible persons,—persons whom the sultan cannot silence; and they have signed a paper to show that they have read them, and beg for the cordial co-operation of the public "in bringing to bear upon Turkey the force of the righteous condemnation of our seventy millions of people." These names and extracts from the book are printed on another page.

It may be asked, What will be achieved by suffering the pain of reading the accounts of this frightful massacre? Why harrow our hearts with such agonizing stories? What can Americans do in the matter? Why is it our affair? If it be true that of one blood God made all the nations of the earth to dwell on the face of the earth, then, when these our brothers and sisters in humanity are slaughtered, outraged, despoiled of all that makes life worth living, we should at least consent to know of their sufferings: we should not turn a deaf ear to their cry. If we cannot save them, we can at least mourn with them.

But there are certain things that this country can surely do, according to good authorities. It can create consulates in the province of Armenia, and it can demand consular reports. If the Turkish government were to be assured that accounts of all such deeds of blood were to be published in this country, it would have a most wholesome effect; for, though it is well understood that the United States can have no selfish motives in letting the facts be known, yet there is in Turkey a cowardly dread of England's being influenced in this way to fulfil the promises she has made to the Armenian subjects of Turkey.

The investigations of the massacre are going on, but no one has faith that they will uncover the truth. It is to enlighten the people in England and America that "The Armenian Crisis in Turkey" has been published; and it is hoped that tens of thousands of copies will be read, and that the effect will be to create such a public sentiment that it will help to kindle the zeal of the English people to demand of the government of Great Britain a performance of its treaty stipulations. A writer in Macmillan's Magazine for March says, "It is clear that, if the Russian proposal to leave the treaty of San Stefano unchanged had not been opposed by the British delegates, the reforms in the government of Armenia would long since have been introduced."

England is still bound to make good her promises. And she does not stand alone. The other signatory Powers of the Berlin Treaty must act with her. As Dr. Josiah Strong says, "Their action depends largely on the support of the public; and public opinion," says Mr. Gladstone, "must be brought to bear on this case. . . . The facts furnished by this book ought to arouse such public opinion as will justify and compel prompt and efficient action on the part of the Powers."

One may well repeat the words of Hon. W. E. Gladstone in reference to this terrible massacre:—

"It is time that one general shout of execration directed against deeds of wickedness should rise from outraged humanity, and should force itself into the ears of the sultan of Turkey and make him sensible, if anything can make him sensible, of the madness of such a course. . . .

"Such a government as that which can countenance and cover the perpetration of such outrages is a disgrace . . . to civilization at large and a curse to mankind. . . .

"Strong language ought to be used when facts are strong; . . . and, as long as I have a voice, I hope that voice will be uttered on behalf of humanity and truth."

MR. KIDD'S FALLACIES.

One of the best articles in the New World for March is from the pen of Rev. James M. Whiton, D.D., and sets forth some of Mr. Kidd's fallacies. It recognizes the merits of his work on "Social Evolution," his transparent exposure of the fallacy of socialism; but it shows the incoherent and pretentious reasoning which marks the work, and the contradictions in which it is involved. We have before pointed out the weakness of Mr. Kidd's conception of rationality, but it is shown with great keenness in Dr. Whiton's article. He also points out the fallacy in Mr. Kidd's account of altruism, in relation to the genesis of the altruistic movement and the sanction on which it depends. Dr. Whiton holds with Mr. Spencer and Prof. Drummond that self-sacrifice is as primordial as self-preservation. Says Dr. Whiton:—

We search his pages in vain for any hint that the "fund of altruistic feeling with which our civilization has become equipped" contains aught that accrued before the Christian era. . . . We may grant that the Greeks were but narrowly and egotistically moral, and lacking in conceptions of humanity. But, while we recognize in Christianity a fruitifying power before unknown, we cannot ignore the fact that the altruistic conceptions it has fructified were in the world before it. Here we must be content with a short citation from Thomas Hill Green's remarkable chapter on "The Greek and the Modern Conceptions of Virtue": "The habit of derogation from the uses of 'mere philosophy' common alike to Christian advocates and the professors of natural science has led us too much to ignore the immense practical service which Socrates and his followers rendered to mankind. From them, in effect, comes the connected scheme of virtues and duties within which the educated conscience of Christendom still moves, when it is impartially reflecting on what ought to be done."

Evidently, Dr. Whiton believes with Paul that we are debtors not only to the Greek, but also to the barbarians. Buckle attempted a little too much in his "History of Civilization"; and Mr. Kidd, according to Dr. Whiton, has attempted, from a different angle, a little too much in his "Social Evolution." Dr. Whiton closes his article, which we commend to our readers, with this conclusion: "Certainly, to elucidate so cyclopedic a subject as 'Social Evolution' within the limits of a little more than three hundred pages would severely tax the ripest learning and the most disciplined powers. If a novice attempts it, it is no wonder if he finds his subject as unmanageable as Phaëthon found his horses."

MATTER, FORCE, AND SPIRIT.

A little volume of less than a hundred and fifty pages with this title just issued by G. P. Putnam's Sons is significant of the new trend of modern discussion. Under the impulse given to scientific investigation, and the large additions to our knowledge resulting from it, a wave of materialism in philosophic discussion was almost inevitable. But it could only be temporary in its influence. Spiritual reactions were sure to follow; and it is interesting to note that science has furnished, after all, more proof of truth which, in the name of science, has sometimes been contested.

The author of this volume has concealed his name, but he is said to be a man of high professional and scientific standing. In his conceptions of science he refers all physical phenomena to a single origin, with spirit as the source and energy of all things. In his introduction he says: "If spirit be not the source and energy of all things, the evolving principle of all life in that which we call matter, then matter, dense, helpless, and inert, and having an equally helpless force, is the soul and source of all. Life is then a hideous, grinning satire, a burlesque upon effort and knowledge, objectless and purposeless, and nature nothing more than a vast, blind, grinding engine, unbidden and unknowing, working in an aimless and spiritless universe."

Then follows a detailed study of the properties of matter, and a study of the conceptions and relations of force. We have not space to quote here the illustrations or arguments. But the author emerges into a Theism which is strong, radiant, and ardent. The earnestness with which he repudiates materialism is seen in the following paragraph: "Without Universal Spirit, Nature appears a stupendous satire, grim and terrible in her sardonic irony, and in all her manifestations; merely a mother of freaks, bringing forth human kind as she would stones of the ocean or the clouds of the air, to flutter awhile, and then pass away; beings of mere physical enjoyments, without purpose, without aspiration; a universe of nonentities, with no useful result, without fatherhood and without sympathy; a happening, which may not happen again; a dissolving into everlasting nothingness, from which blind, terrible energies have brought them. If this be all, space would better have been empty extension, or matter have remained at eternal rest."

Another chapter is devoted to the evidence of spirit in psychical phenomena, which the author regards of great importance.

In the final chapter the author concludes that the religion of science is the religion of God. Creeds and dogmas find little consideration here. "The elemental idea of all religion," says the writer, "is best expressed in the language of that lofty and lovely spirit who spoke 'as never man spoke': 'Thou shalt love thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'"

There is strong and hard thinking in this book. It is addressed to the intellect, but it throbs also with aspiration and emotion; and the author's faith and hope are beautifully expressed in a prophecy in the concluding chapter: "The great religions of the earth, through a steadily advancing enlightenment, have been constantly drawing nearer to each other, and nearer to scientific fact and discovery. The whole tendency of the movement is toward broader views of humanity and of a supreme Being more charitable, more gentle, more liberal to man, more fundamental, more universal, more rational toward the great fatherhood of God. Still nearer they must approach, until all unite not only in a common belief of a Father of love, but in that of the brotherhood and kinship of man as derived in common from Universal Spirit, in one hope of universal advancement, one belief in a spiritual life hereafter, and in one acceptance of law as applied to our material world and life, as well as to the hope of continued existence."

JOYFUL SORROWS.

That any joy can be sorrowful or any sorrow be joyful seems to involve a contradiction in terms, but there is no contradiction in experience. There are joys that are tinged with sadness: there are sorrows that are brightened by joy. The passing cloud crosses the sun, or the cloud that seems wholly dark reveals a silver lining.

A new opportunity comes to a young man in life,—an opportunity to go to some distant city to take a more responsible post, with greater honor and richer compensation. It is a joyful opportunity; but it means the breaking-up of home ties, it means a tear in the mother's eye and homesickness for the departing boy. There is a tinge of sadness in the tone of the marriage bell. It means that a daughter is taken from the home circle. It is an April hour, with rainbows made of smiles and tears. A prominent musician lately said that he did not think there was any good popular air that did not have a touch of minor in it.

So there are sorrows that come with illuminations of joy. It is thus with the sorrow of death. It is made bright by the affection which makes the sorrow more keen while it relieves it of its sting. It is sad when the son who has gone forth to win respect and honor in the service of his country is brought back to be buried in the town where he was born; but the sadness is brightened by the legacy he has left of a faithful, affectionate, and manly character. "There is no pit," says Emerson, "that has not a bottom to it"; and there is no sorrow so deep that in the dark waters below we may not see the light of the guiding stars.

FOOTBALL INCLUDED.

The London Christian World reports that an extraordinary appeal, entitled "Are you a Christian?" is being distributed in Blackburn on Sunday mornings. It contains twenty propositions, all of them lurid with hell-fire. Here are a few of them:—

If you do not pray, you are not a Christian, and are going to hell.

If you are a gambler and bet, you are not a Christian; and you are going to hell.

If you sell drink or are a drunkard, or love the drink, you are not a Christian; and you are going to hell.

If you do not give anything to spread religion, if you are able, you are not a Christian, and are going to hell.

If you use tobacco, go to theatres, love dancing, attend balls, play cards, frequent football matches, and indulge in foolish conversation, the probability is you are not a Christian, and are going to hell.

Cards and dancing have long been regarded by many evangelical people as tending hellward. Football is now included. How much stronger President Eliot might have made his case against the play if he had received this information from England in time! But it is in the line of his argument that those who attend the game are included in the condemnation as well as those who play it. It is important to note also that, in spite of the growing popularity of the Free Church movement, people who do not pay for the support of the gospel are not Christians, and are to be burned up with other rubbish.

Musings.

IF I were to select a person to treat the subject of the devil, Prof. C. C. Everett of Harvard is one of the last I should choose. First, because Prof. Everett knows nothing of the devil from personal acquaintance. He has never lied, stolen, cheated, murdered, or broken the Sabbath Day. He is such a moral stalwart that, if it came to a personal encounter, this adversary would not stand the ghost of a chance. It would not be at all fair to ask the devil to risk any such conflict. If I were to seek a man qualified to treat the devil from the standpoint of practical and personal experience, I should look in some other quarter. I should find the wickedest man in New York, and ask Dr. Parkhurst for his address. With nine thousand gin-mills in that city, and with "the devil to pay" in police and political life, it would not take long to find the abode of Satan. There is a supposition that the "devil" works in a printing-office; but if he does not work in the legislature, in the courts, in politics, and very often in religion, then I am mistaken. And now Prof. Everett has followed Luther's example, and has flung his ink-stand at his Satanic majesty. He has not thrown it all at once,—just a penful at a time. It has left no blot on the wall, but has intelligibly inked several pages of the New World for March. It is common for Unitarians to decapitate the devil, and call him evil; but Prof. Everett shows his Orthodoxy by courageously retaining the old family name, though he spells it with a small "d." That he is orthodox anywhere else than in the title I am not rash enough to affirm. As it would have been impossible for Prof. Everett to treat the subject autobiographically without changing the devil into an angel of light, he has looked at him through an intellectual telescope, as one might study Jupiter or Saturn, and has recorded his observations with the impartiality and scientific accuracy of the astronomer.

THE genealogy of the devil is traced through various generations, and it may be interesting to note that Dr. Everett relieves him from any complicity in the temptation of Adam and Eve. "In the story of the Garden of Eden," he says, "as we find it in the Old Testament, there is no hint of the devil. The notion that the serpent was 'possessed,' or was himself a demon, finds no justification here. The story is accounting for many things. It explains, among the rest, the prone position of the serpent, and the horror with which it is so often regarded. To it the serpent was simply the most cunning of beasts. . . . It is now very generally admitted that the Jews received from the Parsees during the captivity in Babylon the questionable gift of the devil. One thing is absolutely certain. Asmodeus, who figures in the apocryphal book of Tobit, is none other than the Mazdean demon, Aeshma Daevan." And in the book of Revelation the serpent that wriggles there bears "so striking a resemblance to one of the most terrible of the Mazdean demons that we can hardly doubt that it is primarily the same being." The mediæval devil is exhibited to us in his grotesqueness and stupidity, and Prof. Everett astutely compares him with the "small politician." It is assuring to be told that "the devil has always carried within himself the elements of his own destruction." He is a negation, and a mere negation cannot exist.

ONE may trust Dr. Everett always to be fair, and especially when he is writing in advance the obituary of a dying abstrac-tion. We are reminded of the familiar story of the old lady who always made it a point to say something good of everybody, and who, hearing some one abuse the devil, said, "Would that we were as industrious!" So Prof. Everett heeds the bidding of the familiar proverb to "give the devil his due." He calls attention to one virtue which he seems to have possessed. "It may occasion surprise when I state that this virtue is that of fidelity. My familiarity with devil lore is not sufficient to enable me to give him a certificate of absolute honesty; but, so far as my memory goes, the devil could always be trusted to keep a bargain. This was true of Abri-man, who held fast to an agreement that he made with Ormuzd as to the conduct of the war between them, though it led to his defeat. In all the stories that I recall in which a pact was made with the devil, it was not he who tried to squirm out of it." And Dr. Everett further admits that, "while the devil has done much evil, he has also been a potent element in the moral development of the world." I suspect most people will say good-by to the "old boy" without a tear. Perhaps those who most insist on retaining him are the theologians who find his presence necessary to maintain their systems of Christian dualism. But even these ought not to be greatly disappointed if, ultimately, God should be recognized as all in all.

Brebitics.

The symbol of the liberal minister's office to-day is not the pickaxe, but the trowel.

The Pacific Unitarian for March has the ring of California gold. It is bright and of the right weight.

Nature in this latitude is beginning to keep a twelve-hour day; and the gas, electric light, and oil companies are suffering the rivalry of more sunlight.

Rev. Silas Farrington pertinently asks: "May it not be that this, that this is the flaw at the heart of the Christian world? It does not believe in the real Christ, and so its Christianity is not the real Christianity?"

The Christian Witness strangely compares salvation to the gripe: "Salvation is like the gripe in one respect. When you get it, you know it." But to compare it to a malady instead of an experience of health is a strange inversion of the word.

The Interior suggests, "If some of the rationalistic critics had a little of Lot's wife rubbed into their cerebrums, they would keep better." Their conversation might be seasoned with more salt, but their progress would be interrupted.

The Examiner (Baptist), in speaking of the old-time preaching, says: "It did the gravest injustice to the character of God, presenting him in the light of one who, regardless of mercy, regardless even of justice, simply sought for some one on whom what would in man be called vengeance must be satiated."

We were mistaken last week in giving the number of the remonstrants to woman suffrage in Massachusetts. There were twelve remonstrances signed by 748 women. For woman suffrage there were 210 separate petitions from 186 different towns and cities, claiming to represent 133,111 individuals, a majority of whom are men.

Unitarians are not given to keeping Lent, any more than are other Congregationalists. But they keep Easter with joyful hope; and we think that Good Friday might be added with great advantage to their religious calendar,—not in acceptance of the church dogma, but in recognition of the great law of love and sacrifice which Jesus illustrated.

The Presbyterian declares that "the Emperor William of Germany is the most talkative sovereign in Europe." Queen Victoria cannot maintain the reputation of her sex in this respect; and we suspect that, if women were sent to Congress, they would soon earn a reputation as the silent sex. Certainly, it would be hard for them to surpass their male colleagues in amount of talk, thought they might improve on its quality.

The Interior celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary with an illuminated cover and an enlarged number. The Interior is young in years compared with the Register, and is still tied up to some old theological traditions; but it celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary with a splendid paper, which is a credit to religious journalism. It is abundantly illustrated, and is full of interesting matter,—especially to our Presbyterian brethren. We extend fraternal congratulations.

The Examiner has developed a cannibalistic appetite of late. Not long since it absorbed the National Baptist of Philadelphia; and now it has swallowed the Christian Inquirer of New York, another Baptist contemporary. Fortunately, it is not likely to die of indigestion; for Dr. Wayland, the able editor of the National Baptist, and Rev. John B. Calvert, D.D., the editor of the Christian Inquirer, have become a part of the Examiner's staff. And, undoubtedly, the voice, brain, muscle, nerve, and of course the circulation of the paper, will be strengthened and improved.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

At a meeting of the Council of the National Conference held at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on March 14, it was unanimously voted to hold a meeting of the Conference in Washington, D.C., October 21, 22, 23, and 24 of the present year. This action was taken after careful consideration had been given to a report from the secretary and treasurer, who at a previous meeting were appointed a special committee to visit Washington and ascertain whether suitable accommodations can be found for the Conference in that city under such circumstances as to give opportunity for social meetings and conferences resembling those at Saratoga, and upon what terms these can be obtained.

The committee reported that Metzger's Music Hall has a sufficient seating capacity for our largest gatherings; and, with its large committee-rooms, it affords excellent accommodations for the meetings of the Conference. Its acoustic properties are good. The Council voted to enter into a contract for the use of the hall at a rental of $400.

The committee also reported that they were able to make arrangements for the accommodation of over two thousand persons at the large hotels in the city, at prices ranging from $2.50 to $4 per day,—a reduction of from one-third to one-half the regular rates. Excellent accommodations can also be found in many of the large boarding-houses at prices as low as $2 per day.

On the recommendation of the committee the Council voted to make the Arlington Hotel the Conference headquarters during the meetings. This hotel, which is easy of access to the guests of all the other large hotels, most of which are in the immediate neighborhood, offers its superb accommodations for all the social gatherings of the Conference; and its rooms for this purpose are even more ample than those afforded at Saratoga. The other hotels which offer a reduced rate are the Ebbitt, the Shoreham, the Riggs, Willard's, and the National. Full particulars as to the rates at all these hotels, together with all other necessary information, will be given later.

After full deliberation the Council adopted the main features of a programme for the Washington meetings, which, when worked up in all its details, will insure, it is confidently believed, a very successful meeting of the Conference,—one which will mark the beginning of a new era of constructive work.

GOOD CHURCH MUSIC.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The directors of music in our churches would do well to consider the anthems, hymns, etc., which Mr. Howard M. Dow has written. Mr. Dow has long been organist in Unitarian churches, and the words which he uses are in harmony with Unitarian belief. Among his publications may be named a fine "Te Deum"; several hymn tunes, among which should be named especially "A Psalm of Trust" (Hosmer's hymn) and "In Heavenly Love abiding," a beautiful adaptation from Costa's "Eli"; and an Easter carol, "Shout, ye High Heavens!" which ought to become very popular. All these are published by Oliver Ditson & Co. W. H. L.

THE SAN DIEGO CHURCH.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The suggestion in the Pacific Unitarian that a collection should be taken in all our churches to assist the society in San Diego to rebuild its church should be followed out as early as practicable. But, besides this, immediate wants press. All the hymn-books, service-books, and Sunday-school library were destroyed. Copies of the revised edition of the American Unitarian Association Hymn, Tune, and Service Book, "The Carol," and books for the library, sent to 25 Beacon Street, marked for the San Diego church, will be forwarded. Twenty-five to fifty dollars in cash will do a prompter service. B. F. McDANIEL.

NEW TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

A recent editorial in the Register on the Norwegian Bill now before our State legislature calls the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society to account for the opposition it is making to the success of the new measure.

Is there not room here for honest difference of opinion? I wish, as one of the life directors of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society, to offer a word of explanation. Some of the board of directors appreciate fully the merits of the theory of a better control and limitation of the traffic in intoxicating drinks in "hopelessly license towns." We all understand, also, that the proposed so-called Norwegian Bill is not a "mandatory," but a "permissive" measure.

But there are practical difficulties in the very nature of the scheme. We say it attempts too much. The theory of the proposed legislation is that benevolence is everywhere equal to the emergency. Our friends heroically hope to extract the serpent's fangs. We are to have saloons changed in their nature, and yet saloons! A business the present nature of which inevitably causes it to drift into the hands of aliens is to be called back into the control of the best element of our city population. The new Norwegian Liquor Companies must be organized of the best property-holders. All stockholders, from first to last, from beginning to end, must be true haters of the present drink evil. All who dispense the drinks to the public under these proper regulations and limitations must be practical abstainers, with fixed salaries. As a very bed-rock of the plan, moderate drinking is to be reckoned with and accepted to be as innocent as the taking of our daily bread. There is to be no question as to any sin per se in the use of alcoholic drinks or the traffic in the same. Persons who from principle do not drink are to retail across the bar, by the glass, these drinks, and to put the bottle to their neighbor's lips.

The American Norwegian plan makes a legal virtue of the saloon business, adopts and honors the drink evil, in the very structure of these new liquor corporations! Can conscience and intelligence accept a business in the very nature of which all drunkard-making has its sources? Can we thus promote temperance?

The banishing of every form, or even modification, of the present saloon business legally is what our present moral sense requires. All places where liquors are sold to be drunk on the spot—tippling-places, in other words—are bad institutions. They are not in their nature different by being put out of B's hands into A's hands, for example.

The custom of allowing lotteries, raffles, at church fairs is a good illustration of what this American Norwegian Bill tries to do. The end in this case is said to justify the means.

Must the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society "keep quiet"? Towns and cities already committed to legal prohibition by wavering and uncertain annual ballots are put in peril all the time. "Hopelessly license towns" there certainly are, and they are open doors to all kinds of moral evil.

The choosing of the better part, so far as the citizens who compose these cities are concerned, is popular agitation and new education to every one in church and school. A matter warmly advocated, a cause espoused with honest conviction, has developed impatience of spirit. The friends of this new Norwegian Bill are very headstrong advocates.

It seems to some of us to be a wholly perilous plan to try to put the intrinsic wickedness of the vast traffic of the rum power into the ranks of sobriety, benevolence, innocence, and Christian character. WILLIAM H. SAVARY.

A GUARANTEE FUND FOR THE "NEW WORLD."

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In behalf of the committee named below, I would call the attention of your subscribers, and of all others interested in the prosperity of rational theology, to the following circular and pledge for the benefit of the New World. We trust that not a few persons who are able to do so will send in their names to any one of the committee, with the assurance of their support. N. P. GILMAN.

CIRCULAR.

BOSTON, MASS., March 8, 1895.

Dear Sir,—The National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, at its meeting in September, 1894, declared its great satisfaction with the honorable record made by the New World, and recommended the raising of an endowment of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) to be placed in the hands of the American Unitarian Association as a trust fund, the income only to be used. The undersigned were appointed a committee on "the current support and endowment" of the New World. After careful consideration, we have concluded it to be unwise to attempt to secure an endowment at present; and we have therefore confined ourselves to the more immediate matter of the "current support" of the periodical.

The New World is now generally recognized as the principal organ in this country of theological learning, and the best thought on religious questions. It has also a European reputation, and attracts communications from the chief scholars on both sides of the Atlantic without regard to distinctions of sect or creed. It seems, therefore, very important to maintain and enlarge its circulation, which now exceeds one thousand copies. If it had a subscription list of two thousand, it would be self-supporting. We believe that, with the aid of a guarantee fund, this result may be reached within a few years. To this end we recommend that such a guarantee fund, of not less than ten thousand dollars, be secured, which shall be drawn upon whenever there is need to meet any deficit in the expenses of the New World. At our request, Messrs. E. B. Haskell, Francis C. Lowell, and N. P. Gilman have consented to act as trustees to hold the title to the New World, to secure subscriptions to this fund, and collect and apply any part of it when necessary.

We earnestly invite your co-operation in placing this important enterprise on a substantial foundation.

EDWIN B. HASKELL, Newton, Mass., Chairman.

JAMES B. THAYER, Cambridge, Mass.
FRANCIS C. LOWELL, Boston, Mass.
GEORGE O. SHATTUCK, Boston, Mass.

JOHN P. FORBES, Taunton, Mass.
ALFRED STONE, Providence, R.I.
AUSTIN S. GARVER, Worcester, Mass.
SAMUEL A. ELIOT, Brooklyn, N.Y.
ENOCH LEWIS, Philadelphia, Pa.
THOMAS R. SLICER, Buffalo, N.Y.
ENOCH PRATT, Baltimore, Md.
JOHN SNYDER, St. Louis, Mo.
C. C. EVERETT, Cambridge, Mass.
N. P. GILMAN, Boston, Mass.

PLEDGE.

The undersigned hereby subscribes the amount set against his or her name to a guarantee fund for the support of the Quarterly Review called the New World, upon the following conditions:—

1. No subscription shall be valid until the whole amount subscribed shall exceed ten thousand dollars.
2. The liability of a subscriber shall terminate at his decease, if he so stipulates.
3. When funds are needed for the support of the New World, the amount shall be assessed upon the subscribers in proportion to their subscriptions, and shall be collected and applied by Messrs. E. B. Haskell, Francis C. Lowell, and N. P. Gilman, trustees, or a majority of them, at their discretion. In no year shall such assessment exceed fifteen per cent. of any subscription.

For the Christian Register.

OUR BROTHERHOOD.

BY CHARLOTTE W. THURSTON.

A year gone by our eyes entranced sought
 Those snow-white turrets of Aladdin's realm.
 On Illinois' wide marshes, wonder-fraught,
 Flashed on our dazzled gaze the marvels brought
 By Geni-barque, with human mind its helm.
 Commingling with the triumph, with the awe
 At man's achievement through the ages wrought,
 Springs the glad thought
 Those clasping hands shall help that holier law,—
 A truer interest for another's need,
 A deeper reverence for a foreign creed,
 Outstretched from Christian church and minaret
 The arms of crescent and of cross be met.
 A righteous patience shall be born anew
 With Buddhist, with Agnostic, Christian, Jew,
 A wider tolerance given to each and all,
 Bound by one brotherhood's encircling wall.

THE RELATION OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED TO STATE CONTROL.

BY KATE GANNETT WELLS.

There is no phase of education which involves more closely the question of the extent of State control over the individual than that of the training of the feeble-minded. How early and for how long shall the State be responsible for the education or custody of those who are neither capable of receiving the benefits of the regular public-school system nor sufficiently criminal for the temporary or permanent shelter of a prison? Shall the State erect and maintain a philanthropic caravansary, in one or many dwellings, classified or graded, where the spirit of humanity shall provide such shelter, food, and clothing that the imbecile will be sure to live longer than if he were at home, the prey of circumstances?

Families, almshouses, institutions, have each in turn given shelter to this class of persons as a matter of city, town, or State self-defence. But it is only in these latter days that we have schools for the feeble-minded which can be construed as coming under the provisions of State education as a link in the public-school system.

When such schools were first opened, it was hoped that the "improvable" defectives could become self-supporting, and return to the community whence they came. But, gradually, the belief strengthened that they must not go back, even if improved; for these moral imbeciles, though occasionally phenomenally bright in memorizing or calculating, could become the progenitors of criminals. Many of their families were unwilling to receive them; for, if they did not demoralize other inmates, they could neither be watched nor made happy. No one wanted them as boarders; and, when their parents and relatives died, nobody had any legal responsibility for them. So one individual after another was retained in the schools, until they held all grades, from custodial idiotic cases to the brighter feeble-minded pupils, whose education embraced physical, moral, and mental development, the old adage, "Once an idiot, always an idiot," being continually disproved.

The first lesson that teachers and superintendents have learned from these defectives is the impossibility of drawing a sharp line between the highest grades of the feeble-minded and the lowest grades of normal boys and girls. The second lesson was the civilizing power of love and cleanliness,—an old lesson, but never receiving more pathetic illustration than when the institution bell rings for meals and the inmates form in a so-called line. First come the lower grade, shuffling, shambling, mumbling, grinning, distorted, cross-eyed; yet no one pushes another. The fat, stupid, strong idiot is carrying a wee, paralyzed boy of two. She lifts it tenderly into its high-chair in a special corner, where are the few who cannot feed themselves. The hunchback girl is almost boosted along by an irascible, helpful epileptic. The waddling, comfortable woman comes in with a thin, excitable child. The wheel-chairs for the helpless are pushed by the lame and the halt. There is no animal tearing of food or rough haste. All is decent, not repulsive, but coarse. Big and little heads bend together over the tin plates and mugs, with plenty of stew, mush, milk, and bread. The higher-grade pupils have crockery plates and cups, even napkins. All help each other. What are the carefully measured kindnesses of ordinary society compared with these instincts of helpful love which reveal the "angel plan" in each awkward child?

But shall those children, those men and women at the lower tables, always be there, growing older, fed, clothed, and warmed at the expense of the State, possibly just a little farther on in intelligence, but never able to become self-supporting? This part of the question almost settles itself. For, as the adults outlive their natural homes, the towns will not support them, except on condition of their being out of its boundaries; the prisons cannot take them; and the State, finding itself under the compulsion of enforced parentage, provides for them, the helpful imbeciles often becoming the kings and queens of the custodial departments, having their various adherents. Innocent rivalry is improving. Often, too, are they the best mentors of each other, encouraging and snubbing each other with a frankness far ahead of their ability for performance.

Occupation is what they nearly all need. Wage-earning, for most of them, is not to be thought of. Yet one wise superintendent gave to some of his adult childish wards a penny a week as wages; but he also took care to provide a semi-weekly ice-cream cart in summer and a Christmas counter in winter where these pennies earned could be spent. Stone piles, suggestive of Stonehenge, are provided at the school at Waltham, Mass., for those who must do something and can do nothing profitable,—"work reduced to its lowest terms," says Dr. Fernald, as the children, often men, carry cobble-stones, large and small, from one pile to another, or else walk round and round a circular track, dimly fancying that they are athletes. If the surplus energies of the imbecile and idiot were not worked off in this manner, they would be harder to control, and, if out in the world, would wreak themselves upon the community, multiplying their own kind. The time has not come, though its mercy is partially recognized, when, under the protection of law, medical knowledge, and wise guardianship, perhaps there may be found authority to let such inmates gently sleep away their lives. But, certainly, the State has a right to protect itself from the ruin they cause through reproduction.

But what shall be done with the higher grades of the feeble-minded, who can support themselves spasmodically, at least? How far shall their education extend, and how costly shall it be? Shall they be returned to their homes when brighter and stronger, and reproduce themselves? Shall the State permit this? Who shall decide? Doctors and philanthropists differ. Facts remain. A mother objected to placing her daughter in one of these schools, as it would be an intellectual disgrace to her family; but, when this unmarried daughter became the mother of three children successively, her parent implored the State to take her. And the State, in self-defence, now supports her in one place, and the towns her children. Yet under whose authority is this attractive woman always to be a dependent on the State, perhaps for fifty years to come? If 46,000 tramps cost the United States $9,000,000, how much does the recklessness of the defective adults increase the expenses of almshouses, prisons, and institutions? Because we have neither marriage dower laws nor much penalty for illegitimacy, because the question of birth must always be one of personal rather than of legislative decree, is the State not to be sufficiently paternal in its authority to prevent births by seclusion of those who have no physical, moral, nor intellectual right to bring children into the world?

The expense of the maintenance of most defectives has been greatly lessened by kindly utilizing their enjoyment in activity. They enjoy picking off potato-bugs, digging ditches, clearing the grounds, taking care of animals, and waiting on the helpless indoors or watching them outdoors. All this is education, and raises the imbecile to a cleanly, comparatively useful plane of existence.

The economic bearing of this matter of State support is more complicated in the school-room, properly so termed. There the science of education is so fascinating, its results so enticing, that one is tempted to forego the question of cost in admiration of the mental results attained. Fully 50 per cent. of the higher-minded among the feeble-minded are capable of receiving a great deal of book instruction. Though the kindergarten takes many of them at the age of eight or ten, and though more progress is made when the children are in classes, and so learn through imitation, the best instruction is always personal to the child and original with the teacher. Object-lessons are with many the beginning and often the end of their education. At Waltham there is a "Zoo" for which the children care. They pet the rabbits as mothers pet their babies. They watch the pigeons flying in their high cages, and learn that they themselves cannot fly, as they try to do in imitation by spreading their arms and legs. The birds and animals are brought into the school-room, and become the living topic of the lesson. They learn physical geography from the tray of sand in which, on a miniature sand hill, they put a toy lighthouse, while the water flows at its base and the village people—wooden figures—on the opposite shore stand near their toy houses, and climb the sand hills freshened with bits of green. They learn words as if they were colored pictures being stamped on the brain. They hang their hats on numbered pegs, desire to get their own hats acting as an incentive to familiarity with the figures. They acquire arithmetic by number exercises in objects. They read one word at a time in rotation, to learn how to keep the place on a page. They lie down on the floor to comprehend the term horizontal, and stand up as interpretation of vertical. From all this they progress to spelling, writing, intelligent reading of elementary history and of Jules Verne, "Uncle Tom," etc., and to an understanding of simple nature studies, and at sixteen are often the equal of children of ten.

They have learned in school hours how to do many useful things, like lacing their own boots on the real article, a class boot, and not on a piece of eyeletted leather placed in an upright frame, as is done abroad in one school at least and is a curious instance of methods. The fastening of buttons, however, cannot be so well taught on clothes; and so two strips of ticking are provided, on one of which are sewed all varieties of buttons, while the buttonholes are worked on the other strip. To fit one to the other is a difficult art to acquire, but most useful for the dormitories, where, after all, the marvels of education and patience are seen. For on the ward attendants devolves the final or initial success of that which the principal or superintendent may desire to attempt. Their tasks are often repulsive, the salary or wages small; and yet their daily lives are rich in hourly deeds of love and skill.

Housework is seldom a drudgery for the feeble-minded. To perform it skilfully is often their highest ambition, as ironing matches take the place of spelling matches; but all their work always has to be done under supervision. Personal vanity is a boon to them. When one is so imbecile as not to frizzle her hair, then is she truly an idiot.

Since manual training and gymnastics (the latter not as an end in itself, but as a means to self-development) have been introduced into these schools, the pupils have greatly improved in their capacity for usefulness. The wood they use is comparatively thick, as being easier than thin pieces for their clumsy fingers to handle. The rough boards into which the first screws or nails are driven tell the tale of thwarted senses; but the final dove-tailed joint of the box shows what education has done for them, while cobbling and sewing are their fine arts. Gymnastics have straightened their bodies and broadened their minds. Shambling gaits are laughed at by those who have outgrown them. In all their progress they have only learned what to do, an immense advance upon inaptitude, but have not, like most normal adults, conceived the reason why.

The paternalism that the State ought to exercise in absolute prevention of marriage among the defective finds pathetic proof of its necessity in the tenderness that they all show to babies and dolls, even big, stupid men hugging the huge cloth cats given them at Christmas. The manner in which the women and girls caress and put to sleep their dolls is full of the sweetness and sadness of unfulfilled motherhood.

There are now in the United States 19 public institutions for 6,009 feeble-minded and 9 private schools for 216 pupils. But, according to the last census, there are 95,571 idiots and feeble-minded in our country. In schools where only the brightest of these are received, 20 or 30 per cent. leave as capable of self-support, though 50 per cent. of those who have been trained from childhood are able to work enough to pay for the actual cost of their support, whether in an institution or at home, provided they are under careful and constant supervision. If such watchfulness cannot be given to them outside of an institution, they should forever remain in it, because of common sense, heredity, and political economy. The children of such parents beget pauperism, which in its turn begets other evils and also crimes.

On the internal economy of such a school or institution largely depends its justification. It has no excuse for that sentimental philanthropy which would extend to the defectives the same luxuries in convalescence or the same contrivances for prolonging life which are lavished upon the wealthy and healthy. Not even an idiot should be allowed to suffer one moment of unnecessary pain, hunger, cold; but neither he nor many of his relatives can appreciate the refinements of surgery, medicine, diet. Plenty of good food, outdoor and indoor space, something to do, steady kindness, firmness in discipline, are the requisites of such an institution; and no one can provide them who has not an inexhaustible fund of pure, simple goodness.

Beautiful surprises are always occurring in response to such invariable goodness. There are literally none who are untrainable. The dormant kindness of imbeciles to each other is always suggesting itself. The favorite pastime in a custodial ward is the dragging back and forth in the long hall a block of wood with cords attached to its two ends. On it sit the stupidest children, who are drawn by the less stupid, all as merry and as self-important as if they were sleighing. Truly does one of these children call the Waltham School "a fun home." Their outdoor life is one of the joyous features of their existence. They do not know how to take cold, they are too simple to grow tired, and extraction of a tooth is regarded as a special attention from the doctor. Each shady grove has its own select circle of defectives, with its monitors, where politeness is exercised with scrupulous justice. Some are intelligently happy, others stupidly glad. All are compassionate of each other's weaknesses. They never see themselves as others see them.

The first and last point aimed at in schools or custodial departments is that of making the weakest and the brightest "feel a desire to do something they have not done before." "Progressive desire," in psychological terms, is the result of months of patient teaching. The illimitable power of minute training, the endless patience of ingenuity, make the education of the feeble-minded one of the most marvellous researches into the powers of the soul and into the connection between mind and body. Beyond this lies the responsibility for heredity, pauperism, and crime,—a responsibility which the State shares with the individual parent; for both are trustees to the future.

THE LOVE UNIVERSAL.

BY LIZZIE CHENEY-WARD.

Animal life is conscious life. Its prime attribute is feeling. Everywhere it depends on other life. At least, in all the higher forms this life is filled with desire for response and with tendency to reciprocate. The inorganic world alone satisfies neither of these. The highest or human life finds response of some sort in life of every sort, and in some degree and in some manner reciprocates this. But it does more. It reaches out beyond the finite forms of other life and through the limitations of material environment, and there it meets an infinite suggestion. It finds in this an immeasurable responsiveness, and thus is developed an undying desire to meet this response by a more complete type of living. In this oft-baffled longing is the evidence that in the universe is something in which man's nature participates, and which is the essence, promise, and inspiration of his existence.

In everything that we can know or imagine exists this permeating, ethereal something, to name which is to limit that which is limitless, and to attempt to understand which is to restrict within the scope of finite comprehension that which is infinite and incomprehensible. In all its manifestations we see one great truth. It works for what we call good, and tends toward what we call uplifting. In our finite language we have a term for that which inspires and elevates us. We name it love. It is this which takes the soul beyond itself, and which causes it to transcend its own limits. It is the tendency to something outside of self, it is the expansion outward and upward into the infinite, it is the yearning for completeness, it is the mutual attraction in universal nature tending to unity.

The Power that is the source and destiny of all things, the pervading Spirit of all phenomena, the Love of which all sentient beings partake (of which we know because it is in us, and in which we believe because, the more we learn of life and nature, the more we learn of its manifestations) is God. Love is God. We can conceive of nothing in which it does not exist. We see it in its highest form in parental, particularly mother, love. We see it in sexual love; in filial love; in friendship; in human feeling, kindness, and consideration for any form of life; in devotion to principle, country, humanity; in desire for knowledge; in susceptibility; in the laws of life, growth, and development; in material substance; and the mutual attractability of masses, molecules, and atoms.

Love is beneficent and friendly. In everything that we know of it it re-enforces our life and tends to our development. There is no intrinsic power of evil in the universe. Evil is the measure of man's lack of attaining good. Good is the perception of law and obedience thereto. God works through law in one eternal progression, and is manifested visibly in matter. The law of God or Nature is not evil, though it destroys man. It destroys him because he does not know enough of it. He regards it as evil because he does not understand it in its complete significance for good, and because, in his ignorance of it, he is destroyed by it.

Nature is constantly teaching man law; and man's mission during the physical phase of his existence which begins and ends in the Infinite is to learn and live it. He learns it first by his destruction thereby, and later by his patient study and effort to put himself in harmony with it and live according to the light he thus gains. The more he lives in accordance with it, the more he sees the Divinity in it, the Love in it, the God in it. That is religion. Religion is man interpreting the eternal Source. It has been and will continue to be, so long as man is a sentient creature, touched by the divine immortality.

To the extent that law can be known and lived, to that extent does man partake of the infinite Love and live the religious life. In all ages have lived those who have known somewhat of law, and felt the divine Love, and stood up as a light to men. Man through all time has been steadily but laboriously reaching out and up toward the light that a few have seen. But the Life that has been the moral inspiration of the last nineteen centuries emphasized this law of love and God with a simplicity, a thoroughness, and a perfection which outlasts time; and it lives to-day as the rallying point for moral enthusiasm wherever there is Christ in the human soul.

The perfect life is a more simple thing than man can realize. He cannot see all of law; and in his indistinct, partial perception of it life seems complex, and action conflicting. The detail obliterates the grand conception. It is like the old paintings of the saints, in which laborious care is given to the portrayal of the pattern on the border of the robe, but in which the countenances and the articulations of the limbs shock all our ideas of symmetry and reality, or like a fine symphony which is ruined by the performer who fails to subordinate his individuality to the time and harmony of the whole.

Perfection is the profound simplicity of interest, knowledge, and character. In any field of human activity—in science, art, or handicraft—it is the method of simplicity which gives the most satisfying work. Yet to achieve the simple method requires insight into the characteristics of the work in question. So it is with law in nature. Man is constantly increasing his knowledge of it. Every truth that is discovered, in any realm of human investigation, teaches him a little more of the divine unity. The man of receptive soul will ever choose the life of harmony and peace. That is what the evolution of reason means. He will less tenaciously hold to his established mistakes, and will cheerfully attempt to conform his life to each new principle which truth demonstrates. That is the religious life. Love is the essential element of it. It permeates it unconsciously, as the light of the sun permeates the atmosphere. The love that is nearest perfect is a habit of the soul, and expresses itself in all relations of life.

The life in harmony with law is the only freedom man can know. To violate law is to realize individual limitation and restriction and to meet with disaster. Disobedience is inevitably followed by its natural result—injury to the soul and life of man—as surely as the hand is burned if thrust into the flame. Man's own ignorance and blindness make his greatest bondage. The complete freedom is the life in perfect relation to law. The freedom which commands all things, which participates in the infinite expansion of love and law, is in the mastery of self. It is the reach of man's ideal.

The religion which is life is the continual living out of the principles constantly ascertained: it is the seeing of law, and living in accord with it. Religion is man interpreting the eternal Source; and, if he interprets the law through which it works, and sees the inevitableness of it, his religion is law. This law, which works through all things, is the method of the divine Nature: it is God. God, the essential Spirit in things, works in the large for an inclusive and beneficent unity. To him who can perceive it, it is a harmony of infinite Good: it is universal Love.

The soul that has learned this universal Beneficence,—the harmony, the unity of the divine Spirit; that has seen the beauty of the completely rounded, eternal symmetry; and that has felt something of the endless expansiveness of union with the infinite Freedom,—has solved the problem of existence. Then life is religion, religion is law, law is God, and God is Love universal.

NEW YORK LETTER.

One of the guide-book facts which the sight-seer in Paris remembers, whether he cares to or not, is that the books in the great Bibliothèque Nationale, if arranged in one closely serried file, would cover thirty-seven miles. The consolidation of the Astor and Lenox Libraries with the Tilden Trust Fund, which has just been consummated, will give to New York City a library that in a short time will equal in the number of its volumes the great French collection begun in the days of the amiable and brilliant Francis I.

In its liberal arrangements for the free use by the public the great New York library will likely surpass any one of the world-famous libraries in other countries. It is about decided that among its departments it will have no circulating library of its own; but, by some special arrangement, it will co-operate with the excellent New York Free Circulating Library. The location of this fine gift is not yet determined upon. It is admitted that it should be central, or, better still, have several sub-centres. The Lenox Library is delightfully situated on Fifth Avenue opposite the Central Park, and has one-half of the block of ground on which it stands not built upon. A better spot for the nucleus of the big library it would seem difficult to select. Should it find its home there, how changed would become the atmosphere of the fine halls, the lofty rooms, the spacious galleries of the present building! There would then be hundreds where now there are a dozen readers daily. And, happily, the well-bound volumes which vex the visitor with their air of unused elegance would become like the "ragged veterans" Charles Lamb so loved.

Was it not the gentle English satirist who declared that he did not care for a first folio of Shakspeare, but liked best those editions of his plays which had been oftenest tumbled about and handled? The collection at the Lenox of "first folios" of England's national poet is very fine. One may see it through a glass case darkly, but a nearer view is denied. If one wants a more substantial sight of Shakspeare's art, one can have it at Daly's Theatre in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," which is now being acted for the first time since half a century. The thin evening houses at this play must mean that the New York theatre public care very little for Mr. Daly's exquisite reproduction of this one of the earliest of the Shakspearean comedies. Barring the signs of some inartistic, mechanical devices which the author uses to bring about a happy finale, and which even Mr. Daly's skill cannot hide, the play, as acted, is a beautiful dramatic poem, enlivened by some delightful music sung in "the night's dead silence," under the chamber window of the faithful Sylvia. Miss Rehan makes her hearers love the tender and ardent Julia; and, although Mr. James Lewis, as the clownish Launce, cannot draw tears from his sour-hearted, cruel-hearted dog, Crab, his inimitable acting brings laughter-provoked tears to the eyes of those who watch it.

We have an official here whose manly, straightforward acts and wise public utterances are winning him the respect and commendation of all the better sort of citizens. It is so long since any such feelings have been deservedly prompted among us that there is something startling about the public giving their affection and respect to a Commissioner of Street Cleaning, Col. George E. Waring, Jr. The prompt removal of the city waste and filth is vital to the health and attractiveness of the city; and Mr. Waring does not permit any of the repulsive details of the problem to deter him from a personal, constant contact with it. In the matter of snow-cleaning the tenement-house districts are as much concern to him as the better quarters of the city, where the residents have the comfort of well-warmed houses and abundant clothing. He says that the general wretchedness of hundreds of thousands of human beings in the poorer parts of the city during the thaw can hardly be imagined. The population in these districts is four and a half times more dense than in the better quarters, and the homes are bare of comforts. To keep these districts as clean as Broadway is kept would be a tremendous task; but Col. Waring believes that, at an average cost of one dollar a person, he can next winter promptly remove the snow from every part of the city.

Col. Waring has surprised the heads of various labor organizations by writing some plain common sense in reply to their applications for certain favors and exclusive privileges in the way of higher wages and shorter hours for the men of their respective unions. Nothing is better calculated than these honest, businesslike letters to bring about an understanding between employer and employee, and correct the muddled political economy of the labor union men.

Felix Adler and Dr. Rainsford—whose authority to advise comes, as it should, from their own solid excellence—have recently spoken on "The Rights of Children." Prof. Adler made it the subject of his regular Sunday morning lecture; and Dr. Rainsford, a side-issue in his brilliant talk in Brooklyn on "The Condition of the Laboring Man." Both gentlemen condemned the military drill which one of the local posts of the Grand Army of the Republic has bent all its energies to introduce into both the public and private schools of the city. The movement is based on the argument that military drill promotes a spirit of patriotism among children. "It is more likely to heighten the false drama which attaches to the idea of war in children's minds," says Prof. Adler. "I do not believe in drills. They are the poorest kind of exercise. Moreover, I am a man of peace, and do not believe in whipping the world," says Dr. Rainsford. A bill in favor of introducing the military drill into the public schools of the city is awaiting its fate in our legislature.

Dr. Rainsford and Dr. Rylance, two of the ministers most active in work among the poor, have created a sensation by speaking in favor of the Sunday opening of the saloons at a great mass-meeting held last week in Cooper Union. Dr. Rainsford confessed that he was himself a total abstainer, and that he believed that all men were better and richer for not touching liquor. But he contended that in the present crowded condition of the tenements the working-people must be given an opportunity for the development of their social instincts. Dr. Rylance's argument was that the Sabbath was made for man; but he contended that any laws intended to preserve its sacredness which were not capable of being enforced only served to foster the practice of deception and crime, and had better, therefore, be repealed. These independent utterances have filled many of the clergy with fiery indignation, and several have announced their intention of handling Dr. Rainsford and Dr. Rylance, "without gloves" in their approaching Sunday sermons.

The event of supremest moment and tenderest interest to at least one of the ministers in our denomination is the marriage of Rev. Merle St. Croix Wright, pastor of the Lenox Avenue Church, to a parishioner, Miss Louise Wilson. Cards for their wedding on Wednesday, March 20, have been received by their many friends, who will be present at the ceremony in the pretty Harlem church.

On Tuesday, March 19, the Unitarian Club of New York will hold its regular meeting and dinner at the St. Denis Hotel. A paper will be read by Daniel Greenleaf Thompson, entitled "The Return to the Spiritual." It will be discussed by Dr. Edward Eggleston, Mr. Walter H. Page, editor of the Forum, and Prof. Francis H. Stoddard. This will be the first meeting under the new president, Hon. John A. Taylor.

Lent is receiving notice among us from Rev. Theodore C. Williams, who is giving a series of Tuesday afternoon Lenten lectures at the Parish House on Twentieth Street.

THE CASE OF PROF. WOODWORTH.

The San Francisco Examiner gives some additional particulars in regard to the expulsion of Prof. Woodworth of the University of California from the First Baptist Church of Berkeley for heresy:—

University people are solicitous about the reputation of the institution, and resent the action of the Baptist church in branding one of their leading professors as a heretic. They say that the expulsion of Prof. Woodworth and Student Maxwell from the church is due to the lack of culture and breadth of view on the part of Rev. Learned and his coworkers rather than to any heretical teaching on the part of the university professor.

Rev. Learned and Deacons A. F. Eldrich and W. F. Clark and their friends, on the other hand, resent Prof. Woodworth's open attack upon their declaration of faith as being presumptuous and impious; and to his dissemination of what they regard as dangerous and demoralizing heresies they attribute Student Maxwell's wandering after strange doctrines.

At the professor's trial there were some stormy scenes, for not all the members were against the scholarly Sunday-school superintendent. But Pastor Learned and his sympathizers declared that, while the University of California might permit heresy to be taught in its class-rooms, the Baptist church of Berkeley could no longer tolerate such a heresiarch as Prof. Woodworth. To justify their position, they took up the professor's printed statements, and compared them with the basic principles of theology in general and their declaration of faith in particular.

SCRIPTURAL ERRORS.

The first indictment against the university professor was his statement that "the absence of error is only true of the spirit, and not of the matter of the Bible."

The scientist explained that he believed that the spiritual teachings of the Bible are true and incomparably inspiring, but that the Scriptures contained errors of history and geology, and that many of its statements were in direct conflict with the unimpeachable testimony of the various sciences. He could not believe, therefore, in the plenary inspiration of every word and sentence in the Old and New Testaments.

To prove his heresy, his accusers quoted their declaration of faith, which avows that "the holy Bible was written by men divinely inspired, and is a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction. It has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture of error for its matter. It reveals the principles by which God will judge us, and therefore is and shall remain to the end of the world the true centre of Christian union and the supreme standard by which all human conduct, creeds, and opinions should be tried."

THE TRINITY.

The next count against Prof. Woodworth was his belief regarding the Trinity. What did he mean, they wanted to know, by saying that "the Trinity are only three of the many manifestations of God." Prof. Woodworth explained that Christ was born of two human parents. The science of entomology, the professor confessed, teaches that some insects, like the queen bee, are parthenogenetic; that is, their offspring have no other parent but the mother. But this was not true of the human race. As a scientist, therefore, he could not accept the miraculous birth of Jesus Christ. The divine spirit, he maintained, rises to greater height in some souls than in others. It rose to a pure and ineffably exalted state in the prophets of old and in poets and seers of every age, and reached its apogee in the Man of Galilee. But the university professor insisted that both reason and the facts of history prove that Christ Jesus was the son of Joseph, the carpenter. And, in so believing, the professor insisted that his thought was in keeping with that of advanced and rationalistic clergymen of the orthodox faith and with leaders in the Baptist denomination.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRIST.

But Rev. William Learned contended with some vigor that such a conception of Christ was all but blasphemous, and that the university professor's place in this world was among the Unitarians; and, as for the next,—he would refrain from dwelling on the future in store for the heretical entomologist.

But, worse than all, Prof. Woodworth had declared in his circular that "the death of Jesus, like the Jewish sacrifice, only saves symbolically." How could Prof. Woodworth possibly reconcile such apostate utterance with the plain declaration of Scripture that "the name of Christ is the only one given among men whereby we may be saved," and that the death of the Galilean was the one and only "expiation for the sins of the world"?

Prof. Woodworth said that it was the spirit of the Christ shed abroad in men's hearts that made them righteous and purified their motives, and that one who, in the divinity of his manhood, died for others was the symbol of sacrifice by which the souls of men might find their God and know "the peace that passeth understanding."

THE FALL OF MAN.

None of these disputes was more vexatious or productive of more inharmony in the church than the professor's avowal that "the fall of man was not from true holiness, but from childish innocence."

On this point the university professor explained his views at length. The statement involved the question of evolution; and on this the church is divided into two factions, one having imbibed the teachings of Joseph Le Conte, and the other adhering to the doctrine that man was not evolved from lower orders, but was a special creation, made sinless and perfect in the image of his Creator, and that man's fall from that high estate necessitated the coming of the Messiah. This latter view Prof. Woodworth eloquently sought to controvert. He contended that the facts of evolution are as well established as the laws of gravitation, that the spiritual element in man was first evolved from the chemical forces of nature, that it rose to a higher life in plants, that from plants it evolved into animal life, and thence through infinite time and through countless forms it finally reached consciousness and immortality in man. This view, he insisted, was a more religious one than the one founded on the legends of an unscientific age. Evolution was, he claimed, God's method of creation; and the recognition of this fact enlarged the mind to a grander conception of God and the cosmos.

THE PROFESSOR EXPELLED.

The verdict of the church was not arrived at without lively debates, but the final vote was against both Prof. Woodworth and the young student Maxwell; and both worshipped in other churches to-day in Berkeley.

Prof. Woodworth takes his expulsion good-naturedly and philosophically. "I consider that I am still a Baptist," he said to-day. "The published religious utterances of President Harper of the University of Chicago are not very much different from mine, and yet he is a member in good standing in the Baptist denomination. Of course, I shall abide by the decision of the First Baptist Church here in Berkeley. I could not do otherwise; for there is no presbytery, synod, or general assembly to appeal to, as in the Presbyterian denomination, each Baptist church being an independent organization, its polity determined by a majority of the members. I am sorry, however, that it remained for a Baptist church, in an academic and scholarly town like Berkeley, to expel members for believing in rationalistic Christianity."

"It was urged upon me, in opposition to my views on evolution, that President Jordan of the Stanford University has declared that evolution is only a method of reasoning, and need not be accepted by Christians. But, while I concur with President Jordan that evolution is a method of reasoning, I claim that, if it is a good method of reasoning for science, it is a good method of reasoning for Christianity."

THE PASTOR BEHIND THE TIMES.

"The whole trouble in the Berkeley Baptist church is that the pastor is not up to date. A year and a half ago Rev. William Learned came here. He is a good, devout man, but is unaware that the Baptist denomination has travelled beyond him, and, in his zeal, which is not according to knowledge, is alienating many of the educated members of the church. A number of the members believe as I do; but the pastor contends with them that, in so far as they accept the doctrines I have accepted, they are heretics, and cannot be saved."

Some of the members of the church arrayed against Prof. Woodworth say they will take the matter before the academic senate and the board of regents of the university; for, they say, a man unfit, because of his heresies, to teach a Sunday-school, is not a proper person to instruct the Freshmen and Sophomores and Juniors and Seniors at a university.

To this Prof. Woodworth says that, to eliminate his teachings at the University of California, they must eliminate science, and put in orthodox clergymen of the old school, who will teach, as truths, traditions and legends that are no more valuable, except symbolically, than the myths and legends of ancient Greece.

AN EPISCOPALIAN PROTEST.

The following letter appeared in the Boston Herald of March 14:—

As a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, pledged to faithful diligence in driving out therefrom conceits and pretences contrary to the truth, I protest against those doctrines following. I declare that they are false, and that they are doing harm in making religion seem to be an abstraction without practical meaning or power.

First.—I protest against the false teaching that God has somewhere set up a book, a body of men, or an institution to be an infallible oracle of truth.

The effect of such teaching is that men come to think of the truths of religion as unreal, far removed from human experience, and not by any means to be tried and proved. Else what need of infallible authorities?

I deny that there is any such authority. And, in particular, I deny the right of bishops, whether in committees or in ecclesiastical councils, to speak conclusively for God or to dictate terms of faith to other men.

Second.—I protest against the false teaching that there is a deposit of faith or body of essential Christian doctrines divinely formulated and sealed and given to the Church to interpret and to keep forever untouched.

The effect of that teaching is to vainly exalt the clergy, and to make religion seem to be a difficult science that only men of special training can understand. It puts theology in the place of faith and love, and disposes men to think that the creed is more than the life. It implies that a man can know the truth before he has endeavored to live truly, and so it begets intellectual pride and hypocrisy.

I deny that there is any such deposit. And, in particular, I deny that the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds are other than symbols of the catholic faith. That faith cannot be put into words: its fit expression is in deeds of courageous faithfulness and loving service.

Third.—I protest against the false teaching that the incarnation is to be regarded as a miracle and a prodigy,—an isolated event, unrelated to the course of nature and the ordinary providence of God. Such teaching effectually denies the incarnation, and thwarts its meaning.

The incarnation shows us God subjected to the most ordinary human conditions, that ordinary men may be drawn to godlikeness and the divine sonship.

Any teaching that weakens belief in the reality of our Lord's manhood is contrary to the catholic faith. I deny that the incarnation is to be regarded as a miraculous event, because I see its like everywhere in nature, in history, and in common life.

The lesson of nature is the humility and self-effacement of God-omnipotence by dint of tireless patience. The lesson of history is the putting-down of the proud and the uplifting of the lowly. And the lesson of daily living is the greatness of love and the futility of selfish ambition. So all things point to the incarnation, and prepare us to believe that God became man, that he was born in a stable, lived the life of a laborer, and died a slave's death.

In particular, I deny that the doctrine of the virginity of our Lord's mother is an essential of Christian faith. I do not certainly know whether it be a true doctrine. I accept it as one accepts many things, because it is strongly attested.

Fourth.—I protest against certain false teachings concerning ordination vows. The primary obligation of a public teacher is to tell the truth. The Church, holy and catholic, being the creation of the spirit of truth, cannot intend that its minister should devote himself to the letter of formularies or to anything but the spirit of truth. Nor can it intend to give its commission to one who is willing to exchange for a priest's office his moral liberty and the daily revelation of God.

I deny that I have taken any vow except to do and teach what God commands. And I declare that, if I had sworn to forever hold and teach a certain body of doctrines, I should have been guilty of a very great wrong,—a kind of suicide and sin against the Holy Ghost. Such vows, I think, are not only unmanly and immoral, but altogether infamous.

Fifth.—I protest against the false teaching that a man need give to religion only a part of his life, of his faculty and his money. And this I take to be the deadliest heresy that has at any time beset the Church.

I deny that faith without self-abandonment and risk-taking is good for anything. Complete self-abandonment is what Christ asks; and, though men waver and fail, they must not fix their hearts on a lower purpose.

REMEDIES FOR THE "BLUES."

A discussion as to the best remedy for "blues" has been going on in various journals; and the prescriptions are of all orders, depending very much, as would be imagined, on the mental status of the prescriber. A Boston maiden announces, "I sit down to the hardest mathematical problem I can find"; and another, the happy possessor of a share in the Athenæum, well known to be equivalent in Boston to a patent of nobility, writes, "I go into one of the alcoves in the reading-room, with the new magazines and a pile of local histories." "To go and see some one worse off than yourself," adds another, who is instantly answered by a practical sister: "Nothing of the sort. To add another misery to mine would be suicidal. I just think, It isn't illness, it isn't death. Nothing else matters." This is according to Mistress Dolly Madison, who said at eighty, "My dear, when you have reached my age, you will learn that nothing matters." These and sundry other mildly pessimistic replies came from those who had no enforced occupation, a tired little book-keeper adding her word: "I try to do some thing for somebody else. For, as I heard a Salvation Army sister say, 'If you make other people 'appy, you've a 'appiness in your 'art that don't come in no other way.'" "A ten-mile tramp," concludes an athletic young lady. "That settles the internal organs, and dyspepsia and blues go out together." From these formulas each reader can draw her own.—Watchman.

THE OLDEST TALES IN THE WORLD.

A volume of "Egyptian Tales," recently translated from the papyri, reveals the ancient Egyptians in a pleasing light. The Pharaohs were as fond of tales as the king in "The Arabian Nights." Magic plays a great part in them. Some of the earlier tales—the volume is a first series, from the fourth to the twelfth dynasty—remind us of stories in Exodus. Thus, "when King Khufu reigned over all the land," his son Khafra told him a tale "of the days of thy forefather Nebka, the blessed." Nebka went to the house of Uba-ner, the chief reciter. Uba-ner's wife was smitten with a handsome royal page, and acted like Potiphar's wife, but with greater success; for the page was not a Joseph. Uba-ner heard what was going on, and "fashioned a crocodile of wax, seven fingers long; and he enchanted it, and said, 'When the page comes and bathes in my lake, seize on him.'" The steward took the crocodile, threw it into the lake when the page was there, "and, behold, it became a great crocodile seven cubits in length, and it seized on the page," and "the page was stifled in the crocodile," which was taken out and became a crocodile of wax again, while the unfaithful wife was burned. The crocodile reminds us of Moses' rod that turned into a serpent. Another story, told by the "royal son," Bau-fra, to the same king, tells of a maiden who dropped her "jewel of new malachite" into the deep water. She could not be consoled, so "the chief reciter Zazamankh spoke his magic speech. And he placed one part of the waters of the lake upon the other, and discovered the jewel lying upon a shard; and he took it up, and gave it unto his mistress. And the water, which was twelve cubits deep in the middle, reached now to twenty-four cubits after he turned it. And he spoke and used his magic speech; and he brought again the water of the lake to its place." There is a curious resemblance between this story also and the dividing of the Red Sea, when the waters were piled like walls on either side.—Christian World.

Spiritual Life.

No man or woman of the humblest sort can really be strong, pure, and good without the world being the better for it, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of this goodness.—Phillips Brooks.

Love taketh up no malign elements: its spirit prompteth it to cover in mercy all things that ought not to be exposed, to believe all of good that can be believed, to hope all things that a good God makes possible, and to endure all things that the hope may be made good.—J. H. Thom.

The lessons of the moral sentiment are, once for all, an emancipation from that anxiety which takes the joy out of all life. It teaches a great peace. It is that which, being in all sound natures, and strongest in the best and most gifted men, we know to be implanted by the Creator of men.—R. W. Emerson.

Theoretically, we accept much which we forget to apply to the moment's need. We defraud ourselves thus of our birthright in truths which we are able to perceive in high moments, and which are meant for the low moments as well. Where should we take our lamp, if not into the cellars?—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

Nature's primer has an infinite alphabet, the first few letters of which we lisp in a lifetime. Each object is a syllable, cuneiform and obscure, to be interrogated, deciphered; but it stands for an immortal idea, something higher than itself, some everlasting reality dimly sculptured, a spark from the fires of the Eternal.—Mozoomdar.

God never was in any time more than in this time, nor nearer to any soul than he is to our own souls, nor more speaking and telling his commands and his being in any hearts than now in our own. This is the only authority. This is the one source of religious knowledge. This is the rock on which worship builds its shrines of everlastingness.—J. V. Blake.

The lesson which every strong life has taught the world is the power it has to give to circumstances, and not to borrow from them. The heroes of the world, the world of business as well as the world of scholarship or travel or war or reform, have told us with the unanimous testimony of their experience that there is no obstacle so great, no degradation so deep, no bodily infirmity so crippling, no lack of influence so discouraging, no disappointment so disastrous, that it may not only be overcome, but transformed into strength and the means of new success.—W. H. Lyon.

The old man was calmly enjoying the beauty of the morning, the freshness of the air, the warmth of the dancing beam, and not least, perhaps, his own peaceful thoughts,—the spontaneous children of a contemplative spirit and a quiet conscience. His was the age when we most sensitively enjoy the mere sense of existence, when the face of nature and a passive conviction of the benevolence of our great Father suffice to create a serene and ineffable happiness, which rarely visits us till we have done with the passions; till memories, if more alive than before, are yet mellowed in the hues of time, and faith softens into harmony all their asperities and harshness; till nothing within us remains to cast a shadow over the things without, and, on the verge of life, the angels are never so near us as of yore. There is an old age which has more youth of heart than youth itself.—Bulwer, Lord Lytton.

MINISTERIAL ETHICS.

The report of the Committee on Ministerial Ethics of the Ministers' Monday Club was made March 11. This report was made in the interests of closer and better relations among the ministers and between the ministers and the churches. Whatever lack of the spirit of brotherhood there may be among the ministers, it is earnestly desired it should give place to cordial, fraternal relations, inspired by a wholly unselfish spirit.

Whatever need there may be of better business relations between the ministers and the churches, it is believed that friendly conference and mutual trust will make good. It is our conviction that more faithful attendance upon the meetings of our ministerial associations would bring us all nearer together and advance the work we are engaged in; and, if this is the duty of one, it is equally the duty of all. The idea of service and helpfulness, so prominent in our public teachings, should not lack respect when it applies to our mutual relations as ministers.

As the minister happily and profitably engaged in his calling is alone rightly placed, we pledge our influence and efforts to all agencies and means to that end.

We pledge our support to the Committee on Ministerial Supply, and to the superintendents in all efforts they shall make to do away with the evils of protracted candidacy, and to bring the ministers and the churches together on a basis of perfect respect and confidence.

While we extend the utmost cordiality and fraternal regard to all ministers who come to us from other denominations from sincere conviction and a desire to do a broader and truer work in the world, we deprecate such changes simply from a desire for change or personal advantage, or to escape difficulties in their denomination or sphere of labor. We should be glad to see more conservative methods adopted by our parishes in the settlement of new and comparatively unknown ministers from other denominations.

We pledge our influence and support to the work of theological education carried on in the Meadville Theological School and the Harvard Divinity School, and to all means that shall bring the students of these schools into closer relations with us and the work of the ministry.

In regard to the relations of ministers to each other and to the parishes, two recommendations are herewith submitted:—

First, that, when settled ministers engage supplies, or when exchanges are made for personal advantage, the compensation for each Sunday should be not less than 1 per cent. of the amount of yearly salary paid by their own churches.

Second, that, whenever a settled minister has reason to believe there is grave discontent in his church, we advise his asking the mediation of some brother ministers to make a candid investigation, and endeavor to remove the difficulty, or, if it seems necessary, to advise a separation, harmoniously and as soon as practicable.

Further, that a council of ministers be invited by joint action of the minister and society to take cognizance of the resignation and separation in some fitting way.

The Sunday School.

A clerical visitor to the Needham, Mass., parish reports the Sunday-school there as in a fine state of prosperity. Dr. A. E. Miller is the superintendent, and both spirit and methods seem to be vigorously developed.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, March 23. Subject, Lesson XXVI., "Jesus and the Little Children." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

The current leaflet lessons on the "Life of Jesus" in the one-topic graded course are now out for April, the subjects being "Jesus entering Jerusalem," "Jesus and the Money-changers," "Jesus and the Roman Coin," and "The Widow's Mite." The Intermediate are prepared by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and the Advanced by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. They are printed together in one leaflet. Price, 50 cents per hundred.

The Western Unitarian Sunday School Society is preparing two or three manuals to be issued next autumn,—one, "Early Steps of Religious Growth," by Rev. A. W. Gould, covering the second year of the six years' course; also, "Studies in Nature," to be issued from week to week, and intended for children from five to ten years of age. Rev. W. C. Gannett will prepare the last year of the "Six Years' Course," beginning next September on "The Flowering Christianity."

There is a great need of interesting and valuable manual aids for the very young pupils in our Unitarian Sunday-schools. The Unitarian Sunday School Society would be very glad to receive manuscripts treating subjects in a way appropriate for this age. The Publication Committee of this society will very carefully consider any such contributions. The method of question and answer has greatly passed. Therefore, such text-books, if offered, should be put into modern form of suggestion and illustration.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

THE Ministerial Union will meet in Channing Hall Monday, March 25, at 10.30 A.M. Essay by Prof. Ephraim Emerson of Cambridge, upon "The Value of Historical Study for the Theologian." The public is invited.

REV. JOHN HAYNE ACTON, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

CHANNING CONFERENCE.—The fifty-ninth session will be held in the First Congregational Church, New Bedford, Mass., April 2 and 3. The following is the programme: Tuesday evening, April 2, eight o'clock, sermon by Rev. Minot J. Savage. Wednesday, April 3, 9 A.M., devotional meeting, conducted by Rev. Herbert Mott of Providence; 9.45 A.M., business meeting, annual election of officers, etc.; 10.45 A.M., essay by Rev. Thomas Van Ness of Boston,—subject, "The Dramatic Power in the Unitarian Gospel"; 1 P.M., collation; 2 P.M., essay by Rev. C. F. Dole of Jamaica Plain, Mass.,—subject, "The Problem of the Prosperous." Each paper will be followed by discussion, as time permits. At some time during the session Mrs. Robert H. Davis of New York, corresponding secretary of Women's National Alliance, will address the conference, on "The Work of Women in our Churches." It is also expected that Rev. George W. Cooke, a representative of the Unitarian Temperance Society, will briefly address the meeting.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. George D. Latimer will preach March 24. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Rev. M. J. Savage will conduct the half-hour noon service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, March 27, at twelve o'clock. All are cordially invited.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon at 3.15; evening at 8, when Rev. C. R. Eliot will speak upon "A Day in London with the Salvation Army." Winkley Guild at 7. Monday evening, debate at 7.45 upon the question "Ought the Right of Municipal Suffrage to be limited?"

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Popular Sunday evening service, March 24, at 7.30. Speaker, Rev. Stopford W. Brooke. Subject, "The Daily Sacrifice." Music by Mrs. Lester M. Bartlett, soprano; Mr. Lester M. Bartlett, tenor; Rossi Gish, violinist. Mr. Howard M. Dow, organist. All seats free.

GROTON, MASS.—The annual meeting of the First Parish Church, Groton, Mass., the two hundred and fortieth since its organization in 1655, was held last Monday, March 11. The same committees were re-elected; and all the activities of the church—Women's Alliance, Sunday-school, Post-office Mission, and the Guild of the Disciples, composed and conducted by the children of the Sunday-school—were reported to be in a healthful condition: all the irons were in the fire, and the bellows were always in motion. One of our oldest societies,—its face toward the east, nevertheless; and hope, not memory, is its bright, propitious star. At the meeting a very considerable addition was made to the pastor's salary; and Rev. Dr. Young starts on his twenty-first year of a happy ministry with this people with eye not dim, nor his natural force abated.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.—Rev. G. L. Chaney preached recently in the city hall. The Montgomery Journal says: "The sermon was a plea for the peace and unity of Christendom on the basis of the two great commandments, 'To love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and mind and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself.' In all the religions of the world God's messengers had been worshipped rather than God's message obeyed. We can love God, he said, by seeking to understand his laws and by obeying them, both physical and spiritual laws. These laws are universal and inevitable. When we are in accord with them, we have life: violations of them mean death. Mr. Chaney impressed upon his audience that every transgression bore in itself the punishment in the degradation of character. To do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before God was a summing-up of the Christian character. The discourse was one to be long remembered, eloquent in words, high in thought, elevating in morals, and full of hope."

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.—On March 11 Rev. R. A. Griffin resigned the pastorate of the Second Congregational Church of Northampton. At the parish meeting held that day it was unanimously voted not to accept the same.

SCITUATE, MASS.—There has been considerable activity in the side organizations of the Unitarian church here this winter. The Browning Club began its weekly meetings again on November 22, devoting its time, however, to a study of Shakspere's dramas. Essays have been prepared by different members, and many interesting discussions have taken place. Mrs. E. O. Cooke is president, Rev. Mr. Weed is secretary. A debating club, consisting of boys and young men, mostly students in the high school, was organized this winter, and has been conducted with unflagging interest. On Monday evening, March 11, they gave a successful entertainment, consisting of a public debate on the "Norwegian System of License," together with a bright little drama entitled "Shall our Mothers vote?"

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Rev. Rush R. Shippen writes: "At All Souls' Church last evening Rev. A. D. Mayo gave to a goodly congregation a very able and instructive discourse upon 'Educational Statesmanship, or George Peabody and Robert C. Winthrop, and Education in the South.' Eloquent tribute was paid to Hon. Mr. Winthrop and his later years' noble service in this direction, so strangely forgotten in obituary notices at the time of his recent death. The lecture was one of Mr. Mayo's best papers, and, but for straitened resources, would probably be published by the United States Bureau of Education. Mr. Mayo's own educational work in the South is held in high esteem by Commissioner W. T. Harris, and by his predecessor, Gen. Eaton. Sustained by the bounty of liberal Northern friends of education, as an able speaker of large experience in school matters, Mr. Mayo visits Southern schools and workers, asking no personal favors, but carrying the word of friendly helpfulness, and is very welcome wherever he goes. He has now gone to Kentucky. They who sustain him are doing good work, which I cordially commend to the aid and support of all generous Northern friends."

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, March 12. There were present Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Wells, and Messrs. Batchelor, Brown, Crothers, Dole, S. A. Eliot, Fenn, Fox, Hale, Hosmer, Howe, Lincoln, Lyman, Savage, Symonds, and Wells. The chair was first taken by Hon. George S. Hale, and afterward by Hon. Joseph W. Symonds, Portland, Me.

The treasurer reported expenses paid to March 12 $79,650.48; legacies received to date,—estate of Mrs. Isaac Sweetzer, $40,000; estate James Brackett, $5,000; estate Luther Blood, $15,878; estate Mrs. Susan Brackett, $9,766.67,—total, $70,644.67. The General Fund stands at about $75,000, with a temporary loan of $45,000.

The rules were suspended, and the following appropriations were made. In order to meet an emergency at St. John, N.B., $600 was put at the disposal of the secretary and the superintendent for New England, with discretion to use the money so as to ward off danger of a failure to meet the obligations of the church. $50 received from the First Parish, Portland, Me., was voted, according to instructions, to Rev. L. D. Cochrane. On application, $500 was appropriated to the secretary of the Conference of the Middle States and Canada, to be used for the church in Albany, N.Y.

By recommendation of the Foreign Missions Committee $500 was appropriated for the Unitarian church in Budapest, Hungary; also, $375, balance of the salary for the year of Prof. Droppers of the Unitarian Mission in Japan.

The seventieth anniversary of the British and Foreign and the American Unitarian Associations coming this year, Rev. William H. Lyon of Boston and Rev. Samuel J. Barrows, editor of the Christian Register, were appointed delegates to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as messengers of our good will.

In answer to communications from All Souls' Church, Chicago, Ill., through Rev. J. L. Jones, minister, it was "Voted, That the directors of the American Unitarian Association will receive the sums of money contributed for the building of All Souls' Church in Chicago, Ill., and now held in trust for the benefit of the American Unitarian Association, returning to All Souls' Church such contributions as shall be stipulated by the written request of the donors."

It being the day for Western appropriations, Rev. T. B. Forbush was present, and explained the recommendations made by the Western Committee; and the following appropriations were made: $500 to Rev. Jasper L. Douthit; $1,000 to the First Unitarian Society, Iowa City, Ia.; $700 to the First Unitarian Society, Lawrence, Kan.; $750 to the First Unitarian Society, Madison, Wis.; $800 to Rev. M. J. Skaptason for work in the Icelandic Mission; $400 to the First Unitarian Society, Topeka, Kan.; $400 to Rev. Walter S. Vail for missionary work in Southern Kansas; $60 to Unitarian church, Sturgis, Mich.; $400 to Unitarian society, Carthage, Mo., to be expended under the direction of Rev. T. B. Forbush; $100 to Unity Church, Richland Centre, Wis.; $75 to Rev. J. L. Andrew for missionary work in Southern Dakota; $200 to Rev. Walter A. Taylor, Jackson, Mich.; $200 to the First Liberal Church of Great Falls, Mont.; $400 to Rev. Thomas G. Owen for missionary work in Wisconsin; and $250 to Rev. T. B. Forbush for office expenses.

An application for Richmond, Va., was referred to the Southern Committee.

The special committee to consider the condition and reorganization of the Unitarian Association reported for the committee appointed by the Association, consisting of Messrs. Hale, Savage, Long, Ames, Mrs. K. G. Wells, T. L. Eliot, Shorey, and Cutting, through Rev. Minot J. Savage, chairman, as follows:—

"The committee appointed by the directors beg leave to suggest the passage by the directors of the following vote:—

"Voted, That the Board respectfully recommends to the Nominating Committee and the Association: (1) the choice of Rev. George Batchelor of Lowell, Mass., as secretary, at a salary of $— per annum; (2) of George W. Stone of Wilmington, Del., as treasurer, at a salary of $— per annum, he to perform such services as the Board shall direct in regard to obtaining contributions for the work of the Association, and as its general financial agent; (3) of George W. Fox as assistant secretary, at a salary of $— per annum, he to render such clerical and other services as the Board shall specify."

The plan of readjustment of appropriations was referred to the Executive Committee. After a consideration of the subject of legacies, it was voted to refer the question to the Finance Committee, to report at the next meeting, showing what amount had been spent for the last five years, as well as the amounts received from interest, churches, and legacies.

Business Notices.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" will quickly relieve Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, and Throat Diseases. Sold only in boxes.

It is well-nigh impossible to satisfactorily heat the average dwelling-house unless it is equipped with open fireplaces. Hundreds of colds are the result of every drop in the thermometer, and the great majority of these illnesses might be avoided by the use of open fires. That open fireplaces are being more extensively used is shown by the enormous industry in wood mantels which is now being done at the Paine warerooms on Canal Street. This firm does probably the largest wood mantel business in the United States. Their prices are lower than other furniture houses on this specialty.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Tyngsboro, 18th inst., by Rev. William Brown, William P. Wright and Rose D. Senny, both of Dunstable.

Deaths.

In Dighton, 6th inst., Bathsheba, daughter of the late Rev. Abraham and Bathsheba Gushue, in the 73d year of her age.

In Brooklyn, N.Y., 14th inst., James Hosmer Kidder, son of the late James and Susan Dexter (Blanchard) Kidder, formerly of Watertown and later of Boston, 66 yrs., 6 mos.

In North Somers, Conn., 4th inst., William Harlow. Mr. Harlow was a native of Portland, Me., where he carried on business as a watchmaker and jeweller for many years. He was an earnest believer in and upholder of our liberal faith, and a parishioner of Dr. Nichols and Horatio Stebbins, associate pastors of the First Parish Church of Portland. Later he removed to Syracuse, N.Y., and was there prominently identified with the Unitarian church under the ministry of Samuel J. May and, following him, of Rev. S. R. Calthrop. Impaired health a few years since led to Mr. Harlow's removal from Syracuse, which severed a church connection of over twenty years in that city. Latterly he has resided in North Somers, Conn., where on the 4th inst. he entered within the gates which limit all mortal vision. He was a man of strict integrity, abhorring all that trickery and dishonesty which too often pass current under the specious name of business. Our friend was tried, as few of us are by a "thorn in the flesh" in the form of a chronic affection, which, though it permitted his passing the psalmist's boundary of years, yet sorely marred his physical ease. Those who knew him best will remember him as a man of inflexible honesty, loyal heart, and kindly nature. He rests well after the burden and heat of the day.

HARRIET UDELL.

In Grand Rapids, Mich., January 30, Harriet Udell, wife of Corwin S. Udell.

"And though we walk divided pathways now,
And I no more may see thee to the end,
I weave this little chaplet for thy brow,
That other hearts may know, and hail thee friend."

Faithful wife loving mother, kind and tender friend! Harriet Udell's was a personality one rarely meets in life,—hers was a face fair enough, but more noble than fair; hers was a voice sweet enough, yet more clear and earnest than sweet; hers was a nature beautiful enough, yet more loving and lovable than beautiful.

Human nature is to be measured only by its exceptional men and women,—those who, conscious of their divine birthright, seek ever to be true to the God within, thereby becoming in themselves object lessons, teaching humanity that, under the rule of love, goodness, and righteousness, all human nature will become godlike. This was Harriet Udell in life.

"The sweet presence of a good diffused,
And in diffusion ever more intense,"
Thus did she join "the choir invisible, Whose music is the gladness of the world."

OUR WORSHIP.

BY EDWARD W. STONE.

Ne'er climbeth from our altar-fires
The smoke of sacrifice,
But earth-born hopes and vain desires
Therewith toward heaven rise;
And never from the censor
The perfumed clouds ascend,
But with them, dark and denser,
The dust of earth must blend.

Our sweetest songs of praise are marred
By life's discordant din,
And in our loftiest hymns is heard
The undertone of sin.
Our purest tributes paying,
We come with mixed intent;
And even in our praying
Our eyes are earthward bent.

May He whose all-discerning sense
Is merciful, though just,
Accept our human reverence,
Remembering we are dust;
And, bending in compassion
From his eternal throne,
Our words and works refashion,
And make the good his own.

THE LAW OF COMPENSATION.

BY REV. MARION D. SHUTTER.

"With what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you."—MATT. vii. 2.

There is no prophet of modern days to whom I feel under greater personal indebtedness than to Emerson. A few years ago I went from Boston to Concord in the middle of winter, climbed through deep snows up the hillside in the cemetery, until I stood before the rough boulder that covers all that could die of him who gave new life to so many. Before that granite shrine I remembered how, in days of darkness and perplexity, when my thought seemed chaos, he gave me clearness of vision. The deepest studies in our literature are his essays on "Self-reliance," "Spiritual Laws," and "Compensation." What revelations are there, what insight into human resources, what knowledge of the universe, and of those processes with which we must put ourselves in harmony!

I was thinking the other day of his essay on "Compensation"; and, taking down the volume, I read: "The same dualism underlies the nature and condition of man. Every excess causes a defect, every defect an excess. Every sweet hath its sour, every evil its good. Every faculty which is a receiver of pleasure has an equal penalty put on its abuse. It is to answer for its moderation with its life. For every grain of wit there is a grain of folly. For everything you have missed, you have gained something else; and for everything you gain, you lose something."

I wondered whether I could not compress the essence of that passage into the words of the text, "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you." We receive as we give. We gain as we lose. The measure of suffering is the measure of recompense. The measure of trial is the measure of strength; the measure of humiliation, the measure of exaltation. This is a side of the law that is often not so clear to us,—the compensations of pain, disaster, defeat. To most of us, however, it is the most important side of the law. It is the side with whose operations we are brought in most constant contact.

"Nothing great is lightly won,
Nothing won is lost.
Every good deed nobly done
Will repay the cost."

It is true to-day our best wisdom is that which costs. Our growth is promoted by sharp griefs that dig up our hearts. The lessons by which we profit are so often written in blood and fire. Better that way than that we should not learn. But there is no loss without its corresponding gain, no anguish without its recompense. The universe is nicely balanced. The law of compensation holds in every realm. The physical and moral come alike within its scope,—all things, from the wrath of a tornado to the sufferings of Jesus. When the violence of nature levels cities, it brings out in helpfulness that deep humanity which is before all creeds and shall be after them. When Jesus is lifted upon the cross, he draws all men to his character and teachings. The compensation for lacerating nails and piercing spear is the dominion of the ages. We cannot always trace the operations of this law, but we infer the things that are not seen from those that do appear. We have proved the principle in so many cases that we trust it when it works in darkness.

Let us consider some of its applications this morning.

I. It is often a source of trouble to men that the past never satisfies. Every legend of Eden closes with its destruction. The Edens of the individual's past lie broken and blighted.

1. It is not long that we take delight in anything we have done. Let us thank God for that.

A gentleman said to me, "One's sharpest competition is always with his past." Let a man do something worthy of himself, and it soon becomes a goad instead of a pleasure. He who does one thing well is under bonds to do something better. He has given a proof of his power; but, as he stands contemplating his work, his own soul cries out: "I can beat that! Give me another chance!" Our inspiration comes not from the attained, but from the unattained. The laurels of this morning are withered at evening, while far beyond us the trumpet is sounding. The kingdom of God has never fully come: it is always coming. It has been transferred from the past to the future. The golden age no longer basks in primeval sunshine: it lies under the dawn of to-morrow. While Eden is in ruins, the New Jerusalem is before us. The vision of John rises like a new sun over the legend of Moses. The vision of the possible and attainable in human life rises with greater glory over all that has been accomplished. To-morrow will bring us a grander arena and nobler deeds: the deeds of yesterday are already poor and shrunken. The best they can do for us is to make appeal that we shall overtop them with nobler achievements. Let a man lie down to rest upon what he has done, and, lo! the rose-leaves are fallen away, and he springs up from a bed of thorns!

2. The thirst for knowledge, the desire for improvement, is born in the human soul. A healthy dissatisfaction is the key to all progress, intellectual, moral, and social.

To remain stationary is to die. I am sometimes asked to preach the gospel of content to others. I will just as soon as I feel contented with myself and with anything I have done. The trouble in the storied garden was not caused by the spirit of disobedience, but by the thirst for knowledge. Man no sooner rises from the animal to man than he finds a spirit of unrest in his bosom,—the divine prophet of advancement, the divine protest against stagnation. The spirit of progress, early kindling in the breast of man, rebelled against the prohibition, "Touch not yonder tree!" What was the motive that prompted to partake? "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," was the inducement. No tree ripening with such fruit would have been safe under any edict. "Thou shalt not" was a mere cobweb when man found there was something more to learn, some new height to be gained. We can conceive of him as saying, "Let me learn more of God, of his universe, of myself, of this mysterious world and life, at any cost." Man gained his knowledge; but he paid and is paying the price,—expulsion from the gardens of ease. Let him pay it ever without a murmur. What he gains is worth what it costs. There are exalted moments of life—not many of them, perhaps—that bring us guerdon for the sorrow and heartache and disappointment of years. One mount of transfiguration makes ample amends for a thousand Calvaries.

3. The mandate that doomed man to a life of labor was no "curse." It is his greatest blessing that he must eat his bread in the sweat of his brow, and learn his lessons in the agony of his spirit.

Only let him see to it that he eat it honestly in the sweat of his own brow, and not in the sweat of somebody's else brow. I wave my hand to the angel whose flaming sword forbade return to a life of infancy and ease and ignorance. Knowledge, with all its perils and pains, rather than ignorance, with its unthinking repose. Innocence is not virtue. Innocence is fair and beautiful, but it only becomes virtue after it has looked evil squarely in the face and not been put to shame,—after it has wrestled with evil and conquered. Behind virtue are tempters and battles. It comes of many conflicts. It comes of knowledge that sometimes appalls, that reveals new forces of evil, but also new sources of strength. Evermore is character born in the fire. In the story of the three Hebrews cast into the sevenfold heated furnace,—it was there they found the image of the Son of Man.

II. What shall be said of our failures and mistakes? Is there no wisdom in the grief and humiliation they have brought us?

Sings Browning,—

"A paradox
Which comforts while it mocks,—
Shall life succeed in that it seems to fail:
What I aspired to be
And was not comforts me:
A brute I might have been, but would not sink i' the scale."

1. Our aim was high. Is that nothing? Is there no consolation in the thought that we tried to do something worthy? The effort was not fruitless, though outwardly it came to naught. No man can think a noble thought or essay a noble deed without becoming thereby ennobled. "Think of Buddha, and you will become like Buddha," say his priests. Think the right, attempt the right, and you will become right. Some of the ripest and sweetest characters are those whose outward lives accomplish little. They would not stoop to dishonor: they were doomed to neglect.

"A brute I might have been, but would not sink i' the scale."

Let them rejoice in their aspirations. It is better to send from the heart a dove, though she return with no olive-branch, than to make that heart a roosting-place for unclean birds. Better attempt something right and fail than something base and achieve it. Better die at the stake for truth than push a lie to victory. Disappointment teaches us that there is something better to live for than what men call success, that principles are worth more than prosperity, that it profits more to preserve the highest and best life of the spirit than to be able to hang the world as a trophy to one's girdle.

Story's "Hymn for the Conquered" closes with these noble words:—

"Hold the hand that is helpless and whisper,
'They only the victory win
Who have fought the good fight and have vanquished
The demon that tempts us within;
Who have held to their faith unswayed
By the prize that the world holds on high;
Who have dared for a high cause to suffer,
Resist, fight,—if need be, to die.'

"Speak, History! Who are life's victors?
Unroll thy long annals, and say.
Are they those whom the world called the victors,

Who won the success of a day?
The martyrs or Nero? The Spartans who fell
At Thermopylæ's tryst
Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges
Or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?"

2. But these lives of failure and disappointment have a larger meaning, a wider relationship than we know.

We are so bound in the bundle of life together that the influence of every high thought and glorious purpose exalts the entire race forever. Drops of water from the tiniest rivulet that pays tribute to the ocean glitter in the mightiest billow that rolls. The coral insect that wrought but for a day has helped to push the coral island above the sea. The honest heart-throb of the lowliest peasant quickens the pulses of every potentate. The brave word spoken in obscurity makes music through all nations. The courage of the lowliest in resisting wrong makes braver the entire race, makes justice more certain for all ages.

"No stream from its source
Flows seaward, how lonely soever its course,
But what some land is gladdened. No star ever rose
And set without influence somewhere. Who knows
What earth needs from earth's lowest creature?
No life
Can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife,
And all life not be purer and stronger thereby.
The spirits of just men made perfect on high,
The army of martyrs who stand by the throne,
Know this surely at last. Honest love, honest sorrow,
Honest work for the day, honest hope for the morrow,—
Are these worth nothing more than the hand they make weary,
The heart they have saddened, the life they leave dreary?

Hark! the sevenfold heavens to the voice of the spirit
Echo, 'He that o'ercometh shall all things inherit.'"

"What good," asked some one, "did Helvidius Priscus do in resisting Vespasian, being but a single person?" "What good," answers Epictetus, "does the purple do on the garment? Why, it is splendid in itself, and splendid also in the example it affords."

3. Failure may also teach us our real adaptations.

We knock at gates that never open, and stumble along the road until we find the garlanded archway and the path beyond it fringed with flowers. We hear a voice saying: "This is the way. Walk ye in it." Poor Goldsmith failed at law and medicine, but not as an essayist and poet. Hegel failed in theology, and was regarded as only a mediocre in college; but his failures in one department pointed out the true direction of his faculties, and he stands eminent in philosophy. Webster failed as a farm hand, but not as expounder of the Constitution. So, too, men have failed in the professions, and found their true work in the shop or at the plough. Thus do our failures become guide-posts along the highways of life. When we find what we cannot do, that we cannot be lord of the ten cities or five, we bethink us of the neglected talent that has all the while been lying wrapped in the napkin, waiting to be used.

III. What of the wrongs, the insults, the injuries, we have received? Is there any compensation? In the griefs they cause us is there any wisdom? Is there any knowledge in the sorrows?

These are all among the lessons of life. They are factors in our education. Our deepest wrongs may make us grow. They may reveal to us parts of our nature whose existence we did not suspect. They may search out the secret places that even love did not find, and lay them open to love. The bush wrenched from the mountain-side revealed to Pizarro the silver treasures of Peru. Rude hands may uncover hidden riches in our hearts,—may show us resources of power, of love, of sympathy, of patience, of genius we knew not. The word that stabs you like a poniard cuts a new channel for the Holy Ghost. The insult that was intended to sprinkle ashes on your head makes you rise from the dust and fling away your sackcloth forever. The menace that was intended to bully you into imbecility makes you a man. The criticism of your bitterest foe may teach you lessons that your bosom friend would never impart. Even he who cheats you out of your dues gives you a chance to deserve something better. Those who wrong us educate us. Our enemies teach us the secret of battle. "Memorable also," exclaims Carlyle, "be that nimble barber (at the siege of Lille) who, when the bomb burst beside him, snatched up a shred of it, introduced soap and lather into it, crying, 'Behold my new shaving-dish,' and shaved fourteen people on the spot!"

Every fragment of the shells exploded in our camps by the enemy shall become our implements of power, our weapons of conquest. The button worn by members of the Grand Army is made of captured cannon. Out of the guns that were aimed against them they have made badges of victory!

"O my friends," cries our great American prophet, "there are resources in us on which we have not drawn. There are men who rise refreshed on hearing a threat,—men to whom a crisis which intimidates and paralyzes the majority, demanding not the faculties of prudence and thrift, but comprehension, immovableness, and readiness of sacrifice, come graceful and beloved as a bride. Napoleon said of Massena that he was not himself until the battle began to go against him. Then, when the dead began to fall in ranks around him, awoke his powers of combination; and he put on terror and victory as a robe. So it is in rugged crises, in unweariable endurance, and in aims which put sympathy out of the question, that the angel is shown." When Mark Tapley was comfortably situated, he thought it no credit to be jolly; but, when he and Martin came to the fever-stricken district of New Eden, his mirth found the first opportunity to unfold her wings.

IV. There is nothing hateful or unsightly in the world from which we may not learn something.

1. To him whose mind is bent on improvement, who means to advance, who wishes to make the best of himself, everything in human life has a significance.

Every day we see things that shock and pain us, but they have their lessons. The disagreeable things of life may be ministering angels, though they wear soiled garments and are surrounded by unwholesome odors. It is written in the Persian of Saadi that they asked Lokman the fabulist, "From whom did you learn manners?" He answered, "From the unmannerly."

2. The results of a tendency, seen in their maturity, have kept many a man back from the same course, and led him to check similar tendencies in himself.

The best lesson against profanity is a profane swearer. The best preventive of drunkenness is a drunkard. The strongest dissuasive from vice is one who exhibits its finished work. I know a young man whose studies in the medical college—studies that led him to trace in actual examples the connection between disease and immorality—did more to create and establish good resolves than years of preaching would have done. But our instances need not all be so extreme. Take any unpleasant trait, such as ill-temper, fault-finding, peevishness, boisterousness, incivility. Look at such trait in any person whom it has come to master; and, if the beginnings are already in us, we will make all haste to crush them out,—“I will do anything rather than become like that!” What a revelation it would be to us if we could only see how closely we sometimes resemble the people we despise or ridicule!

3. You will not misunderstand me, therefore, when I say that a great sin has frequently been the salvation of a soul.

I know the statement is open to objection; but, nevertheless, I make it. Perhaps there is no way to learn but by the sad experience so many of us know. Life is a costly education. It takes many sins to bring us to repentance: it takes many sorrows to teach us a little wisdom. Repentance, watchfulness, compassion for others, deep humility,—these are some of the compensations of sin. A monstrous iniquity has opened our eyes to the abyss. One drunken fit has saved many a man from a drunkard's grave. It has so horrified the soul that the habit was broken before its grasp had hardened into adamant. Other sins have opened men's eyes to the possibilities of evil in their hearts, and have made them humble and watchful forever. Goethe used to say that he never heard of a sin or crime that he did not believe himself capable of committing. He who thought that he was standing learned to take heed lest he fall. Thus, after all, the black record concentrates itself into a point of light. Peter's denial of his Master made him the most courageous apostle of his Master's gospel. In the grief of sin there is wisdom: in the sorrows of sin there is knowledge. It is a fearful price to pay, but most of us will only learn at such terrific cost. George Eliot says: "There is no short cut, no patent tramroad to wisdom.

After all the centuries of invention, the soul's path lies through the thorny wilderness which must still be trodden in solitude, with bleeding feet, with sobs for help, as it was trodden by them of old time."

V. Of the actual calamities of life I can say but little. The grief they bring brings wisdom with it. The sorrows they multiply increase our knowledge.

When the props upon which we have rested are knocked away, we find ourselves. Disaster and loss snatch our crutches, that we may use our feet. Whatever teaches the lesson of self-reliance is worth the utmost farthing it costs. Man was made to depend upon himself; but he never will do it so long as, by any device, he can shift his responsibilities. So long as he thinks any other man or God will do his work, he will find excuses for not doing it himself. He will be weak and flabby and inefficient just so long as he can. His very sins he will lay at the doors of others. He will assume responsibility for nothing. It needs very often the shattering of everything in which he trusted to strengthen his knees and stiffen his back. Trust yourselves. Think, act, assume, dare. What if you have lost your property, been betrayed by your friends, deserted by your supporters, maligned by your foes? The entire universe is leagued on the side of him who has courage to attempt for himself. The gods themselves are partisans of the brave. Make a bold step, and the world bristles with defensive armies. Says Novalis: "There is, properly speaking, no misfortune in the world. Happiness and misfortune stand in continual balance. Every misfortune is, as it were, the obstruction of a stream, which, after overcoming this obstruction, but bursts through with the greater force."

What is to be the outcome of it all? What is to be the final result of these tremendous processes? We are building, with immense toil and pain, our characters. To what end? For what purpose? That the hand of death may finally smite and shatter them, that they shall be utterly wasted and destroyed? I cannot believe it. What is good, it seems to me, must last. If there is anything in us that is worth carrying over the dark stream into which we shall all some day sink, it must be carried over. It was this conviction that made Hume say, "Whenever I think of my mother, I believe in immortality." It was this conviction that made the mourners around the bier of Phillips Brooks refuse to believe that the whole story was told:—

"We have had no such sermon on immortality and the glorified state of the just for many a year as this funeral was. 'Oh, if I could have died at that very moment,' said a girl, very sadly, 'I am sure he would have taken me with him.' 'I'm not a Christian,' said a laboring man, 'and I don't know as I've ever believed in a hereafter; but I know that man is alive somewhere.' 'I don't believe in many men,' said a harlot, 'but I believed in Phillips Brooks. Such men ought never to die.' And then, after a pause, she slowly, deeply exclaimed, 'And I don't believe they do.' Thus he preached more solemnly in his death than in his life of the blessed life beyond, and of the glorious life here that is the prophecy of it."

The event will justify the process. "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

THE ARMENIAN ORISIS IN TURKEY.

The following extracts are from a book just published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. The first part of the volume is made up of letters received from American citizens resident in Turkey. The following persons, having read these letters, certify to their authenticity: Frederic T. Greenhalge, governor of Massachusetts; Frances E. Willard, president National Woman's Christian Temperance Union; William Lloyd Garrison; Samuel J. Barrows, editor Christian Register; George C. Lorimer, pastor Tremont Temple, Boston; William E. Barton, pastor Shawmut Church, Boston; H. M. Jewett, ex-United States consul, Sivas, Turkey; * Mary A. Livermore, author and lecturer; Alpheus H. Hardy; Francis E. Clark, president United Society

* Brother and predecessor of the present Consul Jewett at Sivas.

Christian Endeavor; Edward Everett Hale, pastor New South Congregational Church, Boston; Julia Ward Howe, author and lecturer; Francis A. Walker, president Massachusetts School Technology; A. E. Pillsbury, ex-Attorney-General of Massachusetts; Isabel Somerset; Cyrus Hamlin, founder of Robert College; I. J. Lansing, pastor Park Street Church, Boston; Joseph Cook, author and lecturer; William E. Russell, ex-governor of Massachusetts; Jonathan A. Lane, president Boston Merchants' Association.

Rev. Frederick Davis Greene, the author and compiler of this book which bears the title at the head of this article, says:—

These letters are written by men who can have no possible motive for misrepresenting the facts in the case, while, on the other hand, each writer subjected himself to personal danger by putting such statements upon paper and sending them through the mails. Several of the documents have got through Turkey by circuitous routes, in some instances having been sent by special messenger to Persia, and so on to this country. Others were never risked in the Turkish mails, but have come through the British post-office at Constantinople.

It must be borne in mind that no writer was an eye-witness of the actual massacre; nor could he have been, inasmuch as the whole region was surrounded by a military cordon during the massacre and for months after. The letters are largely based on the testimony of refugees from that region, or of Kurds and soldiers who participated in the butchery, and who had no hesitation in speaking about the affair in public or private until long after, when the prospect of a European investigation sealed their lips. Much of the evidence is, therefore, essentially first-hand, having been obtained from eye-witnesses by parties in the vicinity at the time, who are impartial, thoroughly experienced in sifting Oriental testimony, familiar with the Turkish and Armenian languages, and of the highest veracity. No one letter would have much force if taken alone, for it might be a large report of a small matter; but these sixteen letters are written independently of one another, at different times, and from seven different cities widely apart, five of them forming a circle around the scene of destruction. The evidence is cumulative and overwhelming.

There is absolute unanimity to this extent, that a gigantic and indescribably horrible massacre of Armenian men, women, and children did actually take place in the Sassoun and neighboring regions about Sept. 1, 1894, and that, too, at the hands of Kurdish troops armed by the sultan of Turkey, as well as of regular soldiers sent under orders from the same source. What those orders were will probably never transpire. That they were executed under the personal direction of high Turkish military officers is clear. There can also be no doubt—for the official notice from the palace was printed in the Constantinople papers in November last—that Zekki Pasha, commander of the Fourth Army Corps, who led the regular troops in the work of extermination, has since been specially honored by a decoration from the sultan, who was also pleased to send silk banners to the four leading Kurdish chiefs by a special messenger.

FROM LETTER NO. V.

A Christian does not enjoy the respect accorded to street dogs. If this massacre passes without notice, it will simply become the declaration of the doom of the Christians. There will be no security for the life, property, or honor of a Christian. A week ago last Tuesday evening at sundown a Turk kidnapped the wife of a wealthy Armenian merchant of the town of Khanoos Pert. Next morning her cries were overheard by searchers, and she was rescued from a Turkish house. No redress is possible.

Wild rumors have been abroad for a long time, but trustworthy information came to hand slowly. Everything has been done to hush it all up. Some of the minor details of the stories I have told above may not be exact, but I feel quite certain they are in the main. However, that a cruelly barbarous and extensive massacre of Christians by regular soldiers assisted by Kourdish Hamedieh's, under command of officers of rank and responsibility, has occurred cannot be denied.

What now will the Christian world do?

FROM NO. VI.

No distinctions were made between persons or villages, as to whether they were loyal and had paid their taxes or not. The orders were to make a clean sweep. A priest and some leading men from one village went out to meet an officer, taking in their hands their tax receipts, declaring their loyalty, and begging for mercy; but the village was surrounded, and all human beings put to the bayonet. A large and strong man, the chief of one village, was captured by the Kurds, who tied him, threw him on the ground, and, squatting around him, stabbed him to pieces.

At Galagozan many young men were tied hand and foot, laid in a row, covered with brushwood, and burned alive. Others were seized and hacked to death piecemeal. At another village a priest and several leading men were captured, and promised release if they would tell where others had fled; but, after telling, all but the priest were killed. A chain was put around the priest's neck and pulled from opposite sides till he was several times choked and revived, after which several bayonets were planted upright, and he raised in the air and let fall upon them.

The men of one village, when fleeing, took the women and children, some five hundred in number, and placed them in a sort of grotto in a ravine. After several days the soldiers found them, and butchered those who had not died of hunger.

Sixty young women and girls were selected from one village and placed in a church, when the soldiers were ordered to do with them as they liked, after which they were butchered.

In another village fifty choice women were set aside and urged to change their faith and become hanums in Turkish harems; but they indignantly refused to deny Christ, preferring the fate of their fathers and husbands. People were crowded into houses, which were then set on fire. In one instance a little boy ran out of the flames, but was caught on a bayonet and thrown back.

Children were frequently held up by the hair and cut in two, or had their jaws torn apart. Women with child were ripped open, older children were pulled apart by their legs. A handsome, newly wedded couple fled to a hilltop. Soldiers followed, and told them they were pretty and would be spared if they would accept Islam; but the thought of the horrible death they knew would follow did not prevent them from confessing Christ.

FROM NO. VIII.

The region was surrounded by soldiers of the army, and twenty thousand Kurds also are said to have been massed there. Then they advanced upon the centre, driving in the people like a flock of sheep, and continued thus to advance for days. No quarter was given, no mercy shown. Men, women, and children shot down or butchered like sheep. Probably, when they were set upon in this way, some tried to save their lives, and resisted in self-defence. Many who could fled in all directions, but the majority were slain. The most probable estimate is fifteen thousand killed; thirty-five villages plundered, razed, burnt. . . . Every effort is being made and will be made to falsify the facts and pull the wool over the eyes of European governments. But the bloody tale will finally be known,—the most horrible, it seems to me, that the nineteenth century has known. As a confirmation of the report, the other day several hundred soldiers were returning from the seat of war, and at a village near us one was heard to say that he alone with his own hand had killed thirty pregnant women. Some who seem to have some shame for their atrocious deeds say: "What could we do? We were under orders."

FROM NO. X.

The unspeakable horror of those three weeks must have sent many a one crazy. The story is told that one soldier found a comely infant, and took compassion on it and wished to save it. The mother was found in a crowd of poor, wretched women; but she was raving, calling for her children. She did not recognize the child, and nothing was left to the soldier but to despatch it.

FROM NO. XII.

This policy of continued massacre and outrage is favored by the profound ignorance which prevails everywhere as to the actual state of things in Turkey. People think that the Sassoun massacre is something exceptional, and that until that is proved there is no evidence of a need of European interference in behalf of Christians in Turkey. What ought to be done is to fix on the mind of the public the fact that Turkey has taken up the policy of crushing the Christians all over the empire, and has been at it for several years. So that, even if the massacre had not taken place, the duty of Europe to prohibit Turkey from acting the part of antichrist was still self-evident.

FROM NO. XIV.

The people are in a state of horror because of the massacre. The Commission has been expected for some time; and, without doubt, the local authorities have used every means to cover up their tracks and terrorize still further those who may be probable witnesses. Those who are encouraged to testify will be again at the mercy of the Turks after the Commission rises. I have not the slightest doubt that some will be courageous enough to testify, but it will be at great odds. Almost everything is against the perfect success of the Commission's work, or, rather, the favorable outcome of the work of the European delegates. It will not be right to stake the fate of Armenia on the outcome of the work of this Commission.

Rather it should be remembered that Sassoun is the outcome of a governmental system. There have been hundreds of Sassouns all over the country all through the last ten years, as you know. The laxity of Europe has afforded opportunity for the merciless working of this system in all its vigor. It is born of religious and race hatred, and has in mind the crushing of Christianity and Christians.

It is not the Kurdish robbers, or famine, or cholera that has to answer for the present state of the country. It is rather the robbery and famine and worse than cholera entailed on the country by the workings of this system. It is not alone the blood of five thousand men, women, children, and babies that rises in a fearful wail to heaven, calling for just vengeance, but also the fearful suffering, the desolate homes, the wanton cruelty of tax-collectors and petty officials, and the violated honor of scores and scores.

The Turk is on trial. Let not Sassoun alone go in evidence, but remember that the same wail rises from all over the country.

The country waits breathlessly the result of the investigation. May the Lord of nations stretch forth his almighty arm to save!

FROM NO. XVII.

[This is an extract from a letter written from a town in the province of Erzroom, and has no connection with the Sassoun affair. It is the written testimony of a pure, sensitive Christian woman, who is only one of hundreds that have been and are being trodden in the mire of Moslem lust. It was intended for the eye of a beloved teacher of the poor victim who wrote it. If it is wrong for me to publish it to the world, let God and the reader judge. Remember that the silence of death reigns in Sassoun, and that throughout other regions terror paralyzes the tongue. It bears date Nov. 4, 1894, old style (i.e., November 16). It is eloquent in its agonizing pathos, and shows the condition of the country in which such events are common occurrences, and against which there is no redress. F. D. G.]

[Translated.]

"I implore and earnestly entreat that you will remember one of your former pupils, and hear my cry for sympathy and protection. I have been outraged. Oh, woe is me! Eternal pain and sorrow to my young heart! Evil-disposed and lawless men have robbed me of the bloom and beauty of my wifely purity. It was H— Bey, the son of the Kaimakam [the local Turkish governor residing in the village]. It was in the evening between six and seven o'clock. I was engaged in my household work. I stepped outside the door, when I suddenly found myself in the grasp of four men. They smothered my cries and threatened my life, and by force carried me off to a strange house. Oh, what black hours were those till the sweet light of the sun once more arose! Though this is written with ink, believe me, it is written in blood and tears."

Literature.

"WEALTH AGAINST COMMON-WEALTH."*

Mr. Henry D. Lloyd of Chicago has done a public service in his volume, recently issued by Harper & Brothers, bearing the above title. It is a minute and searching examination of the enormous trusts which override and despoil the people of the United States. It is a tale of greed and shame almost incredible. The author touches briefly upon a few of the leading monopolies,—like that of the coal combination, with its aggregate capital of $500,000,000; the railroad and elevator conspiracy against the wheat-growers of the Northwest; the whiskey, beer, and sugar trusts; the leather, piano, and various other organizations controlling separate industries,—and devotes four hundred and fifty-eight pages out of a total of five hundred and thirty-six to a detailed and powerful exposure of the Standard Oil Company, the most colossal and successful one on the continent.

If from one we may judge all, certainly the Standard Oil Company, which hitherto has posed as the least objectionable and most benevolent, was a fitting choice for dissection. While other syndicates and "combines" have received uncompromising denunciation from the public, it has been the custom to cite the Standard Oil Company as an exception, and to extol the wisdom and consideration of its managers for steadily lowering the price of the refined product, as manufacturing processes were cheapened. It is enough for the unreflecting to know that oil was comparatively costly when the Rockefellers and their associates conceived the scheme of control, and that the price is now correspondingly low. To the managers of the monopoly, therefore, be all the honor and glory. "Post hoc, ergo propter hoc."

When, however, one reads of the cost that was essential to secure the crushing out of rivals; of the oil forced to run to waste because the iron grip of the trust withheld the possibility of transportation, in order to compel the owner's surrender; of the purchase of competing works simply to enforce their idleness; of the vast amount used to control corporations, legislatures, courts, and Congresses, through expensive litigation and lobbies; of the purchase of hostile legal talent; of the injury and destruction of property whose owners were defiant; and, in addition, the fortunes "beyond the dream of avarice" appropriated by the Standard Oil magnates,—the claim to have benefited magnanimously the public is seen to be a hollow sham. It is always the plundered public that extols the plunderer. "The process of plucking the goose without making him squawk" is the high art of monopoly, as well as of taxation; and the Standard Oil Committee were past masters in this accomplishment.

Reading this record of spoliation and shame, stirred with indignation at the unscrupulousness that stops neither at destruction of property nor life, one might imagine that the scene was laid in a barbarous despotism, where the light of the gospel had never penetrated. Instead he finds that the drama is taking place in the United States, and includes among its leading actors church members, society leaders, public-spirited men of business, legislators of distinction, shining legal lights, corporation managers, and officials who accept public position to serve private and corporate aims,—all banded together, and directed with an ability in itself worthy of the highest admiration.

The skilful narration of Mr. Lloyd, sustained by copious citations and legal witnesses, holds the reader's unflinching interest, which is also buoyed up by the hope that in the concluding pages of the volume the remedy and cure for this cancerous development of our so-called civilization will be suggested and urged. To his surprise, he will find that the author would destroy existing trusts by combining and consolidating them into one enormous trust, to be labelled "Government." In other words, he would have government assume all wealth-producing instruments, destroy competition, and control capital in the interest of the whole people.

The author affirms that "for a hundred years or so our economic theory has been one of industrial government by the self-interest of the individual. . . . But the flames of a new economic revolution run around us, and we turn to find that competition has killed competition; that corporations have grown greater than the State, and have bred individuals greater than themselves; and that the naked issue of our times is with property becoming master instead of servant, property in many necessities of life becoming monopoly of the necessities of life."

"For a hundred years or so," he says, "our economic theory has been one of industrial improvement by the self-interest of the individual." But now the dream of "centuries that the social can be made secondary to the individual is being chased out of our minds by the hard light of the crisis into which we are waking."

Mr. Lloyd, like all writers of the socialistic school, which now includes the leading professors of political economy here and abroad, decries laissez-faire, and declares that "it has put society at the mercy of its own ideals, and has produced an actual anarchy in industry, which is horrifying us into a change of doctrines." And he evidently holds to the belief that trade is warfare, and "that the many must always lose where all spend their lives to get more than they give." That Mr. Lloyd is a sincere and earnest man in common with those of his persuasion necessitates all the more a serious and respectful examination of his reasoning. Socialism appeals to the imagination of the multitude who feel the injustice and hardness of present conditions, and who are persuaded that a rest from the grinding anxieties of current civilization is to be found in a paternal government which assumes the responsibility for the well-being of its citizens.

The first thing that raises a doubt in the critic's mind is the author's acceptance of a regenerative system based on one confessedly selfish and destructive. The trusts, as "Wealth against Commonwealth" demonstrates, are gigantic instances of collectivism, managed in the interest of the unscrupulous few for the impoverishment of the many. This is illustrated in the first number of the American Fabian, just issued in Boston. The formation of a trust in New York real estate, in order that the stockholders may appropriate the "unearned increment" constantly accruing, is mentioned with approval, the editor adding the following comment: "It is a good sign to see capitalists combining. It will be the easier to replace their combination by the combination of the people."

The proposition is, therefore, to remedy this wrong situation by using more of the same deleterious medicine which has produced it, and which has already worked such havoc. But no recipe is given for preventing the able and adroit few from gaining control for selfish reasons of the nation's administrative machinery. This danger is not to be eliminated by personifying that machinery as "Government." Such a delusion prevails already, as witness the public innocence regarding the sources of government revenues. When the United States treasury was plethoric from the over-taxation of the people, with consequent derangement and depression of business, no objection was raised to the dissipation of the surplus in schemes of jobbery for personal or local aggrandizement concealed under the name of "internal improvements," to wicked appropriations to be squandered on a needless navy, to pensions for survivors of the detestable Mexican War and accessible to the hangers-on and bounty-jumpers of the later Union Army, and to the devious measures concocted to loot the treasury and compel the perpetuation of the protective tariff. This is a record of governmental mismanagement which parallels the nefarious acts of the monopolies which Mr. Lloyd denounces. What assurance can the socialists hold out that the unification of trusts will alter their dangerous nature? "Government" is in reality the few individuals who, by the arts of corruption or popularity, climb into power.

The fallacy that above all others needs to be punctured is the socialistic assumption that competitive methods are responsible for the industrial chaos which embarrasses civilization. In order to prove this, trade itself is maligned. Instead of being that beneficent and mutually profitable free interchange of services and products whereby both parties are benefited and blessed, we must adopt the repellent view that trade is war, that what one gains another loses, that markets must be limited and exclusively possessed by nations, and that people separated by imaginary lines must have opposing trade interests. This exploded, unchristian, and inhuman theory which now perpetuates restrictive tariffs and encourages armies and navies falls naturally into the socialistic conception. Such an association is in itself enough to discredit the scheme.

As for competition, where can we see it working under fair conditions? The present hampered and shackled trade is not competitive. True competition implies absolute freedom. Before it is indicted and judged without a hearing, would it not be just to permit an object-lesson? It is not fair to say that "competition has killed competition," but rather that special privilege has been the assassin. "The flames of a new economic revolution" may "run around us"; but, if they burn up liberty instead of the ligaments that bind her, the conflagration brings no substantial hope to society.

"The self-interest of the individual,"—the motive which, unhindered by artificial devices, must result in the interest of society, effecting that natural co-ordination and co-operation of industry which human organizations ever fail to accomplish,—this self-interest, this mainspring of human action, is deprecated and deplored. Unfettered, it leads to altruism as surely as the professed altruistic devices of socialism lead to selfishness and despotism. Laissez-faire, in its true sense, needs no apologist, and, in spite of sneers at the "Manchester School," will continue to stand for an ideal of freedom.

The very facts upon which paternalism bases its imaginary structure are the result of injustice, and would vanish under the reign of equal rights. While tariff barriers check the distribution of wealth, it must accumulate in special pockets, and labor be the sufferer. While land, the essential opportunity and source of all wealth, is made merchandise, and men profit by withholding it from use, the problem of poverty will grow.

The familiar story given by Bastiat illustrates the situation of a society where artificial government controls individual liberty: "A celebrated traveller once found himself in the midst of a savage tribe. A child had just been born; and a crowd of soothsayers, magicians, and quacks were around it, armed with rings, hooks, and bandages. One said, 'This child will never smell the perfume of a calumet unless I stretch his nostrils.' Another said, 'He will be without the sense of hearing unless I draw his ears down to his shoulders.' A third said, 'He will never see the light of the sun unless I give his eyes an oblique direction.' A fourth said, 'He will never be upright unless I bend his legs.' A fifth said, 'He will not be able to think unless I press his brain.' 'Stop!' said the traveller. 'Whatever God does is well done. Do not pretend to know more than he. And, as he has given organs to this frail creature, allow those organs to develop themselves, to strengthen themselves by exercise, use, experience, and liberty.'" While the soothsayers are followed, wealth will continue to be against the commonwealth.

W. L. G.

THE DAUGHTER OF THE NEZ PERCÉS. By Arthur Paterson. New York: Geo. Gottsberger Peck.—The lovers of Cooper will now find a new friend. Mr. Paterson has given, in a most vivid way, some of the stirring scenes in the life of "Nez Percé Joseph,"—who is still alive,—and has at the same time adhered, in most cases, to the truth. It is good to see things from the Indian's standpoint, and to feel a little wholesome animosity for the Indian Bureau as it was at that time. The story is exciting without being sensational, and the interest is well sustained. The last few chapters are a bit melodramatic; and, queerly enough, these are the very ones which depart most from the historical facts. The characters, with the exceptions of the indispensable villains, are lovable, and will add to the boys' lists of story-book heroes, though Joseph himself is to be classed among the living heroes of to-day.

THE USE OF LIFE. By Right Hon. Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M.P. New York and London: Macmillan & Co.—This book is a treasury of wise maxims and practical suggestions. It deals with those important topics which bear directly on our every-day comfort and happiness. The author has enriched the book by gems of thought gathered from a wide reading, and these quotations add very materially to the value of the volume. "The most important thing," says our author, "to learn in life is how to live"; and no one can fail to find in these pages how this can be accomplished. The choice of subjects is very comprehensive, and the book can truly be regarded as a manual to be consulted as a guide of action. It should be kept near at hand, and used as a constant companion. The style is clear and the thought definite, and we learn from these essays both the way and the use of life.

LULLABIES OF MANY LANDS. Collected and rendered into English verse by Alma Strettell. Illustrated by Emily J. Harding. London: George Allen. $2.50.—The illustrations and arrangement are charming, and the selections are characteristic. For real lullabies, however, we want the music, especially when the contrasts between the types of different countries are to be brought out.

Miscellaneous.

In the Riverside Literature Series is "The Old Manse and a Few Mosses." The "Mosses" are "Feathertop," "The Old Apple Dealer," and "Drowne's Wooden Image." A charming sketch of the old manse serves as frontispiece.

Another school book, issued by D. C. Heath, Boston, is "Stories of Old Greece," by Emma M. Firth. It cannot be said that these tales are equal to Mr. Church's stories, but they are simpler and well suited to schools. There are frequent illustrations done in outline.

How the girls will be delighted with "Famous Queens and Martha Washington Paper Dolls," by Elizabeth S. Tucker, and published by Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York! With all the robes, crowns, reception costumes, they are an interesting combination of millinery, dry-goods, and patriotism, which will please bright eyes and busy fingers.

Ginn & Company have issued a catalogue about "School Libraries." In addition to the general hints about the collection of such a library, there are several portraits and some lists of suitable books which will be useful to the school-teacher. In connection with this, they have published a collection of "Choice Reading," which consists of favorite chapters from favorite books included in their "School Libraries."

Macmillan & Co. have tried an interesting experiment in reprinting Capt. Marryat's "Japhet in Search of a Father," with an introduction giving a sketch of Marryat's life and work. Marryat has had the opportunity, which he knew how to improve, of giving a picture of the English seamanhood of his time. The captain was something more than a seaman: he was a good story-teller. The book is well printed and bound at $1.25.

Literary Notes.

A new, revised, and enlarged edition of Mrs. William Starr Dana's popular book, "How to know the Wild Flowers," is in preparation for early publication by the Scribners. It will have descriptions of about fifty additional flowers, with many of the old descriptions rewritten or amplified.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.'S

NEW BOOKS.

Daughters of the Revolution.

By CHARLES CARLETON COFFIN, author of "The Drum-beat of the Nation," etc. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

Mr. Coffin aims in this book to show how much the women of the Revolutionary period contributed to the cause of independence: how resolute, self-sacrificing, and patriotic they were. A slight thread of romance adds to its attractions, without lessening its historic value. It is written in a vigorous, picturesque style, and should go into every home and library in America.

The Story of Christine Rochefort.

By HELEN CHOATE PRINCE. 16mo, $1.25.

A special interest attaches to this novel by a grand-daughter of Rufus Choate. It is French in scene and characters; love plays a prominent and engaging part; anarchism pleads its cause, and shows its destructive nature in the strike it incites; French provincial life is skilfully described; and the story may well prove one of the most popular of the season's novels.

Chocorua's Tenants.

Poems by the late FRANK BOLLES, author of "Land of the Lingering Snow," "At the North of Bearcamp Water," "From Blomidon to Smoky." With illustrations. 16mo, $1.00.

A little book of genuine poems on birds that haunt Mt. Chocorua,—the crow, ruffed grouse, blue jay, kingfisher, etc.,—with some additional pieces.

"Life=Studies."

The immediate large interest in the two small cloth-bound books of the "Life" series, published during the last quarter of 1894 (each containing four papers), together with the general desire that similar brief essays or "studies" might be had singly in neat periodical form, leads to this monthly issue of Life-Studies.

The two books first issued in the bound series were "As Natural as Life," by Rev. Charles G. Ames, and "In Love with Love," by James H. West, subsequent volumes, uniform in size and general style, being promised from Rev. Dr. E. L. Rexford, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Rev. John W. Chadwick, Rev. Dr. M. D. Shutter, and men of similar power.

Some or all of the writers here named will appear likewise in the present periodical, in a single issue each, while to their papers will be added popular essays or "life-studies" from others among the best and brightest minds of America.

No. 1. By Rev. Marlon D. Shutter, D.D. A Wayside Prophet, a unique and brilliant paper.

No. 2. By Rev. Samuel M. Crothers. Making the Best of It, a hopeful and encouraging study.

(Issues to follow.)

No. 3. By William C. Gannett,—one of his characteristic, helpful papers.

No. 4. By Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett,—a suggestive Life-Study (topic to be announced).

No. 5. By Paul Revere Frothingham. Beauty of Character, a forceful paper.

No. 6. By Celia Parker Woolley (topic to be announced).

Annual subscriptions to Life-Studies will be received for 50 cents (ten numbers, published monthly, except during July and August).

Single copy, 6 cents. Ten copies of any single issue, 30 cents. Sample copy free.

*Three annual subscriptions will be received for one dollar (to be sent to one address or each subscription to a different address).

THE SAGES AND THE SHEPHERDS.

Came north and south and east and west
Four sages to a mountain crest,
Each pledged to search the world around
Until the wondrous well he found.

Before a crag they made their seat,
Pure bubbling waters at their feet.
Said one, "This well is small and mean,
Too petty for a village green!"
Another said, "So small and dumb,
From earth's deep centre can it come?"
The third, "This water seems not rare,
Not even bright, but pale as air."
The fourth, "Thick crowds I looked to see,— Where the true well is, these must be."

They rose, and left the mountain crest,—
One north, one south, one east, one west.
O'er many seas and deserts wide
They wandered, thirsting till they died.
The simple shepherds by the mountain dwell,
And dip their pitchers in the wondrous well.

THE PRINTER OF HAMMERFEST.

BY A. R. M'ALPINE.

A few years ago a party of us were "doing" Europe; and in July of that year we engaged a steamer at Bergen, Norway, to take us to North Cape.

Hammerfest is the most northerly point from which one can communicate with the world by post or telegraph. On putting in there, we found it to be a place of some four thousand inhabitants, I should think. It boasted of a small weekly newspaper; and it occurred to one of our party that, if we could have a notice of our visit to this remote region inserted in English in the next issue, it would be a quaint souvenir of the place and a welcome novelty to our friends at home, the rest of the paper being printed in the Norwegian language.

Accordingly, with the aid of an interpreter, we arranged with the publisher, who was also the printer, to have this done. Their types are the same as our Roman letters. With pen and ink we printed and punctuated just what we wished inserted, including our names and addresses. The printer said he could follow the copy, even if he did not understand it. As we might touch at Hammerfest in the night on our return trip, or at least while we were asleep (for in July the sun does not set there), we paid the printer in advance for the fifteen hundred copies we wished; and he agreed to deliver them on board our vessel by the pilot.

We proceeded on our trip, visited the cape and the Laplanders, and viewed the glaciers under the midnight sun, and so on.

Returning, we reached Hammerfest at four o'clock in the morning, but long before we arrived there the crew had discovered an immense cloud overhanging the town. Believing that the whole place must be in flames, the captain had us all aroused to view the conflagration. It proved that the fire had been burning all night, and nine-tenths of the buildings were destroyed.

Knowing that there must be great destitution and suffering, the captain landed all the provisions and medical stores that could possibly be spared; and the passengers quickly raised a purse of $1,100 for the sufferers.

The telegraph-office and instruments being destroyed, no communication with the outside world could be had. So the captain speedily weighed anchor and steamed for the nearest town on the coast that had a telegraph wire. Reaching there, he telegraphed to the captain of a north-bound vessel, then due to leave a town still further south, to expend the $1,100 for food and clothing, and hasten with it to the sufferers.

Thus our humane captain, by his prompt action, notified the world of the disaster; and in twenty-four hours relief began to reach the helpless people.

While the captain was ashore at Hammerfest, affording what relief he could, a small boat put off from the smouldering town, and came out to us. In it was our printer with the bundle of papers. The man who rowed him out could speak broken English; and he explained that, when the fire broke out, eleven hundred copies of the paper had not been printed. And the printer, instead of stopping and trying to save his effects, redoubled his efforts at the press, saying to all who tried to dissuade him: "Those people are expecting these papers, and they have paid me for them. I must keep my word." And he kept at work till the flames drove him out. Before he could bundle up the papers (some twelve hundred and fifty copies) many of them were scorched. He lost everything he owned. Through the interpreter, he expressed his regret at his inability to deliver the entire number, and offered us the few pennies he had in his pockets as an offset for his failure to keep his word.

Whenever I hear now of extortioners who take advantage of travellers, I have but to look upon my scorched papers to know that all men are not rogues; for memory calls up before me the honest, faithful printer of Hammerfest.

HOW I SAVED MY DOLLS.

THE STORY OF A MIDNIGHT FIRE.

When I was eight years old, I spent a summer, as I often did, with my three aunts and my uncle Amos at the old family homestead.

At this time I was very fond of paper dolls, and had ninety of them. They were kept in a large pasteboard box, and went with me everywhere. On rainy days I used to sit in an attic room over the kitchen, and play with them and paint dresses for them from morning to night. Sometimes they were all pupils, and I "kept school" with them. Again, they were grouped into families, with the most extensive relationships. They all had middle names and certain ages, which stayed the same always. This never struck me as being queer, though I knew that I grew older from year to year. Cousins, uncles, and aunts were very plenty among them; and I knew just which were which. Most of the dolls were home-made, though some were what we called "boughten." (I do not like that word now.) All of them had elaborate wardrobes, which were kept in large envelopes. It required all the powers I could muster to keep my doll family in order; but I enjoyed the hard work, for I loved my dolls as I did my best friends.

One day in early September it was very cold and rainy, and we had a fire in the dining-room for the first time that season. The fire did not burn well at all. The chimney seemed to be stopped up, for smoke would curl from every crack in the stove whenever a fresh stick of wood was put in. All day it smoked more or less, and the fire was allowed to go out before six o'clock.

I went to bed at eight, and the family retired at their usual time; but I was waked up in the middle of the night by my Aunt Tessie, who was shaking me and saying, "Get up! Get up! The house is on fire!"

I shall never forget how wild and white her face looked. The air was blue with smoke. I jumped up as quickly as I could, and hurried on my clothes, getting everything on wrong-side out and back-side before. Aunt Tessie tried to help me, but we were both shaking so that we did not get on very well.

In three minutes we were down in the dining-room: In all the confusion, one thought was uppermost in my mind,—my dolls! I ran to the cupboard where I kept them; and, when I once had my large doll-box in my arms, I felt calmer.

While I was saving my precious dolls, Uncle Amos came rushing in with an axe. There was a loud roaring noise in the chimney. Aunt Caroline stood with her arms clutched together. She shook like a willow in the wind.

"W-what a-are y-you g-going to d-do, Amos?" she asked, with her teeth chattering.

"I'm going to chop open the wall," cried Uncle Amos, excitedly. "The fire's in there. It's probably been smouldering there all day. We must get at it, or we can't put it out."

He lifted his axe, and pretty soon he had a large piece of the wainscoting out. Then what do you think happened? We did not see leaping tongues of flame, as we had expected. Nothing of the kind,—only a vast flock of chimney swallows, which flew out and circled around the room in the greatest confusion, quite as scared as we were.

It was they who had stopped up the great chimney, and whose excited swarming there had made the roaring noise. They did not like to have the fire built, though they made no noise during the day.

While the rest were driving out the swallows, I dropped into a chair with my precious box. There I fell asleep. My Aunt Sylvia woke me. My heart stood still as I heard her say: "Wake up, Katie! We're all going to bed again. Bless me, what has the child got? She is hugging the box of macaroni! She must have thought it was her box of dolls!"

I shuddered for weeks to think what if there had been a fire, and I had saved only the box of macaroni!—Little Men and Women.

THE YOUNG ARTIST.

About fifty years ago there lived in a small house on an obscure street of London a boy named John.

Although he was fond of boyish games from the time when he was still a very little fellow, there was one thing that John loved even better than play; and that was to make pictures. The walls of the house, the doors, and, in some cases, even the ceilings were covered with sketches in charcoal or crayon. And poor John was the worst boy to send on an errand; for he was sure to be diverted by something he saw on the way, and would stop to draw a picture of it on the side of a building, or, occasionally, on the back of his jacket, which he would slip off for the purpose. This sometimes brought him into trouble. His mother was usually very patient with him, however; for she had a mother's faith in his talents. And his father acknowledged that, "after all, the young rascal's pictures were uncommonly good."

Others soon began to think so, too. When John was nine years old, a little sketch of his won a silver medal from the Society of Arts. He then entered a regular class at the Royal Academy, and gained two more medals.

He was now a tall, prepossessing young fellow; and some people said he ought to be better employed than in dawdling with colors and canvas. His parents were growing old, they had made many sacrifices that he might pursue his studies, and now they were badly off for funds.

"Don't you worry, mother: it will be all right, father," he told them, cheerily. "Keep up your spirits until my 'Ferdinand' is finished. It is the best thing I have done, and cannot fail to bring a good price."

And so they hoped on; and he painted steadily, trying to portray his beautiful ideal. The subject was "Ferdinand and Ariel," from Shakspeare's play, "The Tempest."

One day he persuaded a dealer to go and look at the picture. The man, after examining it carefully, said:—

"It promises well. When it is completed, if I like it as much as I do now, I will give you £100 for it."

At this good news there was great rejoicing in the little home. John worked with new enthusiasm. As the picture grew more beautiful every day, they naturally regarded it as sold.

At last it was finished. John's father and mother, and the few friends to whom he exhibited it, were loud in its praise; and the young artist, in high spirits, and feeling already the joy of success, brought the dealer to see it. But, alas! the man had changed his mind in the interval, or he was out of humor, or some detail did not please him. At any rate, he looked the picture over coldly, and finally said:—

"I spoke of buying your picture if I liked it; but I don't like it, and I won't take it. Good morning!"

Turning on his heel, he was gone before the unfortunate painter could realize what had happened. The consciousness came soon enough, however; and then John faltered, wondering how he was to tell father and mother. But he was not one to shirk a duty because it was a hard one; and so he went to the sitting-room, where they were awaiting the verdict with calm confidence.

"Father, mother," he said, "I have failed. The picture has been refused."

"Never mind, my dear boy," she cried, laying her hand affectionately upon his arm. "Why should you be discouraged? Perhaps you will get a better price for your picture from some one else. God has given you the talents of an artist, and you will be sure to succeed in the end."

"But how are we to get along in the mean time?" he sighed gloomily.

"Oh, as to that," she went on briskly, "we could give up the rooms on the first floor; and they would make comfortable quarters for persons coming up to London for a few months. Two or three good lodgers would help to pay the rent; and, by being careful and economical, we shall be able to manage. So take heart, for fortune comes when least expected."

The next morning the sign, "Furnished Apartments," appeared in the front parlor window; and the young artist, after a sad glance at "Ferdinand and Ariel," resolutely turned it to the wall, and set to work upon another canvas.

Nearly three weeks had passed, when one morning the brass knocker upon the street door was rattled imperatively; and presently two persons were shown up to the studio. One was a man who sometimes dropped in "just to look around," as he said; the other, an antiquated little old gentleman with grizzly hair and beard, and a blue coat ornamented with brass buttons.

This last visitor was rather eccentric, and flitted about the room, examining John's sketches with curiosity and interest, and occasionally pulling out a canvas that had been stowed away. He seemed to be very fond of paintings, and to know a great deal about them. Chatting in a friendly manner, he soon learned the story of the "Ferdinand" and John's disappointment.

"Tut! tut! Too bad!" he exclaimed. "And what did you do with it then?"

"Here it is," replied John, dragging it from a corner and setting it upon the easel.

The old gentleman contemplated it for a long time in silence. John watched him narrowly. At last the queer visitor took off his spectacles, and said:—

"Humph! So he wouldn't take it? Well, don't be discouraged. Your work is excellent, and success will come after a while. But, of course, you have still much to learn. Now, here is a book," he continued, taking a little volume from his pocket, "which contains some practical advice to young painters. I should be pleased to present it to you if you will promise to read it."

John bowed somewhat stiffly, and said he would read the book.

"Then get a pen and ink, and I'll write your name in it," the old man went on fussily.

John opened a secretary, placed the ink-bottle and a quill pen before him, and, walking away to the window, stood gazing out into the street. Presently the old gentleman joined him, and put the book into his hands, saying:—

"Be sure to read it. It will do you good. Be sure to read it."

He and his companion then took leave; and John, after letting them out at the hall door, again climbed the stairs leading into the studio. "What a strange fellow!" he said to himself. "Oh, here is the book he left." As he opened the book, a bit of paper fluttered to the floor. John picked it up, and gazed at it in bewilderment. It was a check for a hundred and fifty guineas, with the old gentleman's signature at the end. On the fly-leaf of the little volume were written a few words, that the money was offered for the "Ferdinand." "Bravo!" cried the youth, recovering himself and leaping down the stairs several steps at a time. "Father! Mother! The picture is sold!"

Then, striding to the front parlor window, he took down the bill which advertised "Furnished Apartments," and tore it into bits. His mother never had occasion to put up another, for from that day her boy's pictures sold faster than he could paint them. Who was the gentleman in the antique blue coat and brass buttons?

It was Mr. Ellison, the generous patron of art, who bequeathed a collection of paintings to the Fitzwilliam Museum of Cambridge in England.

"And who was our friend John?" "None other than the famous painter, Sir John Millais, who sometimes tells this story to his young friends, when the work they have undertaken seems unsuccessful and they begin to be discouraged.—M. C. Crowley, in Youth.

FLUFFY.

Fluffy was a nice, big black cat, and she belonged to a little girl named Bertha. Bertha was very proud of Fluffy, not only because she was a pretty pet, but because she was a very clever cat. Then she was so loving and had such pretty little ways, that Bertha called her "my treasure." Fluffy could sit up and beg like a dog; and, when Bertha dropped her a piece of meat, she would catch it between her two fore paws in a very clever way.

Sometimes Fluffy got into trouble through some naughty trick. Like other cats, Fluffy was fond of peeping about, and poking her nose into places where cats are not allowed. Like other cats, Fluffy was fond of fish.

One day Bertha was having dinner with her papa and mamma, when in rushed Fluffy, like a whirlwind. But, oh! where was Fluffy's head? What do you think of a cat with a salmon can for a head? That is just what Fluffy had. She had jumped on the kitchen table when cook's back was turned, and smelling the fish, of which she was so fond, at once popped in her head. Oh, dear, how naughty of Fluffy! When she found that it was not very pleasant to have her head in the can, she tried to draw it out; but it stuck fast. Then she rushed round and round, and at last got into the dining-room. Fluffy looked so funny with her queer new head that Bertha and papa and mamma laughed at the sight. Then, when they remembered that pussy would be unable to breathe very well in her sorry plight, they began to look serious. Papa tried to catch her, but she ran round the room so rapidly that she was not easily caught. At last papa managed to get hold of her, and soon let the prisoner free. Fluffy was scratched with the sharp tin edges, and altogether Bertha thought she had been well punished for her naughtiness.

I told you that Fluffy was a clever cat. I must tell you something which she did every day. The back door of the house where Bertha lived had a latch and a curved, old-fashioned handle. When you wanted to open the door, you had to press down the latch and slightly push the door. Now, most cats mew when they want to go into a house, which is their way of calling, "Let me in, let me in!" Fluffy didn't do that. She jumped on the kitchen window-sill, and from there sprang on to the door handle and then opened the door. This is how she did it: she passed one paw through the curved handle, and thus held on to the door; then with her other fore paw she pressed down the latch, when the door would open and Fluffy would jump down and walk in. Sometimes the door was locked. Ah, then, you say, she had to mew. Oh, no, not at all! When she found that knocking down the latch did not open the door, she jumped back to the ground and then up again on the window-sill. Then what do you think this clever cat did? She tapped several times with her paw on the glass in a most polite manner. Of course, people heard her, and some one in the house would let her in. Sometimes Bertha loved to tease her, and would take no notice of Fluffy's knock. Then Fluffy would knock again; and, when this brought no one to the door, she would begin to mew in a very pitiful way, and of course Bertha would open the door for her dear little kitty.

One day Bertha's cousin Willie came to see her. Bertha's mamma let them play for a few minutes in the kitchen before bedtime. By and by a tap came to the window Willie looked scared, because it was so dark outside and the garden gate was locked. But Bertha knew what the tap meant, and, when she unlocked the door and Miss Pussy Cat walked in, Willie laughed with delight. Both Bertha and Willie thought Fluffy a wonderful cat.

This story is quite true; for I, who am telling this story to you, am Bertha grown up, and Fluffy was my pet when I was a little girl. Don't you think Fluffy was a dear, clever, cunning pussy cat? I do.—Child Garden.

GOOD STORIES.

Fanny and Dicky were children who used to tell each other stories "out of their heads." Fanny's were very short ones, such as this:—

"One day a little small, new, small small baby-girl fly went into a rose; an' her mamma was not looking, an' she los' her way in the roses' leaves an' never comed out. An' that little girl fly never saw her mamma any more,—never, never, never again, Dicky."

Dicky's stories were short, too, and such as this one:—

"Sometimes, when little boys have a toy train, just a tin one, and they are playing with it, it turns into a live train; and the engine puffs out live smoke, and live people travel in it. But, if their fathers and mothers look, or anybody, it is a tin train. And this is a fairy story, Fanny."

Or like this one, which Dicky said was a "nadventure":—

"One time, when three little boys went up the mountain, they set their lunch basket down on the tiptop. In about two minutes they heard a noise at their basket; and a chipmunk stood there, and the chipmunk had one of their cookies in his paws!"—Babyland.

AMUSEMENTS OF FAMOUS MEN.

Great men frequently show in the pleasures they allow themselves when their work hours are over that they have not forgotten how to be boys. Socrates took the greatest pleasure in joining in the play of such children as would permit him to share in their sports. Petavius, one of the most learned writers on matters connected with religion, used to amuse himself at the end of every second hour by twirling about in his revolving-chair for five minutes. The famous Dr. Samuel Clarke used to amuse himself by jumping over chairs and tables, and Dean Swift spent many an hour running up and down the steps of the deanery like a very boy.

Of Shelley, the poet, it is told that he took great pleasure in making paper boats, and setting them afloat on the water. Many years ago the following curious anecdote concerning the fondness of the poet for this form of amusement was published. So long as the paper lasted, the story says, he remained riveted to the spot, fascinated by this peculiar amusement. All waste paper was rapidly used up, then the covers of his letters, and then even the letters themselves were made over into little boats and cast upon the stream. The fly-leaves of such books as he carried about with him were also torn out for this same curious purpose; and sometime, if the printed pages of his books seemed uninteresting, he would sacrifice them as well. But the height of absurdity was reached when one morning he found himself on the north bank of the Serpentine River without any paper that he could use for this purpose. He searched his pockets vainly for a scrap that he might use to gratify his passion for sailing, but all he could find was a fifty-pound bank-note. At first he resisted the temptation to make a boat of this; but, as he sat on the river-side watching the stream flowing silently by, the temptation grew to be too strong, and he yielded. Twisting his fifty-pound note into a boat, he launched it on the river, and watched it floating here and there with the keenest delight, but with much anxiety. Fortunately for his pocket, he was a skilful enough paper-boat sailor to recover his valuable craft; but it is to be doubted if, after all, considering his anxiety lest a gust of wind should blow his treasure-boat out of the water and away from him forever, he found his game was worth the candle.—Harper's Young People.

THE NATIONAL FLAG.

It is a singular fact, and possibly an indication of lack of patriotism, that the average American, always excepting school-children, cannot tell off-hand how many stars there now are in his country's flag. If any reader desires to try the question on ten of his friends, he will probably find that only three or four can give the correct number, even after a minute of hard thought. The ordinary reply will range from forty to forty-two stars instead of the correct forty-four. The admission within four years of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, Idaho, and Wyoming, has brought the list up to the last-mentioned number. The shape of the Union has been changed from a square to a rectangle, and the stars are arranged in six straight lines, the upper and lower ones containing eight stars, and the remaining four having seven stars.—Selected.

HEARING WITH THE FINGERS.

There is said to be in Indiana a boy who hears with his fingers. When he was nine years old, he had a very serious illness, which left him practically deaf. For a long time the poor little fellow led a most unhappy life because he could not hear what was said by others; but one day, several months ago, while his mother was conversing with a visitor, he happened to place his hand on her throat, and observed that, while his hand rested there, he could hear perfectly. Later on he tried the experiment with others, and discovered that by making use of the sense of touch in the balls of his fingers he could make up for all that he had lost by the trouble which had befallen his ears. The result is that he is a much happier lad than he ever expected to be again, although he finds it awkward in some cases to have to put his fingers on the throat of his friends who happen to be talking with him.—Exchange.

A MODEL STREET RAILWAY.

The city of Budapest contains half a million inhabitants, and therefore presents all the problems of a metropolis. It refused to permit the introduction of the trolley system, as well as of a system in which one of the rails should be charged with electricity and used as a conductor. The result was that the street railway company desiring a franchise was compelled to resort to a better though more expensive system. There is an underground conduit below one of the rails, about fifteen by twelve inches. In this is carried an insulated wire conveying the current; and connection is made with the motor through a slot in the rail itself. There is thus neither any apparatus above ground that can obstruct the streets or endanger life, nor anything on the ground with which contact can possibly be dangerous.

The cars have all the modern improvements, are vestibuled to protect the motor-men from the weather, and are provided with fenders that prevent entirely injury to life and limb. The system is under strict municipal supervision, and its accounts are open to public inspection. Although this costly system is used,—and it is found adequate in all kinds of weather,—and all these improvements are insisted upon, the stockholders of the company received last year a dividend of 8 per cent. after a large rental had been paid to the city for the use of the streets, besides providing for a reserve fund.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Spirit of the Press.

The American Israelite describes a peculiar sect in Detroit:—

Detroit has a peculiar religious sect, calling itself the "Israelites," presumably because its members try to imitate closely the supposed actions of their namesakes of ancient days. These children of Israel, it seems, made themselves very obnoxious to the people who reside in the vicinity of their place of worship. The noise they made and their peculiar antics aroused the neighbors to enter complaint against them as a public nuisance. Recalling the achievements of the older children of Israel, these modern ones for seven days marched daily around the complaining neighborhood. On the seventh day they marched seven times around the block, and then halted in front of a building occupied by one of their chief prosecutors. Then a long blast was blown on a horn, and the faithful shouted with a loud shout. According to the programme, this modern Jericho should have fallen; but, alas! the walls refused to take a tumble upon themselves. It is needless to state that these Israelites are not Jews, albeit such a thing as an excess of noise emanating from orthodox Jewish places of worship is a thing not uncomplained of in times past and present.

A marble belt sixty miles or more in length has been discovered in Georgia. Some of it is said to be of a flesh color tinged with green, and some of a light gray banded with black. It can be quarried in large blocks, and takes a high polish.

There is always an increase of heat in descending deep into the earth. And yet geologists and other men of science consider the condition of the interior of the earth to be an open question. All agree that it must be very hot, but it is no longer a generally accepted opinion that we are living on a shell of rock enclosing a vast globe of liquid fire.

Physical deterioration has been increasing steadily in the British army in the last twenty years. In 1875 there were only 65 soldiers in 1,000 under 5 feet 5 inches; last year there were 127. The 608 in 1,000 measuring less than 37 inches round the chest has grown to 685. The proportion of enlisted men under twenty years of age has increased from 97 in 1,000 to 170, while that of men over thirty has decreased from 340 to 88 in 1,000.

The latest hygienic craze in Paris is the use of porous glass for windows. This is declared to possess all the advantages of the ordinary window framing; and, while light is as freely admitted as through the medium of common glass, the "porous" further admits air, too, the minute holes with which it is intersected being too fine to permit of any draught, while they provide a healthy, continuous ventilation through the apartment.

A large district in Southern Russia is suffering from a plague,—a plague of mice. Extraordinary accounts have reached us of the damage done over a district larger than Wales by the ravages of myriads of these tiny rodents. We are informed that their nests are so numerous in the fields that ploughing is impossible, the peasants turning away in loathing. So horrible is the plague that peasants in bodies are leaving their cottages, seeking spots where they may be free from these vermin.

Ask Some Questions

about Pearline, of any woman who uses it. Ask her what she thinks of it, and whether it's quite safe to use, and if washing and cleaning is any easier with it. Ask her how the clothes look and last, when they're not rubbed over the washboard. Ask her how it would seem to go back to that eternal rub, rub, rub, now that she has got rid of it.

If she has used Pearline faithfully, and just as directed on every package, she'll probably have one question to ask you: "How in the world do you manage to get along without it."

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 357 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity, and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

Monthly Magazine. Tenth Year.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Education.

A stereopticon lecture on "Ancient and Modern India" will be given by the Hindu, Mr. Virchand R. Gandhi, B.A., of Bombay, India, Saturday, March 23, 8 p.m., in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, Boylston and Berkeley Streets. It will give a vivid idea of the home life, manners and customs, architecture, religion, and philosophy of India. This will be Mr. Gandhi's last lecture in Boston previous to sailing for India. Tickets, 50 cents.

Prof. Max Müller confesses that at first he had been opposed to the girls' colleges; but they are, he said, a great success; "and it is a real pleasure to me to see the young girls so eager to learn. Young men do as little as they can; young women do as much as they can,—too much, indeed. Again, they work more systematically, and their knowledge is better arranged. It tends wonderfully to the improvement of the whole of their character. I wish the men could be shamed and spurred on to further effort."

No Southern State to-day, all conditions taken into account, seems to be making greater headway in popular education than Mississippi. It has long been known that this State had the least percentage of white illiteracy of any of the Southern States. Within the past twelve years the expenditure for common schools has risen from $830,000 to nearly $1,200,000. The colored pupils in the schools have increased fourfold, and the white nearly threefold. At the present rate of progress Mississippi bids fair not only to make her way out of the jungle of the "race question," but also to become a leader in the educational life of the South-west.

Charities and Reforms.

It was at Rochdale in 1844, coeval with the first steps to free trade, that twenty-eight weavers on assessments of twopence a week began the system of co-operative stores. Last year this now powerful and wide-reaching association celebrated its jubilee by a gift of $5,000 to the Rochdale Hospital. There are now in England 1,700 co-operative societies, with 1,300,000 members, a capital of $90,000,000, an annual business of $250,000,000, and profits last year of $23,000,000. There are 825,000 members of a wholesale society, whose sales for 1893 were above $47,000,000. It owns ships which visit every sea, runs a shoe factory at Leicester, soap works at Durham, and woollen mills at Batley.

Penologists in both Europe and America turn toward England with the greatest interest, because that is the one country in which there is evidence of a gradual, almost steady decrease in crime during the last fifteen or twenty years. Statistics bearing on this fact are interesting and significant. . . . When we ask for the causes that have contributed to this reduction, they are ascribed by the commissioners to the increased efficiency of the police, to the establishment of industrial schools, the effective punishment and reformation of criminals in prison, the development of societies to aid prisoners on discharge, and the operation of statutes enacted for the suppression of the habitual criminal class.—S. J. Barrows, in the Arena.

INDIAN WORK.—The Indian Industries League, which last week held a most successful parlor meeting at the Bellevue, will hold next Thursday evening, March 21, at eight o'clock, a mass meeting in the Old South Meeting-house, Boston. The president of the league, Rev. Edward Abbott, D.D., will preside. Capt. Wotherspoon, United States Army, to whom, it will be remembered, was assigned the difficult task of managing the Apache prisoners of war sent by the government to Mount Vernon Barracks, Ala., will give some account of the methods by which these dreaded warriors were converted into an orderly and working community, and the redoubtable chief Geronimo himself resolved into a justice of the peace. Miss Mary C. Collins, whose twenty years of missionary work among the Sioux have given her the knowledge of an expert, will speak of the industrial side of this Indian question. And not least in interest as a speaker is the full-blood Arapaho Indian gentleman and minister of the gospel, Rev. Sherman Coolidge.

More than thirty years ago it occurred to some people in Christiania, Norway, that a great economy in the preparation of food for people of limited means might be introduced by a steam kitchen. The population of the place was then about seventy-five thousand. It was an experiment, at first instituted "for the purpose of enabling people of moderate means to obtain a good wholesome dinner at a low price." The building is of brick, two stories high, and placed in the busiest part of the city. For the first few years the capital invested, $25,000, paid no dividends; but it served its primary purpose. The greatest discrimination is brought to bear on the selection of meats and vegetables, and high intelligence in its preparation. The dinners are sold in two ways: to be eaten on the premises, seated at a table, for seven and a half cents, or to be eaten beyond the premises, at six and a half cents. On Saturdays it was arranged to meet the desire for a greater variety, even at an enhanced cost, that there should be furnished two meals for consumption off the premises, one at seven and one-half, one at eleven cents, the higher price, of course, for the greater variety. Everything is clean to fastidiousness. The place is constantly growing in favor; and now the original debt is paid off, and for twenty years it has paid dividends of six per cent. annually, and has a reserve fund of near $30,000. The cooking so commends itself that many others besides the poor patronize it.—Independent.

Temperance.

Dr. Motet, the celebrated criminal doctor of Paris, has lately shown the series of disorders produced in mind and conscience by alcohol, illustrating each case by the recital of crimes sufficient to make the hair stand on end.

The Scottish Temperance League has been in existence for half a century. It began with a membership of ten, but it is now a powerful organization. The league, from the first, has placed its chief dependence on moral suasion.

An exchange says, "In 1893 1,207,931,968 gallons of wine, distilled and fermented liquors, were consumed in the United States. The amount of money spent for this liquor was $1,079,483,172. The economic argument of waste ought to appeal to every one."

Finland long ago decreed local option, and under its enforcement the country has changed from being given over to drink to a condition of practical total abstinence. It was supposed in other times that in cold countries it was absolutely necessary to take spirits, but that fallacy which fed the liquor traffic has been put away with many others of similar character. Indeed, the development of science and invention have been the two worst foes of the drink delusion.

"At no period in the history of our association has the path of progress been so clearly defined," writes Lady Henry Somerset in her New Year letter to the members of the N. B. W. T. A. "Over four hundred societies have been added to our number within the last eighteen months, and the calls made upon our organizers are far more numerous than we can meet." The coming year is to be one of grave responsibility, to meet which her "sisters and comrades" are urged to work definitely on four lines,—(1) the return of parliamentary candidates who will support the Local Veto Bill, (2) the support of the Progressive candidates of the London County Council, (3) a minute study of the social conditions under which the people groan, (4) the organization of the older members of Bands of Hope into the Loyal Temperance Legion. HIS LORDSHIP'S JOKE.

Before the bridge of Dalsersf, in Lanarkshire, Scotland, was built about forty years ago, a ferry-boat was kept there by Bauchie Lee, a very eccentric character, possessed of great shrewdness and humor. The Earl of Hyndford—the last of the title—had occasion very frequently to cross the ferry, when he generally gave Bauchie a shilling, although the charge was only one penny. His lordship cracked many a joke with Bauchie, who, in return, indulged in a good deal of freedom; but the former, on a particular occasion, determined to puzzle the ferryman, and, having got across the river, his lordship leaped out of the boat without so much as putting his hand into his pocket. Bauchie, apparently thunderstruck at the occurrence, eyed the earl for a while, and then, after he had gone a few paces, ran after him with the vehement vociferation: "Min', my lord, gin ye hae lost your purse, it wasna in my boat!" The good earl laughed heartily, retraced his steps, and rewarded Bauchie with a double gift.

BRECK'S NASTURTIUMS
ESTABLISHED 1822.

The glorious shades and combination of colors, attending the coming and going of the "God of Day," are rivalled in Breck's Mixture of Dwarf and Climbing Nasturtiums.
Instead of selling the mixture of the growers, we select the scarcer and more beautiful named kinds, and assort them ourselves. Some of the colors are white, pink, rose, scarlet, crimson, brick, claret, garnet, orange, primrose, yellow, spotted, striped and countless combinations of these and other shades. They are easily grown from seed, and no other annual produces such continuous brilliancy of effect from June until October. The more the flowers are picked, the more abundantly the plants produce them. We mail Breck's Nasturtium Mixture, 5c. pkge. 15c. oz.; 50c. 1/2 lb. Please mention whether Dwarf or Climbing are wanted.
Our 1895 illustrated catalogue mailed free. Replete with news about novelties, standard varieties of flowers and vegetable seeds and the most approved agricultural and horticultural implements.

Editorial.

THE tribute of respect and gratitude which will be paid to Rev. S. F. Smith, D.D., on April 3 for writing "My country, 'tis of thee," will be both personal and patriotic. Celebrations will be held in Music Hall, Boston, in the afternoon and evening of that day, at which Dr. Smith will appear; and throughout the country it is hoped that "America" will be sung in schools and homes. Critics may say that the hymn is not a great poem, to which the answer is that few great poems have proved to be successful hymns. Longfellow, Whittier, and Holmes all touched the popular heart; but none of them gained immortality through a national hymn. We needed a hymn in which patriotism and religion should combine; and "America" met a popular want, though the music is not American, but English, or German. If there is anything humiliating in the thought that we must sing our national hymn to a foreign air, we may find satisfaction in the larger sentiment of brotherhood revealed in the use by three great nations of the same musical tones with which to offer the prayer of freedom and patriotism. To Dr. Smith we extend warmest congratulation. He has lived to a green old age. He and his hymn have both been fitted to survive; and, if his psalm lives after him, as it is sure to do, it will be because his own love of country has conferred upon it the immortality of patriotism.

REMARKABLE changes have been brought about in our industrial economy by the introduction of labor-saving machinery. The enmity of hand laborers was immediately excited against the machinery which displaced them. Nearly every industry has a record of some such opposition. It has pretty much passed away now; and hand laborers have found that the introduction of improvements and inventions, while it temporarily unsettled them and compelled new adjustment to new relations, opened to them also new and varied avenues for employment. Thus Morse, by the invention of the telegraph, gave employment to a whole army of operators; and Bell and Edison, by the invention of the telephone, have given employment, it is said, to thirty thousand women in this country.

At the Massachusetts hearing in regard to a law regulating child insurance a great many facts were brought out, showing the evil effects of the present system. Doctors testified that children thus insured were exposed to drafts, colds, and to other risks, which in some cases directly induced death. This was especially true under the practice of baby farming. Abundant testimony was also produced, showing that money given for charitable purposes was diverted into the payment of insurance policies. The other evils of this system were brought out with so much force and fulness that it is difficult to see what arguments can be adduced in its favor, except those that are purely commercial.

AMERICA is a nation founded on great principles, and its founders were animated by great ideals. But we are very far yet from realizing the ideals of freedom we profess. It is but thirty years since we gave freedom to the slaves. Up to that time our boasted liberty was simply liberty of a certain color. The colored man does not yet enjoy full liberty and justice. In this matter of liberty of race England and other countries were ahead of us. In the matter of liberty of trade England is still far in advance of us. In the social realm we are freer from snobbery than some other countries, but we have altogether too much of it to reproach our neighbors. Politically, we have not yet extended the right of suffrage to women on any large scale, so that nearly one-half of the American people are not represented in their government. As to intellectual freedom, it is not determined by political boundaries; and we owe much to Germany for our emancipation from traditional theological bondage. But there is a great deal of freedom yet to be realized in this country in various directions—socially, politically, commercially, and industrially. So that some of our Fourth of July orators might profitably consider not only what the Declaration of Independence has done for us, but what we have yet to do to fulfil the Declaration of Independence.

HON. WILLIAM EVERETT cannot be accused of a lack of patriotic fervor, but there is a higher patriotism than that which consists in Fourth of July sky-rockets; and in the sermon by Dr. Everett which we publish this week he summons us to an allegiance which is higher than that which we owe to our country,—our allegiance to God. In the debate on the naval appropriation bill in the House of Representatives Dr. Everett, on grounds, as it seems to us, of the highest patriotism, opposed the increase of our navy. He asked first that our honest debts be paid. There is money that has been due to successful pleaders before the court of claims for many years. He pointed to the grossly inadequate salaries that are paid to the high officials, the need of erecting suitable public buildings, and to the fact that "the starving Navajoes called for $25,000 the other day, and there was a doubt as to whether it should be given to them. And yet we have money to build war-ships! . . . We have a navy. I do not seek to destroy it. Keep it and man it. Possibly, in times when we have a surplus,—an undoubted surplus, a big surplus [laughter],—possibly, at a time when we need not be raising gold loans at 4 per cent., or even at 3¾ per cent.,—possibly at a time when all is peaceful and easy in our cities, we may then amuse ourselves with building more battle-ships, as pretty but expensive toys. But, when we are taken out of the war system of European nations, when we have entered upon the new and glorious destiny of the future, when we have put behind us all this ancient history, when the course of our peaceful empire is taking its way westward, do not let us turn our eyes backward, do not let us be conjuring up old needless fears."

THE newspapers, secular as well as religious, keep up their fire on the bishops' letter. The Boston Herald declares that the letter grew out of suspicions that ought never to have been entertained, and adds: "The most galling and irritating feature of the whole matter is that it has caused the Episcopal Church to be greatly misunderstood in its essential character. It has grown in the last quarter of a century chiefly in two directions. It has placed more and more emphasis upon catholic doctrine as expressed in ritual and in ecclesiastical order, here displaying a healthy and legitimate development; but it has also increased immensely in its affiliations with modern thought, and with all the helpful activities of the day. It has led the way in what Dr. Donald calls 'the expansion of religion'; and the strength of this movement is not to be impaired by a pastoral letter which has no canonical authority, and is simply the ecclesiastical opinion of six excellent and venerable men who happen to be in high position."

THE Herald believes that "it is as idle to attempt to control the liberty of thought among educated men as it is to stem the waters of the Nile with bulrushes, and the silent protest of large numbers of the liberal clergy is an emphatic witness that the pastoral was ill-timed and a misrepresentation of what was going on. The effect of this document was at first that of surprise; but its reception has divided the Episcopal clergy and laity into two companies, one of which magnifies the ancient and old order, while the other is more than ever in sympathy with what is best among Christian people of all names. It is the consciousness of the strength of this latter movement, and the knowledge that no pastoral letter can arrest it, that has made Broad Churchmen hesitate to make a formal protest against a course of things which they do not approve of, and which has created a temporary disturbance in their own communion. The Episcopal Church is just as broad as it ever was; but its clergy and laity stand together, even when they differ strongly on important matters. Their silent protest is a witness to their self-restraint and reticence under provocation."

THE members of every profession have, to a certain extent, control over its practice and traditions. Nevertheless, it is true that doctors do not control all the remedies for disease, that lawyers do not make all the laws, and also that ministers do not control the progress of either religion or theology. Farmers and business men have an interest in the making of laws as much as lawyers. It would not do to say that no remedies for disease have been discovered outside the regular practice. It is just as true that no councils of theologians or makers of creeds can fix the religious beliefs of the great majority of thinking people who do not wear black coats and white neckties. It must be confessed that professional theologians have done far less for the advancement of theology than has been done by literary men, philosophers not regarded as evangelical men of science, and people of common sense and common feeling. Who, for instance, have done more for the advancement of theology in this country than Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, Curtis, Whittier, and Bryant? None of them were professional theologians. The doctors of theology had insisted that we must look at an artificial picture of the universe, which was just as unreliable as a map of the fifteenth century with Jerusalem in the centre. These writers helped to effect a change in public feeling by showing us the world as it is. Not by theological arguments; but, by producing a new atmosphere, they assisted in disintegrating the old creeds. For these old creeds will not stand fresh air and sunlight: they must be shut up in hermetically sealed cases if they are to be preserved. Likewise, no theologian ever did so much for theology as Charles Darwin, simply by presenting a series of facts and truths which theology had totally ignored. Thus it is that the advance made in one department of science, literature, or thought, is sure to affect other departments. The Church has cursed its heretics, but by and by it will canonize them.

LIFE MEMBERSHIP IN THE A. U. A.

The question of individual versus corporate membership in our general missionary organization can hardly be said to have reached as yet an acute stage, but it will probably have to be dealt with at no distant date; and, possibly, trouble may be saved by an early settlement. The Association began its life as an organization of individuals, appealing mainly to the churches, nevertheless, for funds to carry on its work. After a time the churches which gave a large part of the money annually expended began to demand some power of control over the expenditure of their gifts. Ten years ago, in response to this demand, the present system of delegate membership was adopted, in accordance with which every church that has contributed for two years successively to the treasury of the Association is entitled to representation in its annual meeting. At the same time the clause in the by-laws creating an annual membership on payment of a small fee was dropped, and the fee for life membership was raised from twenty-five to fifty dollars. An amendment recommended by the directors, that no money used to send delegates should also be used to make life members, was defeated.

The Association is therefore at present partly in the hands of individual members and partly under the control of the churches. This means that it is in a state of transition. Started on one plan, it has in part adopted quite a different plan of organization. Without removing itself entirely from its former basis, it has gone some distance toward establishing itself on a new foundation. It is now living like a family in process of removal, partly in the old domicile and partly in the new. This answers very well for the time being; but, probably, it is not an arrangement that can long endure. To carry out the figure of speech, it may be said that we cannot continue to live indefinitely in two houses at once. Circumstances will compel us to take up our permanent abode in one place or the other.

Suppose, on the one hand, that the churches should show a strong tendency to increase their interest, and to be more fully represented in our annual meetings. Three hundred churches would then send a body of nine hundred people; and they would come together determined to take part in the proceedings, whether the life members were accommodated or not. In this case life membership would speedily go to the wall. Suppose, on the other hand, the churches do not manifest this increase of interest. Then those which now send delegates, finding the life members more and more in command, are likely to become discouraged about their representation. One way or the other, the present balanced arrangement is very certain to be disturbed. Delegate membership will either increase till it is able to do what it likes or it will decrease till it becomes a practical nonentity.

As between these two results, we believe there can be no question which is the more desirable. If we are ever to have an effective denominational organization, the interest of the churches in the work of the Association must be strenuously sought and carefully increased. To this end it is highly important that they should be encouraged to assume some share of responsibility for the administration of denominational funds.

This question also has its bearing upon the problem of raising money for our missionary work. There are two theories as to the best way of accomplishing this. One theory is that our rich men and women should be chiefly depended upon to provide us legacies and large annual gifts. This theory goes naturally with belief in a basis of individual membership. The other theory is that we shall do most by appealing, through the churches, to all classes of Unitarians. It would place not so much stress upon reaching the rich as upon reaching everybody, and this theory agrees well with belief in the system of delegate membership.

Doubtless, all will say that, to a certain extent, they believe in both theories; but we can hardly avoid putting our main reliance on one or the other source of supply. Does not the weight of probability incline us to think that we can do best with the largest amount of popular interest we can possibly create? If we make it a question of reaching the pockets of the rich, will not that be most effectively done through a movement of increasing strength in the churches to gather up from all their modest contributions? Let the churches grow less interested in the work of the Association, and it is very certain that the people of wealth will share their apathy and distrust.

Good policy would seem to dictate that, at all hazards, we should maintain our system of delegate membership, and use it to draw our churches more and more into active participation in our denominational work. Success in this endeavor would, no doubt, act ultimately to stop the making of new life members; for, were the churches to make full use of the opportunity afforded them, their delegates would leave no room for anybody besides. It is now a question whether the expedient of refusing to create any more life members might not, in itself, contribute to that success.

There is, of course, no possibility of destroying the powers which such membership now possesses; and the question of its future influence need not be raised. But is it not possible that the publication of a long list of new life members every year tends to make the churches careless about their representation, and to produce a feeling that, as churches, they have little or no responsibility in the case? It is true that, in a certain sense, they are represented by the life members that belong to them. But we are always trying to get these churches to adopt some more systematic method of taking up their collections, and the effect upon them cannot be good if we allow them to think that the whole matter is to be left to individual interest and care.

One way or the other, it seems desirable that we should make our choice. If we want our organization to be composed of, to be managed by, and to get its money from selected individuals here and there, let us have the courage of our convictions, and not try any poor makeshift to satisfy the discontented common people. If we mean that all shall lift together at the common burden, let us conform to the customs of our race and time, and have all the people so amply represented through the churches that upon them shall rest the responsibility, and to their hearts the appeal shall be made, without possibility of evasion, for the means and the enthusiasm to carry our work to assured success.

THE CHILDREN'S CURFEW.

The hour for the children has struck. There is not a civilized country where special attention is not being paid to the care of dependent and neglected children. Preventive work is gradually supplanting punitive work; and, the more successful is the former, the less need will there be for the latter. The Province of Ontario in Canada is developing great activity in this direction; and the second report of the work under the "Children's Protective Act"—an extremely readable pamphlet of sixty-five pages—gives encouraging assurance of the adoption of wise measures in dealing with the juvenile wards of the State.

Among other things adopted in thirty municipalities is a curfew bell, which is rung at nine in summer and eight in winter, to warn all children under fourteen or fifteen who are loitering on the streets that it is time young people were at home. It is claimed that the law works well, and town after town is voting to employ this preventive measure. There are critics who say that it savors too much of paternalism; but, if the State will eventually have to assume the duty of arresting children of this age for serious transgressions, as a consequence of their being allowed too much liberty on the streets, there seems no reason why it should not begin betimes to look after them in this simple way, especially if the parents neglect them. But with this there should be equal care to see that night schools are provided for those who need schooling, rational amusements and gymnastics for those whose homes afford no attraction to the young people, and friendly suggestion from some quarter for such children as try to evade this municipal regulation. It is undoubtedly true that the dangerous hours for youth of both sexes are between nine and midnight; and, if the boys and girls can be shielded then, who can estimate the misery from which they may be saved?

This Canadian report fairly bristles with the letter "v," there is so much said of visitation and visiting committees; for, with commendable zeal, the work of visitation has been thoroughly incorporated as the most valuable thing in caring for dependent and neglected children. And there is a clear determination to have the visitors visit: they are not to be mere figure-heads. "A visiting committee on paper, composed of ladies and gentlemen who do nothing, is a great hindrance rather than an advantage to the work, and should be changed. . . . Therefore, where such inactive, useless visiting committees exist, they should be wiped out."

There is also a determination to have the visitation set apart as a work by itself, to be done chiefly by volunteers, who shall come into much closer contact with the children than any government inspector can do:—

Where the matter of caring for the children and their supervision is carried on in a proper manner, where those interested in the children know their character and disposition to a certain extent, and have at least some fondness for them, those people going about to visit them would have a greater interest in seeing that they are well cared for in the places to which they are sent than any government inspector could have, who had never seen the girl or boy before.

It is interesting, in looking over the report of these visiting committees, to notice that stress is laid on seeing that proper time is given to the children for amusement and for their schooling. At the recent hearings before the legislative committees in Massachusetts, with reference to the establishment of a Children's Bureau whose duties would be practically akin to those required by the Children's Protective Act of Ontario, it was clearly seen that the schooling of the children who are placed out is not so carefully looked after as it would be if the children were under a board who should have no other duties to perform. At present there is a good deal of "criss-cross work," as one of the counsel expressed it. The children are "tossed from one board to another like shuttlecocks," and there cannot be the uniformity of method and care that would necessarily ensue if they were under a special bureau with undivided interests. "If we undertake to supply the place of the parent, we must assume the farther responsibility of seeing the children happily and contentedly placed, and their interests fully safeguarded. . . . They must not be deprived of their amusements and schooling, to which their youth gives them a strong natural right. Whatever else suffers, the machinery for this branch of the work should be adequate to fully protect every child."

So say the visiting committees of Ontario; and such are the views of those in Massachusetts who would simplify the machinery of caring for children to such an extent that there should be uniform methods and an undivided responsibility, with the safeguard of supervision by the State Board. At present it is its own supervisor; but as Mr. Joseph Lee says, "It cannot supervise its own work, and supervision is essential in these matters. . . . Either we have made a mistake in having special boards in the case of lunatic hospitals, State farms, and almshouses, or we should continue the policy in this case. Indeed, I think this is a much stronger case. The question is whether it is more difficult and complex and more requires a special board to look after an institution where the work is chiefly taking care of people's bodies or to look after two thousand children scattered over all the State and other States, where the problem is not to keep them alive, but to build up the moral character."

IN A FAIR COUNTRY.

We heard it said casually in conversation, the other day, that the world can get along very well without poetry. It gave a little shock to our nervous system; for it had always appeared to us as impossible to get along without poetry as without daily bread, motherhood, love, or heaven.

Though the scientist may dispute it, the tangible is the least part of our strange and mysterious life. We are so singularly made that we are always culling our food beyond the region of the senses, in places unmentioned in gazetteer, unmarked on geographical maps. In fact, each one of us has a fair country whither we resort to spend the best portion of our time, if we have any life at all beyond the senses of the lowest orders of beings, like the batrachians and zoöphites.

There is no human creature, it is safe to say, that owns not a little private key to a secret door opening on the fair country, even though the key is fitted into the wards of the lock by sleep or some outward stimulant. It is that private domain that helps millions of wretches to live day by day. They have no comforter but hope; and hope is the universal poet, hovering with divine pity over all the dens and dives of earth, all the sick-beds and confirmed invalid wards of her universal hospital.

Somehow, the poor wretch through a color, an odor, the flitting of a bird, the face forgotten floating up in the wreckage of life, the breath of the wind, the sound of a voice, a thousand ways too subtle and intimate and personal to name, gets into his fair country, and, if only for a moment, knows he is not all sodden clay or degraded earth, but has in him a spark of the divine nature. Love, friendship, the tender humanities, a touch of kindness, a thought of heroism, self-sacrifice, and devotion,—anything that lifts man above a mere feeding and digesting machine,—open the place where the soul is free; and the ideal presents itself, not of full face, but in fitting, illusive vision, like some rare bird just skimming the horizon,—a flash of brilliant or snowy wings seen and then withdrawn.

Without these glimpses of the fair country, which is indeed the poetic realm, how could we live? Vision is sent to still the perpetual soul-hunger, the attendant upon immortality, the sign and proof that we are to endure beyond this stage of existence, to be fed with other food, to breathe other air, to rise to enlarged opportunities and expectations. The eternal thirst of the spirit comes from the deep and inexhaustible vein of poetry within us. Our unrest and self-contempt, the impossibility of ever stilling for long the hungry desires that cry for better soul-nourishment, more love, more light, more knowledge, more power, is the inexhaustible spring of poetry in human nature. It is the source of all the tragedy, all the pathos, all the nobleness, all the heroism of man. Only to win the supreme, the highest satisfaction will man do and dare to the sublimest heights. Just to reach that self-approval, that sense of oneness with God for even one moment, will he wade through seas of pain. Martyrdom is not too costly. The idealism of the soul puts death at a pin's fee. Many of the greatest have courted and sought death, loved it like a lover, because through it they would penetrate to the heart of the mystery, measure the exhaustless claims of the soul with every form of test and experience known or unknown.

And yet it is believed we could live without poetry, cut it clean off of daily existence, when even the commonest day is steeped in it, and subject to a tyrannous idealism from which there is no escape. Even if our aims are low, our lives poor and sterile, the soul has a trick of taking it up, turning it about, bathing it in a stream of unreality, casting upon it reflected lights, until it is worked over for the tricked and deluded being into something different from the material. We are not to ourselves what we are to others. We all know we have the key of a fair country, if we will but walk there. We keep the thought of it always in mind, as a hope, a possibility. Some time when leisure arrives we are going to live in our best domain, we are going to be other and better than we are now.

We neglect our opportunities for a long time. We may almost forget that we have the key. We may lose the taste for the pleasures of the fair country until some great loss, some intimate pang, some heavenly gleam of love and remembrance, some tender relenting of the time, the smell of the earth and grass on warm days, the drift of tree branches against the sky, a wave of gratitude and longing, suddenly sets the gate ajar; and we are there in our sacred little domain. We are wandering in the past in forgotten springs and summers, when we were more innocent, more susceptible to good, less hard and rigid in the world's ways, when the heart was softer ground, more generous, loving, and believing, or new spiritual vistas open before us and hidden things are made plain. It is by revelation in the fair country that we grow in grace.

This fair country into which we stray, even when we are old, through our purest emotions, the waves of influence that flow from above, is the kingdom of heaven proclaimed by Jesus,—a place without laws or restrictions or violence, where none strive or cry, where all do the right thing and the true thing spontaneously, because human nature is clarified, is working to its normal issues, and the soul, assuming its upright stature, needs no control being capable, uncoerced, of finding all beautiful and holy occasions. The ideal makes us men and women, enables us to live at all by satisfying with glimpses of perfection the insistent hunger that is always within us. How little the people know themselves who think they can get along without the poetry of life! Every time they pronounce the words "God," "love," "faith," "fidelity," and a thousand others, they open such depths on depths of sublime poetry that the solid bases of this material sphere, if there are any, melt and swim, and are dissolved as in rainbow mists. For the sternest realist is all compact of fantasy. His gold dollars and greenbacks, his houses and railroads, have no real value except the ideal value which his imagination attaches to them. Without knowing it, he opens the little gate into his fair country, and something illusive mingles with the figures of his ledger, otherwise he were not a man. His estate may be ever so large, but it is little worth unless it opens on a larger.

Charles Lamb, when a poor, unknown youth, had a fervent desire to know and mingle on terms of friendship with the witty and wise ones of the earth,—scholars, thinkers, poets. We have all shared that wish; but, if circumstances have brought us in contact with some of these, we are apt to be disappointed. The witty are less witty than we thought, the wise less wise. The good hide their goodness under petty bushels. The learned know not how to impart themselves. A certain coldness and indifference creep into the intercourse. But in the fair country it is not so. There is perfect intercommunion of soul. There we meet the poets and sages at their best. There they give themselves to us right royally. There, indeed, we must know them, if ever. The inestimable gift of the fair country, we believe, will not be taken from us at death, but will be confirmed. Where we have walked in imagination, we shall then walk in reality; and the tender, joyous, loving, and blest ideal will blossom like a close-folded bud on which a new spring has breathed.

NAILING A LIE.

The New York Independent nails a lie which has been travelling over the country propelled by anti-Catholic hate. A document has been prepared showing that 72 per cent. of all the deserters in the war were Irish. The document purported to be from statistics furnished directly from the United States Pension Office, and to have the indorsement of the New York Sun. The editor of the Independent wrote to the War Department, and received the following reply: "No compilation has ever been made from which any reliable statement can be made relative to the number of deserters during the late war. The number of soldiers of any given nativity in service during the war is not known, nor is it possible to make even an approximately correct statement of the number or percentage of deserters belonging to any particular nationality." The New York Sun likewise denied that it had indorsed these figures, which, as the Independent says, "strips the statement of the last vestige of authority, and shows that it is a lie made out of the solid." But a lie will continue to travel, even after it is nailed. Yet the Catholics may rest assured that persecution which is founded on misrepresentation and falsehood will, in the long run, meet the fate of all lies.

Musings.

THE moral distinctions that men draw are sometimes strange enough. Disraeli might have written as interesting a book on "The Curiosities of Ethics" as on "The Curiosities of Literature." A man came into my office the other day. It was not the first time he had called there, and I recognized him immediately. But I had not seen him for more than three years. "Where have you been?" I asked. "Oh, in the House of Correction for three years." "What did you go in for this time?" "House-breaking." "How many times have you been in prison?" "Seven times. I am thirty-two years of age, and I have spent fifteen years of my life in prison." The left hand of this man was badly injured in an accident some years ago, and is incapable of use. There are few occupations open to him. He could serve as a messenger or pedler. He complained that, if he peddled, he was constantly under the surveillance of the police, and had been arrested once or twice on suspicion. It is natural that a man who has been in prison so many times should be in bad repute among the police. I asked him, in view of the fact that work was very difficult to find and that he had no means of support, what he thought about going to the almshouse at Tewksbury. You should have seen how he straightened up at the mere suggestion! "I don't want to be a pauper!" "Well," I said, "you could do enough work to pay for the cost of your keeping." "No," he said, "I don't want to be a pauper, and go to that place." That he had some other ambition I thought was hopeful; but I asked, "You would rather be a thief than a pauper, would you?" "Yes," he said. "I have spent half of my life in prison, and I don't want to go there again; but I would rather go to prison than go to the poorhouse." I pointed out to the man that poverty and inability to work were not in themselves dishonorable; that, when he went to prison, he went to a State institution, and was sheltered and fed at the expense of the commonwealth just as much as if he went to a poorhouse; that he was, in fact, not only a thief, but a pauper, too. But I could not effect any change in his sentiment of honor or self-respect. There are many at Tewksbury who might say, "I am a pauper, but not a thief"; but I suspect there are as many in prison who would say with the pride of this man, "I am a thief, but not a pauper." I remember at the Concord Reformatory that the temperance men who steal have very little respect for the honest men who get drunk, to which I suppose the appropriate answer would be, "I know I get drunk, but I don't steal."

THESE curious moral or immoral distinctions are not confined to the criminal classes. They run all through society, and they are revealed very strangely in our criminal codes. Thus, if you take the codes of all the States in the Union, you will find that hardly two agree on the subject of comparative wickedness. The whole thing is admirably shown by my friend Mr. Frederick H. Wines, an abstract of whose striking address before the National Prison Conference was published in the Christian Register of July 12, 1894. In that article we shall find that the relative estimates of crime in the different States are strangely curious and contradictory. It is not easy to see why in Kansas a forger should be considered four times as guilty as a thief, and why in Connecticut a thief should be considered four times as guilty as a forger. I am disposed to think that one is about as bad as the other. In Ohio and Minnesota it is twice as wicked to counterfeit as it is to commit perjury, but in Rhode Island and Alabama the guilt of perjury is twice that of counterfeiting, and so on through the long catalogue of offences. When we find lawyers, legislators, and judges making curious distinctions in regard to crime, it is not surprising that thieves and inebriates dispute as to their own social and moral standing.

A LITTLE more than a week ago I had the duty which so often falls to a minister of going to the house of mourning to speak in memory of one who had held a high official position in the service of his country. Reporters were present to make a public record of the service. The way in which these reports were made illustrates the good and the bad methods of modern journalism. In one paper, the Dorchester Beacon, the report was a fair and accurate abstract of the tribute paid to the departed. The other report, which appeared in a Boston daily, was made up almost entirely out of the imagination of the reporter. The opening sentences show that he had been present on the occasion; but, as for the rest, he might as well have written it at the newspaper office. Evidently, this reporter had his own idea of what ought to be said on such an occasion, and that it ought to be very orthodox and very melancholy. He therefore composed an address, and draped it in the crêpe of conventional pietistic funereal phrase. The two paragraphs that follow, for instance, may be in a higher and more fervent strain of eloquence than could possibly have been attained by the speaker, who aimed at being very simple:—

But we must all answer to the call of the "Grim Reaper." None are spared,—the rich and poor, good and bad; those who have led a dissolute life and those whose lives have been full of good toward mankind.

But how much better it is, brethren, when we have to answer that last dread call, to know that we may be numbered among those who have led an honest, God-fearing life. Then, oh, then, may we say, "O grave, where is thy victory?" without the sting of sin to cling to us when we come before that Great Judge who can read into the innermost soul.

In the first paragraph the reporter has availed himself of the common refuge of the minister, that of saying something which nobody can possibly dispute. It would be a rash man who would dare to challenge the statement that all must answer to the call of the "grim reaper," and that none are spared. The only untruth about it is that the speaker did not say it, or anything that has the slightest approach to it, or that in the remotest possible way could have suggested it. Death was not mentioned as a "dread call" nor as a "grim reaper," nor was there any reference to a "Great Judge"; for the speaker is not accustomed to regard God as either a king or a judge, nor does he regard death as a grim reaper. It is wholly to the genius of the reporter that such brilliant flights of rhetoric must be credited. The question arises whether a young man who has such genius for composing funeral orations ought not to leave the restricted sphere of a reporter's life and become a professional eulogist. As for the reporter who wrote the account in the Beacon, his report must seem singularly lacking in rhetorical fervor and ecclesiastical truism. He can simply have the consciousness that it was correct: he cannot flatter himself that he has composed by his unaided genius one of the most pious funeral orations that ever sanctified the face of the Globe.

Brevities.

Not only marbles and base-ball and hoop-trundling, but more genial skies and warmer air announce that spring is here.

The prosperity of the minister, like that of the merchant, depends not only upon what goods he has to deliver, but on how he delivers his goods.

Dr. Herrick Johnson of Chicago thinks that Christianity was muzzled at the Parliament of Religions. Does it mean that Dr. Johnson did not have a chance to speak there?

The many ministers who have been eagerly waiting for the opportunity to examine the abridgment of the "Book of Prayer and Praise" will be glad to learn from an advertisement in another column that it is at last published.

Dr. Talmage offered a prayer of thanks that Congress had dispersed, and hoped that some of its members would not be returned. But Dr. Talmage must be more definite, and furnish the Lord with a list of those whom it would not do to send back.

Rev. W. M. Brundage of Albany preached his farewell sermon in his Methodist pulpit two weeks ago. He has carefully avoided all cause of offence in severing his old ties, and has been bidden God-speed by his old friends and colleagues with expressions of affection and respect.

Theoretical religion is like theoretical cookery. Every recipe in the cook-book is an article of faith; but the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and in the digestion which follows. The theological cook-books furnish definitions and recipes, but some of them are unpalatable and indigestible.

The Calhoun School is another light in the Black Belt; and Mr. Dillingham asks the practical question, "Shall it be kept shining?" For some years to come the South will need gifts and endowments for its educational institutions. The stream of beneficence should flow not toward the pole, but toward the equator. Patriotism and humanity must blend in the offering.

Many people thought the iron man of Germany could not melt, but he burst into tears when speaking of the old emperor. Bismarck brought about German unity more through the sword than by the olive branch. He armed Germany against the world. The next great prime minister will be he who disarms Germany against the world and the world against Germany.

The Congregationalist sets forth the hardships of a candidate: "That was a curious reason given by a member of a committee for securing a new pastor for an indifferent attitude toward a certain candidate. 'The fact is,' said the committee man, 'we liked his preaching first-rate; but we feared he had struck twelve the first time, and couldn't duplicate the performance.' What is the man in question to do, pray tell us? Shall he bring a poor sermon when he ventures into a new pulpit? In that case he would probably be disfavored because he didn't strike twelve. Verily, it's a trying ordeal, this being a candidate."

A geographical map of the different denominations would show that the Methodists like the torrid zone and volcanic regions; that the Universalists like a more temperate climate; that the Baptists like to settle on the banks of great rivers and on the seacoast, because there is much water there; that the Episcopalians are divided, some preferring high and some preferring low latitudes; that the Presbyterians like a section that is well fenced in; that the Unitarians prefer the freedom of the open prairie, and are, perhaps, a little too fond of colder latitudes. But there is a good deal of denominational migration going on, and a cool Methodist and a hot Unitarian are by no means hard to find.

The third day of April has been appointed for the celebration in honor of Rev. S. F. Smith, author of "My country, 'tis of thee." An afternoon and an evening reception will be held in Music Hall, at both of which the poet will be present. Patriotic addresses and music will be the features of the entertainments, that of the afternoon being intended principally for children. It is desired that throughout the country, at noon of the 3d of April, all schools unite in singing "America," and that, so far as practicable, the religious service on the preceding Sabbath, March 31, shall include this hymn of patriotic praise. The suggestion that the bells of churches, public buildings, factories, and wherever bells hang, be rung for five minutes at noon of April 3, has the sanction of the committee in charge of the testimonial.

Pro and Con.

TEN SHORT SENTENCES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I should like to call the attention of those of your readers who are interested in our church music to "Ten Short Sentences," a collection of music finely adapted to the uses of our Unitarian church choirs. The production is by Prof. C. P. Morrison of Worcester. The words are well suited to Unitarian sentiment, and the music is too good to be allowed to go without a very general notice of its existence.

LEWIS G. WILSON.

BOOKS WANTED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The Liberal Church League, in connection with the Unitarian church in this city, is attempting to enlarge the church library, and, as one of the means to be employed, has decided to write to different ministers of our church for books.

Any book or books that friends may choose to send us will be heartily appreciated.

Any books sent may be addressed to Rev. George Leonard Chaney, 611 East Franklin Street, Richmond, Va.

E. C. WILLIAMS.

TRAVELLING LIBRARIES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

A few weeks ago you commented upon the New York plan of travelling libraries. Why cannot something definite of this kind be started for the benefit of our Unity Clubs? It is the lack of books that cripples their efforts, at least in some sections. With the help of a special library on the subject of study, some good, thorough work could be done. A start could be made by a number of clubs agreeing to form libraries, each on a different subject, and to exchange. Why not get a show of hands on the question?

THE NEW LITURGY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

As the individual members of the Subcommittee on Liturgy have received various inquiries in regard to the form of the new book, expense, and probable date of issue, it may be well to state through the columns of the Christian Register:—

1. The book will be for sale at the Unitarian headquarters, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on and after April 1, 1895.

2. The price of the book, bound in cloth, to churches, will be at the rate of 40 cents a copy.

3. The Easter service included in the book is made up of introductory sentences, an exhortation, a prayer, and responsive reading for minister and congregation. This service is so arranged that it can easily be adapted to any form of religious procedure.

4. Many ministers will find the book valuable for vesper services, the elasticity in the rubric allowing either a longer or shorter service. Many of the prayers have been incorporated with a special view to the requirement of evening meetings.

5. The psalms at the back of the book are also arranged in a way to allow a continuous reading covering the whole selection, or they can be used in parts; i.e., one psalm alone can be taken for the responsive reading.

6. The chants, the psalms, and the glorias have been carefully scrutinized by competent Boston choristers, acquainted with Unitarian thought and the congregational needs of Unitarian churches.

THE SOUL'S AWAKENING.

BY EDWARD N. STONE.

May it not be that in the home foretold us,
Amid the joys that for the blest remain,
The veils that here from perfect sense withhold us
Shall all be rent in twain?

That they who here with hearts unmoved could ponder
On Nature's pictures or Art's fair device
Shall there behold with new-born joy and wonder
The scenes of Paradise?

And they who listened here, with eyes undimming,
To music's thrilling notes or poet's lyre,
Shall with unwonted rapture hear the hymning
Of the celestial choir.

For that same Hand, whose kindly touch of healing
Bade the blind see and caused the deaf to hear,
Can make to souls untaught and void of feeling
The Beautiful appear.

IS CRIME INCREASING IN AMERICA?

BY FREDERICK HOWARD WINES.

The question is often put to me as a statistician, "Is crime increasing in the United States relatively to the population?" It is not easy to give an off-hand, categorical reply. Some of the difficulties in the way are pointed out in the present article, and the attention of the intelligent reader who likes to be able to give a reason for his opinions is directed to them; but there are others not here mentioned.

If, as some people seem to think, all that is essential is to open the twenty-first volume of the Tenth Census at page 480, and quote the figures on the top line, which show that the apparent ratio of prisoners to 1,000,000 of the total population in 1850 was 290, but in 1880 it was 1,169, the answer would be as "easy as lying." Many sensational statements have been ignorantly based upon these figures; and the great American public has been warned, in falsetto tones of every conceivable pitch, that "in thirty years crime is shown, by the census, to have increased four times as rapidly as the general population." It is almost, if not quite, a hopeless task to convince the startled listeners to the alarm bell thus rung in the night that some statistical infant is pulling at the rope, and that no attention need be paid to the sound. The methods adopted for the enumeration of the prison population have been so improved that no comparison between the earlier and later figures of the census is possible: the earlier figures have been demonstrated to be utterly untrustworthy.

Let us confine our discussion to the decade from 1880 to 1890, since the statistical method in the last two enumerations was identical, and an argument founded upon them is admissible. During these ten years the number of prisoners increased more rapidly than the population. The number in 1880 was 58,609; in 1890 it was 82,329. (Juvenile delinquents in reformatories for boys and girls are not here included.) The increase in the number of prisoners was at the ratio of 41 per cent., while the rate of increase of population was only 24 per cent.

These numbers should, before proceeding further, be reduced to ratios to one million of the population. The ratio of prisoners to each million of the population of the United States in 1880 was 1,169; but in 1890 it was 1,315, an increase of 146 per million.

In the census the States and Territories are grouped under five general divisions: the North Atlantic, the South Atlantic, the North Central, the South Central, and the Western. The ratios for each of these five divisions, in 1880 and in 1890, are shown in the following table:—

Geographical Divisions.	Ratios to 1,000,000.		Increase.
	1890.	1880.
The United States....	1,315	1,169	146
North Atlantic.....	1,624	1,428	199
South Atlantic.....	1,288	1,043	245
North Central.....	888	862	26
South Central.....	1,466	1,250	216
Western.....	2,221	2,199	22

According to these figures, the increase of prison population is greatest in the South and East, but least in the North and West.

I have made a great effort, but with partial and indifferent success, to teach students of criminal statistics to distinguish clearly in their own minds between statistics of crime and statistics of punishment. Precise inferences as to the amount of crime at a given date or in a given locality, drawn from the number of convicts in prison, are unwarranted. Crime may be unpunished, or it may be punished in other ways than by imprisonment, or it may be more severely punished in one State than in another, if severity is measured by the length of sentence imposed by the criminal courts. Any novice, looking at the table printed immediately above, would say, for instance, that it shows that, while crime is more prevalent in the North Atlantic than in the North Central division, it is nevertheless less prevalent in the South Atlantic than in the South Central division. Before assenting to this conclusion, we must further inquire what is the average length of the term of sentence to imprisonment in each of the five divisions; for, if one State pronounces an average sentence of two years and another of four years, then, with equivalent criminality in both, one should show twice as large a ratio of prisoners to population as the other. Now, the studies made in the Eleventh United States Census show that the average sentence (omitting sentences for life) in the United States is 3.88 years. In the South Central division it is 5.40 years; in the Western, 4.65 years; in the South Atlantic, 4.42 years; in the North Central, 4.04 years; in the North Atlantic, 2.72 years. In order to reduce the table to a uniform basis, therefore, so as to admit of vertical as well as horizontal comparison, the ratios there given should be divided by the average term of sentence in each geographical division. The following result will be obtained:—

Geographical Divisions.	Ratios to 1,000,000.		Increase.
	1890.	1880.
The United States....	339	301	38
North Atlantic.....	597	525	72
South Atlantic.....	291	234	57
North Central.....	290	213	77
South Central.....	271	231	40
Western.....	478	473	5

It is here assumed that the average term of sentence in 1880 was the same as in 1890; and, upon this assumption, the rates given are what they would have been if the average in each division had been one year. Thus corrected, for uniformity, the criminality of the South Central division appears to have been less than that of the South Atlantic instead of greater. It further appears that the greatest increase in crime has not been at the South, but in the North Atlantic division, where, too, we find more than twice as large a ratio of prisoners to the population as in the South or West, except in the extreme West, beyond the Rocky Mountains.

Evidently, the problem becomes more complicated as we proceed. Thus far we have lumped together all prisoners, regardless of the gravity of their offences or the character of the prisons in which they are confined. The law preserves a partially obsolete distinction between felonies and misdemeanors, felonies being punishable by death or by a long term of imprisonment usually served in a penitentiary, but misdemeanors by a short term usually served in a county jail, workhouse, or other minor prison. If, now, we confine our attention to penitentiaries and State prisons, the following are the ratios for 1880 and 1890, in the several geographical divisions:—

Geographical Divisions.	Ratios to 1,000,000.		Increase.	Decrease.
	1890.	1880.
The United States.	722	709	13	—
North Atlantic.....	832	768	64	—
South Atlantic.....	730	704	26	—
North Central.....	491	510	—	19
South Central.....	842	891	—	49
Western.....	1,341	1,268	73	—

The increase in the number of penitentiary convicts per million of the population has been but thirteen, which is absolutely insignificant. If this figure is divided by 5.75, the average penitentiary sentence (in years) in the United States, the increase is but two per million, calculated on the basis of a uniform sentence for one year as above. So far as the prison statistics go, they tend to prove that serious crime, in the country at large, is neither increasing nor decreasing in comparison with the population. It seems to be increasing somewhat in the North Atlantic and Western divisions; but in the North Central (extending from Ohio to Minnesota and Nebraska) and in the South Central (extending from Kentucky to Texas) divisions there has been a relative decrease in the number of felons in prison.

Such increase, therefore, as has taken place must be sought among the misdemeanants,—petty thieves, drunkards, and disorderly persons, not for the most part true criminals. It is shown in the following statement, which relates exclusively to inmates of minor prisons:—

Geographical Divisions.	Ratios to 1,000,000.		Increase.	Decrease.
	1890.	1880.
The United States..	565	443	122	—
North Atlantic.....	758	639	119	—
South Atlantic.....	556	340	216	—
North Central.....	359	327	32	—
South Central.....	619	358	261	—
Western.....	813	855	—	42

The increase per million in petty crime is ten times as great as in serious crime; and the jails, not the penitentiaries, receive the benefit of it. It does not follow, however, from the increase in the jail population that the people of the United States are, in fact, more disorderly than ten years ago: the difference may be due to a more determined effort on the part of the authorities to suppress disorder.

The foregoing statements sufficiently illustrate the intricacy of the problem proposed for solution. It is here stated in its broad outlines only. It requires to be pursued into the States one by one, and examined in its relations to nativity, color, and race. This, in the space allowed for a newspaper article, is impossible.

Among the States which publish imperfect and rather blind judicial statistics is Pennsylvania. Since 1875 the Pennsylvania Board of Public Charities has printed an abstract of the annual returns made by the prothonotaries, or clerks, of criminal courts. One fact returned is the "number of persons charged with crime," which in 1875 was 20,040; but in 1890 it was 19,656, a diminution of 384, while the population of the State had increased during the same period by 1,250,000 or 1,300,000. In other words, in 1875 the number of persons charged with crime, in the criminal courts of Pennsylvania, was 1 in 200, but in 1890 only 1 in 267. This diminution does not appear in the prison statistics. The board reports the prison population of the State, Sept. 30, 1875, to have been 4,666; but on the same day of 1890 it was 5,764, or, if the inmates of the reformatory at Huntingdon are included, it was 6,096. The number of inmates of the two State penitentiaries, at these two dates respectively, was 1,264 and 1,758,—an increase of 39 per cent.; or the increase, if Huntingdon is included with the penitentiaries, as it probably should be, may be said to have been 66 per cent. The increase in the population of the State during the same period was only 31 per cent.

Much more might be said in this connection, but I forbear to tax the reader's patience. My aim is accomplished if the three following impressions have been made upon his memory:—

First. There has been no substantial increase of crime during the ten years from 1880 to 1890.

Second. The prison statistics, taken by themselves, without critical comments and explanations, do not show the true rate of increase or decrease of crime. For that judicial statistics are required, which the Department of Justice at Washington might profitably undertake to collect and publish in an annual report.

Third. A rational, intelligent interest in the prison question is possible, in which there need not be a trace of "sentiment," in the common and offensive sense of that much abused word.

Springfield, Ill.

THE CALHOUN SCHOOL.

BY REV. PITT DILLINGHAM.

Jack Frost "held up" the Southern farmer during February. March is now trying to do February's work. The hill-sides are lighted at night by the burning sedge broom, and farther away the cane is burning in the swamps. One-mule farms are on every side of us; and the single steer, or mule, is making a three-inch scratch in the soil with a "befo' de war" plough. Field hands are violently swinging long sticks to right and left, knocking down and out the thick standing cotton-stalk of last year's crop. Black Belt agriculture in Alabama is where Alabama coal and iron were a generation ago. There has been some "go as you please" surface mining. The State is only beginning to take its rich food deposit seriously. The deep plough and the capital and skilled hand to run it still linger. It is a moment of interest, a moment which gives out patience and hope both. Land and people together are taking the next step in a great unfolding.

In a special sense the Negro of Alabama will either mightily bless or mightily curse her. She must civilize and Christianize him, or he will Africanize her. It would hardly do for me to give the details of the home life, or let us say "one-room cabin life," out of which the majority of our girls and boys come. You would not guess it, however, looking at these same boys and girls as they appear after a two or three years' chance given them. The simple fact is that Calhoun has already established new standards, not only of book learning and of farming, but of morals and religion also: a new meaning has been put into Christianity.

The writer says this the more freely because he has had no hand in working the change: he speaks as an observer, who sees things as they appear after three years of pioneer and foundation work done by Miss Dillingham and Miss Thorn and those who have worked with them. There is an expression on the lips of the colored people about here which tells the story. They do not speak of the times "before the war": changes date from the time "befo' de ladies come."

It is a question whether men could have done this work, could have made such a settlement as this in the friendly feeling as well as on the land of the Lowndes County whites. This is what Calhoun essentially is,—a "settlement" from the North planted in Southern Alabama, a settlement among plantation Negroes—fifteen hundred of them in this "beat," as they call it—and among the neighboring whites said to number, all told, one hundred. The settlement touches more than the town, however. It touches the county with twenty-seven hundred blacks and three hundred whites, and Negro boys and girls are making applications from counties beyond us. In Montgomery it touches the State, and has already a certain footing there with some of the citizens and State officials. It finds a growing welcome and readiness to help on every hand. Let me, then, tell the story of what two women have done in less than three years on these black lands of latitude thirty-one degrees, on a spot familiarly known to some whites not far away as the "devil's half-acre."

With malice toward none and good will for all, these Hampton workers came with a special blessing from Gen. Armstrong, Rev. Dr. Frissell, and Booker T. Washington. On one muddy, cold, and rainy January day in 1892 they read their new proclamation of emancipation in the "barn of a church" near by to the hungry-eyed black people of Calhoun. They avoided pauperizing, as they would have shunned bringing a plague with them. They had the courage to disappoint the people and demand sacrifice, to throw the colored farmers and their wives sharply on their own power of self-help. These young women had come not to patronize and "work for," but to live and work with the people, expecting the treasure of the widow's mite for the new temple of the Lord.

That mite was given,—$500 toward the school-house, later on in the shape of a primary department building; and all the time in entrance fees and tuition, not large, but large enough to demand saving and making sacrifices for the children, such as self-respecting fathers and mothers were used to in the North in pioneer days.

It is true enough that there can never be another "first year" at Calhoun. No more eating and sleeping in "Aunt Bella's" cabin, no more sleeping on the floor and dining off a dry-goods box in the unfinished first teachers' home, no more refusals of milk at the door of the white man's house, no more visits from white men with hats on and free expectorations of tobacco in the presence of "nigger teachers" on whom the poor white women of the neighborhood might not call without "lowering their position," no more half savage girls in the school-room, all taking snuff and "wrapping" their hair in old plantation style, and not knowing how to use a knife and fork or how to eat at a table.

That is to say, a clearing has been made in the forest within a radius of several miles, a haven has been set actively at work, and no succeeding three years can hope perhaps for such very tangible results. To-day any one with eyes to see can see that much has happened, that the Hampton idea with modifications has materialized.

From far away the white buildings draw the eye as to the landmark of this section of the country. All day long you may hear the settlement bell striking the work and study hours, telling of a busy life on the farm and in the workshops and kitchens and class-rooms, from the early rising till taps are sounded and lights are put out at half-past nine.

Two hundred and fifty come and go, boys and girls, young men and young women. Or now it is Wednesday, and fifty or a hundred mothers take off their big, quaint sun-bonnets in the assembly-room, quaver their old field songs, and open their hands wide for counsel. Or it is the first Friday in the month, when the farmers are gathering. Look at these men, talk with them: these are not ashy and worn-out or indifferent and brutalized men, but of good stock, many of them intelligent, and the majority of them in dead earnest to learn. Best of all, they are not here to complain, but to learn how to keep themselves, how to farm, to buy homes, to raise and market crops, how to treat their wives and children better, how to get out of the grip of the crop-mortgage and waive note. They will tell you what Calhoun has meant to them, and that, if it did nothing more than unite the farmers and instruct them in the art of getting a living out of just the soil their feet are muddy with, it would justify itself in their minds.

Or is it the morning of the usual average day, when the boys and girls are arriving on mule-back, two or three on a mule, it may be, the girls dismounting and sloughing by the roadside what proves to be a calico protector? Most of these scholars, however, have no mule to ride; and some have walked more than one miry mile,—yes, some of them left the cabin before "sun up," as they say, after a bite of corn bread spread with molasses, and have come four or five miles.

The roll of the drum by one of our little four-mile heroes brings the school company into line, while the girls form for gymnastics in the assembly-room. How Capt. Wilson licked such material as was given him here into such military shape is something of a mystery; but the young field hands are being "set up," and they are learning to march, and the discipline among them is admirable. There are enough blue school uniforms and brass buttons to help things out; but with the regulars there are plenty of small "minute men," with as great a variety of costume as gathered on Lexington Green in 1775. Some of these boys are shod very much as Washington's men were at Valley Forge.

Shall we enter chapel now the boys have filed in? It is not a prayer by one man, but fifteen minutes of the most genuine school worship,—a short uplift together of mind and soul, heads bowed in a true hush of prayer, and heads lifted in joyful Scripture response and song. Nothing in the whole day is more genuine than this fifteen minutes. It would do you good to hear this singing, so powerful, so sweet and deep-chested, especially the plantation songs, in the singing of which Calhoun is getting famous. Fifteen minutes more given to "practice singing" and to daily news and current events, such as the size and price of the last cotton crop, the meaning of Mardi gras and of Lent, who Gen. Booth is, whether we need a Salvation Army in the South or not. Now the class work of the day starts in.

You may go the rounds, if you will: you will find no show work for visitors. Mark how Calhoun seeks to build from the beginning, and so furnish a model for the public school system of this county. Froebel would rejoice over this little kindergarten. It has the essentials; but this cheerful room, with two open fires, might well have its walls covered with pictures from the North.

To the primary building (built by the colored people themselves) we now go, and from that to the remaining primary room in the larger school-house. The modern emphasis is being put upon primary work. There is nature work and drawing and coloring and singing and story-telling literature for the earliest reading. There is freedom and a happy spirit in the work. There is but one grade after this, grammar school work being done by Juniors and Middlers. There are no Seniors. Next year will see perhaps the proud first class of graduates. Most of these boys and girls and young men and young women did not know how to read or write when they came, three years ago. It will take some of them a long time yet to graduate. The grammar school work matches the primary work, and is thoroughly modern, with trained teachers who have the special inspiration of a growing love for these eager, happy, patient, hopeful, deeply needy, and faulty colored boys and girls. But this is work-day for many of the students. We must leave the class-room. Here, in the course of the day, are to be seen boys hauling and ploughing with the mules, building fences, cutting firewood, shucking the corn, feeding the poultry, currying the horses, milking the cows, digging ditches, laying drain-pipe, or cooking in the students' kitchen. The farm of a hundred acres, with its barn and stock, having a trained practical farmer at the head of it, Mr. Lemon, a graduate of Hampton, of high standing (and with his wife occupying the model cottage),—this is a large part of the Calhoun settlement, its leading industrial feature.

But we must not forget the Industrial Building or the house and dormitory work, where the girls may be found over the wash-tub and the ironing-board and the starch-pail, "hanging out" and "taking in," doing the darning and patching for the small colony of boys, learning how to cut and make their own dresses, how to sweep and make beds and cook, often finding it easier to smile brightly than to step lightly and let their heads save their heels, but bound to win, many of them, in the end.

Calhoun's aim is modest, then, and easily understood,—not to become a great institution, but to be "thorough" on a manageable scale, and, above all, to be a part of the surrounding country community, to keep the social pores open, flow into the life about, and have that life flow into the settlement.

Calhoun has regarded its opportunity from the beginning as essentially a religious opportunity. Its aim is to make all work the kingdom's work, and all days the kingdom's days. Its Sunday work means mission work in the surrounding cabins and churches as well as in its own assembly-room. Wonderfully simple and real is the faith of these colored people. From the beginning there has been close connection with the leading church of the community, on the hill to the west of us, three-quarters of a mile away. Its minister is one of our trustees, and the present acting principal of Calhoun finds himself asked to preach half the time in this Baptist church. I cannot speak for the summer revival season, but during the winter you see nothing of the old African frenzy as a substitute for Christianity. The minister will bear witness to the help given by this settlement to this church, severely criticising at times, and yet keeping in sympathy. Mr. Jones himself is a very valuable man for us, a staunch friend of the school from the beginning. His church represents a strategic point of the greatest value on this battlefield with the country gambling hell and dance-hall, cabin debauch, and all forms of vice. For instance, some weeks ago we found gambling was growing bold and closing in on us. We went straight to the colored constable reputed to be the chief gambler in the gang, asked for his support in suppressing the evil. True to his promise, our friend appeared at church the next Sunday,—a place in which he had not appeared for a long time. He listened to an appeal to the people on the gambling and dance-hall question, then rose in church, and offered to do his duty, if men could be found to back him, so he would not simply get shot or knocked out. Every man in church stood up and offered help, and we have reason to believe that effective work has been done for the time being. This is cited simply as illustrating the way in which school and church try to pull together.

Communion was held last Sunday. In place of the paper-bag of crackers and a brown jug or whiskey bottle for the communion wine, as formerly, we found a plain but beautiful, silver-plated service, tankard and cups and bread-plates, given to the church by a friend of the Calhoun school. To be sure, the minister turned the bread on to the table, and put the cups into the bread-plates when he sent them round; but that is a matter which can be easily remedied next time. The simple, homely pathos of that hour of communion cannot be described,—its affectionateness, its tears and songs and prayers, its quavering of "Jacob's Ladder," an old plantation song,—

"I'm climbing, climbing, climbing, a soldier of the cross."

Some of us understand better now what that primitive breaking of bread was in the first century, when Paul said, "We have not many rich, nor many powerful."

And now abruptly let me take my leave, simply saying this. I leave these facts to speak for themselves to the old friends and the new friends of Calhoun, and I make the following plain statement as to the present needs of this settlement. The considerable sum of $5,000 has to be raised within the next three months. This means that extensive and necessary additions to the plant were made at the beginning of this year. It means, also, the new scale of running expenses, with our new household,—forty-two work and boarding students (just enough to run farm and household and Industrial Building and make the needed special nucleus of leaven for school and community), also the twelve teachers who take care of three hundred scholars (cut down this year, as at Hampton, by the hard times). It means, also, that Miss Dillingham and Miss Thorn were both taken away, as the friends of the school so well know, one by death and the other by severe illness, at the hour when they were specially needed for supervision and for writing the usual letters of appeal for money.

Few institutions have been so easily and generously supported as Calhoun. It has the happy and proud record of always beginning its fiscal year in June without debt and with a handsome balance on the right side. It confidently expects to do the same this year. For has it not the same old friends, and can it fail to make new ones? And has it not been abundantly assured that in this year of very painful and special emergency the old friends would gladly make sacrifices to carry on what has, as they feel, been so wisely and devotedly begun; that Miss Dillingham may not have died in vain, and that Miss Thorn may be cheered and cured for another year's work by having all anxiety as to means removed?

Heavy as was the blow dealt Calhoun, yet, as on all other battlefields, the ranks had simply to be closed up; and the column has gone forward, and the flag has never for a moment been out of the hands of a color-bearer, and all this to the expressed satisfaction, so far, of the trustees and of authoritative friends at Hampton and Tuskegee, Dr. Frissell and Booker Washington in particular. We say this, that friends may be assured that the position here is held, and that there is no thought of giving up, or of doing anything but building on the foundations laid, cemented now with what has ever proved to be the seed of the Church.

Miss Dillingham and Miss Thorn would add what I have not said, "We could have done little but for the help of others,—the trustees, the teachers, the bountiful givers in the North, the loyal students, and fathers and mothers and friendly whites here in the South."

This, then, is a special appeal in this year of special and very grave trial. We confidently leave it to speak for itself in these Lenten days. Fortunately, just now the spasm of business and social life relaxes, and many good things get a leisurely patient and generous hearing. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Richard P. Halliwell, 556 Atlantic Avenue, Boston, or Rev. Pitt Dillingham, Calhoun, Ala.

MY INTERVIEWER.

BY REV. SILAS FARRINGTON.

My interviewer was a dapper little chap. His air was self-satisfied. He drew the skin of kids from his flexible and effeminate hands, as he threw himself into the great chair opposite me. A very long, newest-cut surtout, quite touching his exquisite gaiters, buttoned him up most beautifully. His silver-mounted cane he laid beside the low-crowned silk stove-pipe that just now had surmounted his locks of golden flax. Altogether, his style was distinguished. When the maid announced him, but for his fewer years, I might have mistaken him for the Marquis of Lorne, or some other scion "of them as is above us," attached by matrimonial cement to royalty. But he seated himself, and for half an hour or so the conversational stream flowed glibly along. The scenery on either bank was much as follows:—

"You are Rev. ———?"

"My name is ———."

"You don't care for the 'Reverend'?"

"Not a bit."

"You are an American?"

"I was born there. In that sense I am."

"Now I suppose your citizenship is English. You have taken the oath of allegiance to Her Imperial Majesty?"

"You are entirely mistaken. An Englishman going to America swears himself out of his country because he believes he has found a better. But an American cannot return the compliment. He has found an older, but not a better."

"Then you don't like England?"

"Have I said that? You must not jump at conclusions. A man may like a country without desiring to forswear the greater and hopefuller whence he came. There is an England which thousands of Englishmen themselves cannot like, and another England, still an ideal, which both they and an American must like; and it is most interesting to see this new England rising to grapple with and, let us hope, cast out the old."

"You have lived over here some time, I am told."

"About a third of my days,—not quite."

"Your age?"

"Still young,—always young for liberty."

"Ah! you are classical, I see. I am not up in the literature of Greece and Rome; but that was Cæsar's saying, was it not?"

"More probably, Channing's!"

"Channing? Let me see: he was a relative of Channing, M.P., a leader in the Socinian heresy. You yourself are a Unitarian, I am told? Of course, you will not call me a prig if I ask you why you choose to belong to so small and obscure a sect?"

"I do not belong to any small or obscure sect. I am a catholic, belong to the Universal Church, which always and everywhere has believed in God, and nowhere, save in idolatrous and corrupting moods, has had any other god, or gods, before him or with him or in him."

"But you are the minister of the Unitarian church here?"

"I am the minister of the Free Church here, as you may see by this calendar."

"Then you are not a Unitarian. I have very great respect for Unitarians. I think I should be one if religion were my line. But I have taken up journalism. One can't be everything, can he?"

"I don't see why journalism should have switched you off the religious line. You dress your flesh remarkably well. Does that prevent your clothing your spirit with an equal attention?"

"Ah, yes! you have me there. One must dress, in order to live. It pays. You see, I call upon all persons of standing and repute."

"Even those who have the bad repute of belonging to a small and obscure sect! Well, even such might prefer a religious to a well-dressed interviewer. I am glad, however, that you are free from cant. That is a sign of grace. It is, so far as it goes, a good thing, when a man is not religious, that he can frankly say so. Still, it requires a man of some religious culture to intelligently listen to and understand one whose line is religion."

"Oh, certainly, I know something of religion. My mother was religious, very. She used to pray a heap. She went to early services, to late services, to no end of services. She was determined to save her soul. I hope she did. But, somehow, I never took to that sort of thing. I rather object to it. I don't go to services. I have been here for two years, and have been in a church just once. Religion is not my line. But I have a high idea of Unitarians,—a very high idea. They have brains. I appreciate brains. I am rather given to them myself. The intellect, I need not say to you, of course, is a great thing. No man can be a journalist without intellect. But—did I understand that you object to be written up as a Unitarian?"

"That depends upon what the intellect of the journalist means by the term. If he means by a Unitarian one who belongs 'to a small and obscure sect,' who is bound and restricted in his sympathies by its wisdom and prudence, its phrases and usages,—if you mean that, I do object. A man—especially a man who would be a religious man—must hold himself free to follow and to adopt whatever is true and good, whatever makes for human truth and goodness, wherever manifest. You say that Unitarians have brains. I have known persons, who were nothing if they were not Unitarians, who could not be justly accused of having brains. They had objections, phrases, unorthodoxies, prejudices, traditions from their elders. They did, in the most literal sense, belong to the 'ism.'"

"Would you take such into your Free Church?"

"Oh, lots of them! A free church is for their salvation, though not for theirs only. People are not to be despised because they lack brains, any more than they are to be fellowshiped because they are credulous. A Unitarian prejudice, narrowness, cant, or bondage to a sect, is more odious than any other, because the Unitarian professes to have put away such things and to stand large and manfully in the glorious liberty."

"But I suppose most of your congregation come of the old Socinian stock, revere a Unitarian ancestry."

"Very few of them. On the contrary, not more than four or five could be called 'cut and dried' Unitarians. One was baptized into the Church of Rome. Another was a Voyseyite. Some are still Churchmen, longing for the time when the things they now hear may be preached from the church pulpits, waiting for the day when the Church shall be delivered from its bondage to tradition. Some were Baptists, some Scotch Presbyterians. Others are disciples merely, seekers after more light, feeling their way, if haply they may find it, out of agnosticism. They come from all compass points to sit down together in a free church. If they get good, we are glad. If they give good, we are grateful."

"What you say interests me. It is a little strange, though. Would you mind telling me if you disbelieve in the blessed, glorious, and adorable Trinity, if you deny that there are three persons in one God?"

"My religion does not consist in disbeliefs and denials. If you want to know how many persons I think there are in one God, I can quickly tell you. I believe that all persons are in one God,—live, move, and have their whole mortal and immortal experience in him. I have another belief like unto it. I believe that God, very God of very God, is in all persons, though they may be, for the time, unaware and unconscious of him."

"You don't believe in Christ, then?"

"Not in the imaginary Christ, not in the Christ of the creeds, not in the Christ invented by schemers and system-manufacturers. But in the real Christ, the Christ of the first three Gospels, I do most heartily believe. He, you know, was a man with nature like yours and mine, felt temptation, had doubts and difficulties, knew that God's thoughts and ways were often too great and deep and wise for him. His name was Jesus. In his perfect trust, sweetness, beauty, tenderness, and loving kindness to all, I believe. He is the Christ I preach, in the faith that God who so manifestly dwelt in him may as manifestly appear, in all his divine sweetness and beauty and goodness, in us; that we, who are also the offspring of the Eternal Goodness, may rise to be 'such men,' such Christs 'as he.'"

"Did you ever know such a man as he?"

"I have never known one living in Judea, or under his peculiar circumstances, or with an intervening distance that permits only an ideal picture in the mind; but I have known men and women who, compassed about with human infirmities, yet did live and die in his spirit,—were, in the most real sense, such persons as he. They also were Christs,—sons and daughters of God."

"These persons you speak of, I suppose, are dead,—persons you have admired or loved and idealized a little now that they are gone. Do you know any such in London to-day,—such men as Jesus, as unselfish, with religion as much their line, laying down their life for their friends, loving their enemies? Come, if you do, I should like to interview them!"

"There are persons now living in London who are quite as truly Christ as Jesus was, quite as really born of God, quite as clearly revealing the power and glory of the Most High as he did. It would not be impossible to find such, even in the 'small and obscure' sect of the Socinians, which you imagined had enslaved and completely possessed me. But I can point you to a much larger and more prominent Christian sect in which you will find such individuals,—men and women who may not have brains enough for either journalism or Unitarianism, but who are actually laying down their lives for their friends, not their rich and respectable friends, not their good and reputable friends, but their bad, vile, deceitful, degraded ones, such as are practically their enemies. You will find not one or two of such persons, but many, among the Salvationists. I believe you might find them in the Church of England or of Rome; but I know that there are 'such men as he' in the Salvation Army. Of course, it does not follow that because a man is a worker in that army he is either Christ or Christ-like. Satan is ever in the company of the sons of God."

"You believe in Satan, then?"

"Yes: he is a man who lives in and by his wits. He is a clever fellow. He usually lives like a gentleman, but only like one. He has brains."

"Are you satirical?"

"Not in the least. That is a fact in natural history. I am merely scientific."

"You are going to build a new church, I am told. Anything peculiar about it?"

"No: nothing in particular. There is the picture of it. Perhaps that tower on this side will be known as the American tower. I hope so. I have a bold friend—a journalist, by the way—who has suggested that my American friends should love me in some such substantial way. They can thus feed two birds, not with one stone, but with a single offering of goodwill. They can express whatever appreciation they have of a passing individual, and aid in building up the catholic faith. I have no doubt that next May or June you will be glad to report proceedings when some well-known American brother lays the corner-stone of that tower. But I must now say good-day, as I have an engagement in a few minutes."

"Good-day, sir. I think I shall not report this interview until after some Sunday I come to one of your services. Good-day."

Then the dapper man of brains bowed, and was gone.

PUNISHMENT OF CHILDREN.

The abuse of punishment is more dangerous than the greatest indulgence. At the present day we have outgrown the harsh methods of the past. Corporal punishment is almost entirely excluded from our schools. The arguments in favor of it were ingenious, but not convincing. The hurt occasioned by corporal punishment is not to the mind. It is, after all, the mind that is struck. But this is not all. In appealing to the mind, we treat the child as a rational creature. This is a claim of the child which we cannot ignore. Corporal punishment is one-sided. Besides, corporal punishment, as Herbert Spencer has shown, is associated with man in the childhood of the world. It is the savage, who has not patience to reason or explain, who strikes. Corporal punishment can seldom be administered without passion. When we show excitement, we give signs of weakness.

Then the young boy or girl becomes conscious of power over us. This is a temptation to youth. The danger of corporal punishment, therefore, is that we can seldom administer it without losing our head. On the other hand, we cannot appeal to the reason without becoming more reasonable.

Besides corporal punishment, there are other punishments which are not justifiable. To shut up a child in a dark room is to spur its imagination into wild fancies. Darkness is a bad companion. It will contract and terrify the child. Denying children the necessary amount of sleep or food, exposing them to the inclemency of the weather, withholding from them for too long a time the tokens of affection, treating them as strangers or as enemies, or ignoring them altogether,—these are measures which do more harm than good. Punishment should be of such a nature that, if necessary, the parents can share it with the children. The child must know that it cannot suffer alone physically, much less morally. Its suffering brings suffering to others. This is the lesson which will develop the social element in the child. In the second place, we must correct the faults of the child by its virtues; that is to say, the strong qualities of the mind must spur the weak faculties into play. If a child is physically strong, but morally weak, let the parent hold up to view the two sides of its nature, until the physically strong child shall be ashamed of its moral cowardice. Let the child look into the mirror and see first the robust, healthy, powerfully built frame: let it look again into the mirror, and see the small, selfish soul. To make the higher nature shrink from the lower nature and feel uncomfortable in its presence; to make the discipline self-administrative, the fault self-corrective,—this is the economic principle in education.—International Journal of Ethics.

NORTH END UNION'S LARGER FIELD.

The North End Union made important changes and increased its facilities last summer at a cost of nearly thirteen thousand dollars. The directors were enabled to provide for $9,000 of this amount, and took upon themselves the obligation to raise the balance. These changes were necessary to the work, which is moral, educational, and industrial, and is entirely unsectarian in character. The union has ten paid workers and nearly seventy volunteers at present engaged in its various lines of work. This debt of $3,500 stands in the way of the full prosperity of its work. It cripples plans, dampens enthusiasm, and retards development. It hopefully appeals to the public to liberate this enterprise from its chief hindrance. The directors desire to acknowledge with sincere thanks the following contributions:—

Spiritual Life.

Give free and bold play to those instincts of the heart which believe that the Creator must care for the creatures he has made, and that the only real effective care for them must be that which takes each of them into his love, and, knowing it separately, surrounds it with his separate sympathy.—Phillips Brooks.

Human progress, to be secure, must retain the full recognition of the dignified quality of our nature and of our close relation with the supreme Source of all life and force. Underlying all that we do for mankind, there must be a noble conception of manhood, or the work cannot be of an elevated and inspiring strain.—Joseph May.

I do not think we have any right to think of a heaven for others, much less of a heaven for ourselves, in the world to come, until we are wholly determined to make this world a heaven for our fellow-men, and are hoping, believing, loving, and working for that, and for its realization,—not in a thousand or a million years, but in a nearer and a nearer future.—Stopford A. Brooke.

My idea of the Christian religion is that it is an inspiration and its vital consequences,—an inspiration and a life, God's life breathed into a man and breathed through a man, the highest inspiration and the highest life of every soul which it inhabits; and, furthermore, that the soul which it inhabits can have no high issue which is not essentially religious.—J. G. Holland.

Words are inadequate to paint the evil results that have come to religion and the world from the deification of Jesus. It was this that brought into the Christian Church the reign of creeds and dogmas which for so many centuries has blighted Christianity, and which, alas! is far from over yet. So long as Jesus remained a man, the aim of his followers was to love him and follow him in deeds of helpfulness and mercy. When he became a god, all minds turned to the task of framing right theories about him; and woe to any who dared to think differently from the opinion of the majority! Thus Christianity became changed from love to belief, from conduct to speculation, from a life to a theology.—J. T. Sunderland.

The Sunday School.

The Unitarian Sunday School Society published no new Easter service this year; but the demand for reprints of 1891, 1893, and 1894, is quite large. It shows that these past services contained features of merit. The New Song and Service Book will include considerable music from these special services.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, March 30. Subject, Lesson XXVII., "Jesus and Zaccheus." Primary at 2 p.m., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

Teachers often need a book which contains biographies, anecdotes, and illustrations capable of being used with different manuals. Such a book is issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, entitled "Noble Lives and Noble Deeds," containing forty biographies, lesson texts, and suggestions, enforcing forty distinct traits of character. Bound in cloth. Price, 40 cents single copy, sent by mail, postage prepaid, or $4 per dozen.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

THE regular monthly meeting of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, April 4, at twelve o'clock.

THE regular monthly meeting of the Suffolk Branches of the Women's National Alliance will be held at 25 Beacon Street on Monday, April 1, at eleven o'clock. Officers of other Branches are invited to be present.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Alfred Gooding will preach March 31. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Rev. John Cuckson will conduct the half-hour noon service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, April 3, at twelve o'clock. All are cordially invited.

Ministers' Monday Club: April 1, 10.30 A.M. Rev. B. J. McDaniel will preside. Rev. Charles F. Dole will give the address, on "The Civil Church."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Popular Sunday evening service, March 31, at 7.30. Speaker, Rev. Minot J. Savage. Subject, "The Wise Use of our Spare Time." Music furnished by the "Rossini Male Quartette." All seats free.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon at 3.15; evening at 8, when Rev. C. R. Eliot will preach upon "The Message of the Unitarian Church to the World of To-day." Monday evening, debate at 7.45, upon the following subject: "Is the Tendency toward Collectivism (Socialism) in City Administration to be encouraged?" All are cordially invited.

ALBANY, N.Y.—Last week on Thursday and Friday evenings two very successful and impressive platform meetings were held in Jermain Hall in Albany, N.Y., for the purpose of initiating in that city a movement for organizing a new Unitarian church. There were large audiences of representative citizens at both meetings, and much enthusiasm and interest were manifested. The following is the programme of the meetings. Thursday evening: "Introductory Address," Rev. D. W. Morehouse of New York; "The Religious Situation To-day," Rev. Thomas R. Slicer of Buffalo; "The Reconstructive Movement in Religious Thought that is needed To-day, and How Unitarianism supplies this Need," Rev. S. R. Calthrop of Syracuse; "The Duty of the Hour for All Liberals in Religion," Rev. Minot J. Savage of Boston; Friday evening: "The Unitarian Affirmation about God," Rev. Charles F. Dole of Boston; "The Unitarian Affirmation about Jesus," Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass.; "The Unitarian Affirmation about the Bible," Rev. S. R. Calthrop; "The Unitarian Affirmation about Salvation," Rev. T. R. Slicer; "The Affirmation of the True Basis of Christian Union," Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D., of Boston. The fact that the speakers were among the best known in the denomination added largely to the interest of the occasion. The addresses were all clear, strong, eloquent, and effective. The appreciative applause that greeted every telling point was evidence that those present were in hearty sympathy with the thoughts presented to them. This was noticeably so in the address of Rev. Minot J. Savage, which he summed up by saying, "If you wish to be loyal to God and Man, then you must be loyal to your highest thoughts about God and Man." The field for this undertaking has been carefully looked over and worked up by Rev. D. W. Morehouse, superintendent for the American Unitarian Association in the Middle States and Canada. Rev. William M. Brundage, Ph.D., of Albany, who has lately entered the Unitarian fellowship from the Methodist Church, is to have charge of the movement from this time on. Another correspondent gives an account of the first service.

Rev. W. M. Brundage of Albany, until recently a Methodist minister, preached his first sermon in the Leland Opera House last Sunday afternoon. At the conclusion of the religious services a meeting in the interest of the Unitarian church which is in course of organization was held, and a committee appointed to attend to the preliminary matters of organization. The Argus says: "The auditorium of the Leland was crowded with a representative gathering of citizens. A noticeable feature of the audience was the remarkably large proportion of young men. Many who are members of Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of which Dr. Brundage was the pastor before leaving the Methodist Church, were present; and among them was a large number who remained after the sermon was delivered, and assured Dr. Brundage of their loyalty, not only to him, but to the cause he now represents. The subject of the sermon was 'The Programme of the New Church.' Dr. Brundage extended an invitation to all interested in the organization of the new church to remain, and nearly one-half of the audience accepted. He said that Dr. Morehouse, the administrative officer of the Middle States Conference of the Unitarian Church, was directing the organization of the congregation, and that the American Unitarian Association had pledged its support to the new church. It had voted a certain amount of money for the organization, and had assumed the financial responsibilities for all that had been done and all that would be done until the church was organized. The speaker said that a Des Moines, Ia., congregation had extended a call, but that he had not accepted it, and preferred to remain in Albany. 'The new church is not an experiment,' he said. 'It is a matter to be decided later whether or not I will be your pastor; but, if you want me, I will stay, even if no more than a dozen stay with me.' This statement aroused the audience, and they applauded heartily. He announced that Dr. Morehouse had requested that the following be selected as a provisional committee: Rev. William M. Brundage, Willard Bellows, W. F. Winship, Charles T. Shepard, F. F. Wheeler, and George F. Bowerman. The committee was selected, and will proceed with its work this week. The First Unitarian Society of the city of Albany has been dead or sleeping for twenty years, but it held some property. Lawyers are looking into the status of the organization; and it is possible that the new church will not be a new organization, but merely a continuation of the old one.

ARLINGTON, MASS.—The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet with Rev. F. Gill at Arlington on Monday, April 1. Collation at one o'clock, at No. 30 Pleasant Street. Essay at 2 p.m. Train leaves Union Station at 12.30. Hilary Bygrave, Scribe.

BURLINGTON, VT.—At the annual meeting of the First Congregational (Unitarian) Society the finances were reported to be in a good, substantial state, and the society as harmonious and increasing. The report of the pastor, Rev. J. H. Metcalf, showed that thirty-five new families had come into the church and Sunday-school during the year. A legacy of $1,000 from Miss Ingersoll is to provide a yearly income for books for the parish library, which her father founded.

DORCHESTER, MASS.—Christ Church: The installation of Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge as pastor of Christ Church, Dorchester, will occur Wednesday evening, April 3. Addresses will be made by Rev. Charles G. Ames and Rev. Walter F. Greenman of Fitchburg. Rev. Eugene R. Shippen will give the welcome to Dorchester, and Rev. Walter E. C. Smith of St. Mary's Episcopal Church will extend the fellowship of other denominations. Rev. George H. Hosmer, Rev. F. B. Mott, and Mr. Edwin T. Horne will also take part in the service. The church is situated at the corner of Dorchester Avenue and Dix Street. The Milton electric cars, which leave the corner of Summer and Hawley Streets, Boston, every ten minutes, pass the door. Service at 7.45.

NEWPORT, R.I.—At the Channing Memorial Church Rev. George W. Cutter has just completed a most successful course of Sunday evening lectures to young people, which have awakened a general interest and have drawn large numbers from without the church. The topics chosen dealt directly with the practical duties of every-day life, the demands of our time, and the graver problems of domestic and social welfare. Among these may be mentioned "Turning-points in Life," "What is Good Society?" "What do I owe to the World?" "Woman's Sphere," "Personal Economics," "Moral Courage," and "The Law of Consequences." The large and prosperous Unity Club has accomplished some solid and satisfactory work this season. Two courses of study have been pursued simultaneously: (1) "The Founders and Leaders in the Italian Renaissance,—Dante, Lorenzo the Magnificent, Leo X., Michel Angelo, Machiavelli, Galileo, and Savonarola"; (2) "Civics and Good Citizenship." The club will soon have to limit its membership, owing to the fact that the parlors of the parish house will not comfortably accommodate more persons.

ORANGE, N.J.—The annual meeting of the First Unitarian Church was held Monday evening, March 18. Reports were read by the clerk and treasurer of the church, by the secretaries of the Orange Branch of the National Alliance and the Friendly Society, by the president of the Unity Club, and by the minister for the church in general and the Sunday-school. The treasurer's report showed the church in sound financial condition, with all bills of the year paid, and the amount due this summer on the loan from the Church Building Loan Fund already in hand. There are now fifty families actively connected with the church, numbering in all one hundred and seventy persons.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—On invitation of the Unitarian Club Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago delivered an address, March 14, on "The Use of a Church." At the regular meeting of the club on March 21 Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of Brooklyn spoke on "The Organization of Liberalism." He said in part: "The persons who move the world are those who not only clearly and firmly believe in certain principles and truths, but have also the will and the vigor to act upon their belief and to endeavor to get them adopted and acted upon by other people. We Unitarians have been ready to stand up for our convictions when challenged, but the work and sacrifices involved in making our principles known to the world have not been to our taste. The work done in retirement by our scholars has been fruitful, but our men of action have not been the equals of our men of thought. In natural reaction from the noisy and superficial proselyting of the sects we have withdrawn into the closet, and hoarded our precious treasures in a self-satisfied security. I believe not only in a Unitarian spirit, but also in a Unitarian body. A disembodied soul, even with all its divine possibilities, is not a fit agency for the work of this world. I believe in Unitarianism as a widening movement of emancipated thought, and no less as an organization of divine life. We need conviction, construction, and concentration. By conviction I mean not merely intellectual conclusions, but truths that are shot through with emotion, conclusions that have warmth and glow to them. We have gained the victory of the broad church: we have yet to prove that a broad church can also be a deep church,—a church of the spirit that searches the deep things of God. We have avoided the perils of the hard, dogmatic church; but are we not in danger of becoming a soft church, without vertebrated thought or ethics? A languid reliance upon the general good tendency of things is not a religion: it is only a mush of sentiment. If we are to reach the level of our opportunity, we must build upon the rock of our obligations. If we can harness ourselves to a definite purpose, simply stated, preach a constructive gospel, and concentrate our energies, then 'the light of the moon shall become as the light of the sun.'

President Harned thought it significant that such an address should be delivered in a church whose beloved pastor emeritus had always declined to unite with the American Unitarian Association or the National Conference, though he had addressed the latter and the church had always contributed to the former. Rev. W. I. Nichols was heartily in accord with the views expressed, but was at a loss to understand the apathy with which so many intelligent, good people regard, not only liberal views of religion, but reform movements of all kinds. Rev. J. C. Hodgins thought one reason why Unitarianism makes slow progress is the little interest taken by the laity in the work of the church. He suggested that it might attract strangers to have one of our city churches open on Sunday evenings, the service to be conducted by the several ministers, with perhaps some outside assistance. This suggestion was heartily seconded by members of the First Church. Mr. Nichols recognized the fact that there was an element of weakness in engaging in public work outside the church, but thought there was also an element of strength. Mr. Eliot replied that such was undoubtedly the case, but such outside work should be subordinated to the special work of the church. He believed that we have so cheated ourselves with the idea that we are the Church of the heaven that we have neglected to do anything about making a loaf. President Harned thought that spiritual progress depends largely upon material progress, and feared that Unitarians were not entitled to be considered liberal givers in proportion to their means. He returned the thanks of the club to Mr. Eliot, and declared the meeting adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D.C.—We have two Unitarian churches here, All Souls' Church and the People's Church,—Rev. Rush R. Shippen, pastor of the former, and Rev. Alexander Kent, pastor of the latter, and formerly of the Universalist Church. Mr. Shippen's church is doing good work this winter,—the Sunday service at All Souls', Sunday-school and Bible class at 9.45 A.M., morning worship at 11 A.M., young people's meeting at 6.30 P.M., and vesper service at 7.30 P.M. These are all well attended. There are connected with the church the Parish Union, that meets nearly every Wednesday evening; the Twentieth Century Club, that meets once a month; and Lend a Hand Club, that meets once a month. The Charity Committee of the Parish Union is the working committee of the church. It is conducting a free kindergarten numbering twenty children, in charge of Miss Grace M. Hill, a member of the Lend a Hand Club. The committee has in charge an evening boys' club of about a hundred boys, ranging from ten to eighteen years and divided into two sets, seniors and juniors, meeting at alternate nights. Another free kindergarten is sustained by the ladies in general of the church. It is in the lower part of the city (might be called the slums), and in charge of Miss N. D. Moote. In a report of its five years' existence read to the Twentieth Century Club the writer said that the class had made such marked progress that there were inducements made that, if Congress should authorize kindergartens in the schools, this class would be the first to be accepted. The meetings of the Parish Union are held for social and literary purposes. At the socials one of the several committees hold forth. Last Wednesday evening the Committee on Art entertained the union and its friends, after which the Committee on Hospitality served those present with hot coffee, sandwiches, and cake. These meetings give opportunity for the members of the church and their friends to become better acquainted, and allow strangers here to spend a pleasant evening.

WILMINGTON, DEL.—Rev. A. D. Mayo, who is connected with the Department of Education at Washington, came to this city last Monday upon invitation of the Educational Committee of the New Century Club, and that evening spoke in the opera house upon the proposed compulsory education bill which the ladies of the club are endeavoring to have passed by the General Assembly of Delaware. On Wednesday Mr. Mayo addressed five hundred scholars in the high school. The next day he spoke to six hundred pupils in another school, making two addresses,—one to the boys, and another to the girls. He spoke on Friday last to the pupils of the Friends' School, and also made an address in the meeting-house. On Sunday morning, March 17, he spoke in the morning in the Unitarian church, taking his text from James iii. 5, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." The church was well filled, and the remarks of Mr. Mayo made a marked impression upon his hearers. He told how, when quite a small boy, his father had taught him to build a fire by putting the little sticks underneath. The lesson then learned had been of great value to him in his later work; and he felt the necessity for beginning all of his work, and the work which he is doing for the government, with the children. It was necessary, he held, that the children should be educated in the Church and in the State, in order that the republic should be maintained as a republic. In the evening he occupied the pulpit of Grace (Methodist Episcopal) Church, and spoke at length upon the subject of "Upper Story Work for American Girls." When he was introduced by the pastor of the church, Rev. Merritt Hulburd, whom he had known personally in Springfield, Mass., many years ago, Mr. Hulburd referred to the feeling of "inter-denominational amity" which had existed in Springfield when he lived there. Mr. Mayo, while in this city, was the guest of Rev. Alexander T. Bowser, pastor of the First Unitarian Church. Dr. Mayo left for Washington to-day. He had not visited Delaware before for twenty years. He was much pleased with his visit, and during his stay here he did some effective work in the cause of a more thorough education of the young.

WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—The league held a largely attended meeting on Wednesday, March 20, at the Church of the Unity, Worcester. After the opening exercises a short business meeting was held. A collection was taken, $1 of which was voted to be sent to Mrs. Sarah Pratt Carr, $1 to the Mozoomdar Mission Fund, and the rest to be held for another object. The subject of the day was "Sincerity and Conventionality"; and after news from the Cheerful Letter Exchange the first paper, by Mrs. Emma E. Foster, on the general subject of "Morals," was given. She quoted from Herbert Spencer and other great thinkers, first as to what is "right," and then considered our obligation to do it. After the luncheon hour two more papers were read. "Can we practise Absolute Sincerity in our Formal Social Relations?" was the subject of one, written by Mrs. Nathaniel Seaver of Millbury, at the close of which Miss May Leicester of Boston gave some ideas of Mrs. Henry Whiteland on courtesy, kindness, and sincerity. The last paper, by Mrs. William H. Coe, on "May we ever sacrifice Truth to Love?" was a most earnest plea for the truth, and only the truth, on all occasions. Over two hundred women were present; and many, by anecdote or remarks, added to the interest of the meeting.

Style in Cabinet-work.—The factor which decides the style and character of a piece of furniture is the proportion of its different dimensions. Increased height on a small base is sometimes one of the most effective methods of imparting style and "go" to an inexpensive production. This is well illustrated by a cut in another column of a high settle designed and offered for sale by the Paine Furniture Company. On an actual floor area of only about two feet by two feet five inches, it has a height of about seven feet. It combines every convenience, and is a remarkably successful piece of furniture.

SARAH BEECHER GUTEAU.

The Unitarian church of Trenton, N.Y., has recently been bereft of one of its oldest and most influential members. Everybody who knew Trenton knew Sarah Beecher Guiteau, a Unitarian by instinct, by education, by association, and by deep-seated affection, whose faith was not simply a theory reasoned out and accepted by the intellect, but a vital force in her daily life, which manifested itself in personal devoutness, in an unyielding fidelity to the interests of a rational gospel, and in a constant self-giving for the church she loved. Her husband was the dearly beloved physician, Dr. Luther Guiteau; and for many years their hospitable home was the resort of men and women in any station and circumstance in life,—the cultured, who went to give and receive intellectual stimulus; the dejected and sad, who went for comfort; the poor, who were never turned empty-handed away; and the spiritually-minded, who journeyed there as to a sacred shrine. After the death of Dr. Guiteau his venerable widow gave herself even more unselfishly, if possible, to the ministrations of good. Though frail in appearance, she was a marvel in physical endurance, being seldom kept away from her seat in the sanctuary on Sunday morning by inclement weather, even after she had successfully passed her eightieth birthday. She was everybody's friend,—one to whom the young looked for counsel and the old for sympathy, one who took the burdens of her friends upon her shoulders, and bore them with tender grace, and who wanted no greater happiness in life than to love and be loved. Her last illness was of brief duration, and the end peaceful and serene. She had often wished it could be so. On the evening of March 5 she quietly gave her hand to some invisible guide, and entered upon the conditions of the hereafter. Though her visible form has vanished, she yet speaketh in her works. She was not one who could pass away and be speedily forgotten. Many individuals do nothing worthy of remembrance. We do not miss them when they are gone, simply because they do not touch our lives while they live at any vital point. They are the same as buried even when they walk the earth. Life means nothing to them beyond getting through with it as soon as possible; and, when they are dead, if we think of them at all, we only think to wonder why they ever lived. Mrs. Guiteau was not one of these. Her womanhood was historic. She lived to act, and acted with such will, wisdom, and energy that her individualism impressed itself upon permanent thought. She sought to hold broad and unbiased views of men and things, to recognize the advantages of an unblemished character over mere profession, and to lean, not on wrath, but on love. Reverently we speak her name, tenderly we recall her efforts and her achievements, and gratefully we cherish her example as an incentive to holier and happier things. E. T. T.

THE POET AND THE SOLDIER.

A poet's pipe lay lost within the wood,
And dryads came and played about its mouth.
Enamoured breezes from the fragrant south
Found all its sweetness. Then the dryads stood
To hear new music pour its gracious wine
Beneath a bower of rose and eglantine.

A hero's sword lay gleaming on cold ground,
Dry drops of blood were brown on edge and sheath;
And near the blade a ruined laurel wreath
Lay rotting on a moss-grown burial mound.
Beside them, robed in garments for the tomb,
Sat a lone maiden with a passion-bloom.

Then wild and brazen throats of righteous war
Shivered the morning stillness with their cry;
And, where the truth paused tremblingly to die,
At that last stand a poet from afar
Filled the lost pipe with music, while a youth, Laurelled and brave, waved the bare sword of Truth.

O poet-soldiers, ye who sing and fight!
Or pipe or sword was never lost in vain.
New armies form. Retreating o'er Time's plain,
Beside your graves they stand at last for Right;
And none may say if poet's pipe or sword
Win the best triumphs grateful years record.

OUR ALLEGIANCE TO GOD.

BY WILLIAM EVERETT, LL.D.

Beware lest thou forget the Lord, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him."—DEUT. vi. 12, 13.

Sunday, the seventeenth day of March, is a memorable anniversary in the history of Boston. On Sunday, the 17th of March, 1776, Sir William Howe, commander-in-chief of the armies of Great Britain in the Provinces of North America, evacuated the town of Boston and all the king's posts in New England, left the place free for the entrance of the Continental armies under Washington, and forever terminated, as we believe, the rule of Great Britain over the State of Massachusetts Bay. This is a day to be remembered for all time by our city, our State, our country, and the world,—glorious as men are wont to judge things; glorious, let us hope and believe, as things are judged by our Father, in whom all glories are.

This is hardly the day or the place to detail the events of that siege of Boston, which may fairly be described as lasting exactly nine months, from the battle of Bunker Hill to the evacuation of this day. I commend to you again the history, of which the authentic accounts have been many times published, pointing out what your own reading will instantly confirm, that the entire record is an unbroken scroll of honor to the Father of his Country, chosen to command on the day that Warren fell, and accomplishing a triumph all his own by the events of the 17th of March. The most brilliant and accomplished military engineer can find no fault with the genius which conceived, planned, and executed the circumvallation of Boston. The virtues which illustrated his whole career—patience, industry, self-control, vigilance—never shone brighter than during those weary nine months, reduced as he was to the last straits for the most necessary munitions of war; and, when his perfect mastery of the situation had absolutely caught his enemy by the throat, and he might have forced his army to a decisive battle, he preferred, with a godlike clemency, to let him sail away unscathed, that he might save our beloved town from the horrors of fire and blood, urging his laurelled chariot of victory to the very mount of triumph, and reigning it in on the verge of that red sea of slaughter through which a vulgar conqueror would have loved to drive, but which parted at the rod of Washington, and allowed our citizens to pass unstained to the promised land.

And, when we rejoice in the triumph of our chief and the liberation of our city, let us never forget that this day separated from Boston—in most cases forever—many hundreds of those who up to this time had lived with your ancestors and mine as fellow-citizens, as friends and brothers. To them the 17th of March was a day of exile, of banishment, of sacrifice; in many cases, of misunderstanding, of calumny, of injustice. And there are not a few distinguished and even illustrious names in other lands with which has been transmitted a hereditary sense of wrong and sorrow at the uprising that drove them from their dear Boston home. Perhaps in no spot of this peninsula did the Revolution exercise a more mysterious, a more purely Providential influence than in that where we assemble to-day. The majority of those who worshipped at King's Chapel in 1776 must have wondered if their exile was in payment of the insults heaped on the Old South and the Old North, on the churches in Cambridge Street and Brattle Square. They must have fancied the name and the glory of this sacred house was gone forever. Yet from the broken and scanty band of worshippers they left behind God was pleased to raise up the pioneers of a purer faith and a chastened order, and to recall the ancient name in service and loyalty to a higher and holier King.

If history is to be studied at all, it should be studied as part of morality. I can hardly keep my patience when I hear those who would treat the events of the past as they might questions of anatomy and mineralogy, and feel an equal thrill when some obscure and inert constituent of the atmosphere is detected as when some new event comes to light which exalts or lowers the fame of some great historic character. "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope,"—not alone the holy Scriptures that Paul read or wrote, but the great book of God's providence in the story of all mankind.

But, even for those who do read the nation's history for its inner and eternal meaning, and who do know that the science of mankind is not the science of stocks and stones, it is possible to miss the true method, and wander by a doubtful light astray from God's guiding star. Too often a nation reads its own history, too often Americans read the history of 1776, in such a way as simply to increase their conceit of themselves. There are those who will see no fault nor failure in any man of the Revolution, to whom it is all one blaze of honor, of courage, and of wisdom,—a consistent and unbroken record of merit. How noble must we be, then, who are the sons of such heroes!

Others will devote themselves to pointing out every possible defect and flaw in the character of our fathers, tracing the success of the Revolution to a combination of cunning and luck. So that, having brought down the founders of America even below the level of to-day, we can regard ourselves, in our worst moments, with a complacency for which the ancient hero-worship left no place.

Neither of these methods of study is true to patriotism or to philosophy. But perhaps the falsest of all is that which would banish all filial interest from our thoughts, would call on us to examine the history of our fathers as judicially and unsympathetically as we would the history of Germany or Spain, or as Germans and Spaniards would our own, denouncing as feeble sentimentality that mingled affection and reverence which approaches the story of those from whom we spring, and who made us what we are, with an undoubted prepossession in their favor,—not to invent or conceal a single fact, but to present their motives with the warm and tender sympathy of a child.

Friends, kinsmen, Americans, it is not wrong to defend our fathers' memory; it is not wrong to read their story with a glow of approval and a tear of indulgence. We love them because we know them, because the bone and the blood that we derive from them imparts an intelligence and an appreciation which the outside historian can never attain. Their deeds and their sufferings for religion and liberty reveal their real meaning only to those who have inherited their spirit and their temper; and he who, hearing their name and living on their soil, supposes he knows them and can interpret their actions better because he has schooled himself to care for them no more than for Greeks and Carthaginians, is deliberately rejecting the very key to their marvellous story which nature forced into his hands to unlock the mysteries that no stranger can rightly behold.

I would study, then, the history of our great national movements, such as the deliverance of Boston, reverently, tenderly, seriously, as becomes those who have entered into their father's labors. To treat their story coldly, as one should decipher an inscription from Babylonia or Yucatan; to treat it sternly, as one handles the campaigns of Cæsar or of Bonaparte; to treat it with that jesting ribaldry, so dear to this decaying century, which makes sport of the loftiest virtues and bravest exploits of our ancestors as it does of their clumsy furniture or lawless spelling,—all this is alien, not merely to filial patriotism, but to the very historic truth in whose interest we are bid to write and read. The men of the "Mayflower" and the men of the Revolution concealed nothing: they acted in the face of the world and in the face of God. They would not have asked their children to write their story with anything but sincerity and truth. But there is a truth of the heart and of the conscience as well as that of the head and eye.

But, when we have studied our national history in the spirit of children as well as of scholars, we cannot lay it aside and consider that our duty to our fathers is over. They did not merely leave us, to use well-known words, a land to enjoy, a liberty to preserve, and institutions to transmit. They left us a work only half completed, or, rather, just started. It is for us to finish what they began, to fill up what they outlined, to supply their imperfections, to correct their shortcomings, to atone, if the harsh critic will have it so, for their errors, but, at any rate, to go on from where they left off to the end which they, perhaps, did not foresee, or saw but dimly. To recall that familiar phrase, we are not merely to eat the fruit from the trees which they planted, but we must attend to the rich and beautiful orchard itself. It is for us to loosen the encrusted earth round the roots of the ancestral trees; to crop the too-luxuriant blossoms, lest the stock be exhausted by its own exuberance; to prune the dead branches; to make war on unseemly parasites; to enrich the raw seedlings with tender grafts; to supply the wasting trunks with vigorous saplings,—in a word, to carry on, to carry out, the work of our fathers in their spirit and with their vision. To say that we honor and thank them for what they did, and then stand and gaze on it as a completed building, that we will simply keep in decent repair till it goes to inevitable ruin, is to pronounce that work as worthless to us in the very hour we imagine we are paying the tribute of eulogy. Our interest in the story of Washington and Franklin, as different from what we take in that of Frederic or of Voltaire, is not merely the gratitude of kindred inheritors, but of trustees, who are to make the best of the precious deposit which they have received to husband and to develop.

That the possession of such an inheritance as this Boston, this New England, recovered by such men as Washington and Adams, entails duties on all later generations, no one will dispute. But it is just at this point that the preacher who seeks to make the past and the present of our nation throw light upon each other, and to recall his hearers to their responsibilities as children of the saints and heroes, is in danger of losing his way and misleading his audience. He is in danger of confounding national duty with some special course of policy, the attacking of some special wrong, the advancement of some special reform which he has greatly at heart,—in short, of adopting the temper and language of a partisan eager to gather recruits rather than of a prophet, the ambassador of the Lord, declaring the counsel of the Almighty. The loftiest preachers of God's word and will—men like Jeremiah, men like Wesley—have yielded to this fascinating impulse to enter the warfare of party, and elevate some doctrine, some truth, it may be, of the hour, into the eternal verity and mystery.

He who seeks to draw from the events of our fathers' day the great laws of national duty now must take himself to pieces. He must become as a little child, and, gazing up at the statues of the early heroes, as they stand ranged around the national shrine, ask himself what profound and elemental lesson God is breathing to all of us through those marble lips.

The events of the 17th of March freed Massachusetts forever from the authority of a king,—an authority which she had at first known but little of, and had chafed at as it grew heavier in later days. The rights which had belonged to the royal house of Brunswick reverted to the whole people, and subjects and sovereigns became identical. The lands which had been held in free and common socage as of the manor of East Greenwich were restored to the old allodial character, and held, as Schiller's ancient baron says, "free of God." When we and our sister colonies ceased to be ruled by a king, when our allegiance to George III. and his house ended, did we cease to be ruled by any one, and did all allegiance end? Or, in other words, are the people of Boston, the people of Massachusetts, the people of the United States, responsible to themselves, to each other, alone?

And it seems to me that the only true answer to this question contains within itself the entire principle and guide for us of national duty. When that Old World allegiance to a king was forever rolled away, the nation, the people, this free America, was brought into immediate allegiance to the higher sovereign, the Lord Paramount, the King whom our earlier fathers chose and served for their own; him by whom kings reign, and rulers, even all the judges of the earth; Jehovah almighty, King of kings and Lord of lords. To him this nation is responsible in its utmost freedom, on him it is dependent in its highest sovereignty. No declaration of independence can release from him; no articles of confederation but he shall laugh and hold them in derision, if they attempt to break his bonds in sunder and cast his cords from them; no constitution, with its carefully devised checks and balances and divisions, can set bounds to his power or release the people that ordains and establishes it from one iota of that law without which they are nothing.

It is sometimes declared—impiously, as I think—that the voice of the people is the voice of God,—impiously, if we assert that the people—ay, all the souls among them—can decide on eternal right and wrong, on duty and on destiny; but it is a mere truism if it simply means that, when the voice of God does not speak by the popular vote, that vote is of no more value than the votes of disfranchised idiots and criminals. It is not merely that the law of right, the law of God, is older, truer, higher, greater than any people on this earth, but that this particular nation, we, the people of the United States, were released from our allegiance to the throne of Great Britain only on the terms of loyalty to God.

Here is the theory of our national duty as heirs and successors of the men who triumphed on the 17th of March, 1776. They did not re-establish the charter of 1792: that was the gift of King William. They did not restore the charter of 1629: that had been granted by one King Charles and revoked by another. They put themselves back where every nation of Christian men and women must be who make their own home apart in the wilderness, under Him who sitteth upon the throne. Our duty is to him and his law. Whatever contravenes his law, whoever is disloyal to him, shows the taint of anarchy and treason,—anarchy because the whole universe is under his government, treason because we started as his subjects and his servants.

God's laws? What are the edicts of his kingdom? How shall we who are, you say, his subjects, be governed by him?" To all such questions, whether ingenious or disingenuous, I reply: God's laws are easier to know, they are plainer to practise, than the laws of any human government, monarchy, oligarchy, or democracy. Who knows the laws of his own country now? How many here know the Constitution of the United States or that of Massachusetts? How many know beyond a doubt the interpretation of either? How many hundreds of men will be occupied all this year in the mere attempt to disentangle the laws of this State alone, where law is better enacted, better understood, better observed, better obeyed, than in almost any community on earth? And the vast mass of that law might be modified, changed, abrogated to-morrow. All the constitutions of the country might be swept away in a month if what is called the people were so minded. Yet who is there here that, if a case arose in his own life this day, could not tell in an instant what God's law bade him to do? I freely admit that in the life of a nation like ours, which has grown beyond all bounds conceived by the men who laid its foundations, terrible differences have arisen, and may arise again, as to what God's law is for us. But this I say, that the hardest straits into which a nation ever was put in the effort to know and obey the law of God cannot compare in pressure with the difficulties we are experiencing every day in our attempts to divide our service to God with Mammon, or to dispense with our allegiance to God altogether, and yet escape the penalty of our treason, or, perhaps, worst of all, to imitate the blindness of our fathers, and to proclaim some superstition or passion of our own as his will, and call on the whole congregation to bow to our calf.

But, if his laws are doubtful, his punishments are sure. There is no wild passion, no sordid lust for gain or power, no frivolous recklessness, no wanton insolence, no perversion of right or truth or justice, no sacrifice to the creature in place of the Creator, which ever taints the history of any nation, for which he does not exact full retribution,—sometimes on the very generation, the very decade, that defied and forgot him; sometimes on the offspring of long after years, who yet are working out the legacy of their ancestors. I have heard much talk in late years of the degeneracy of our legislatures, and the lack of great men like those of old. I can produce from the journals of the Continental Congress proof that that body degenerated in the nine years that Washington held its commission from the position that Chatham had envied to a depth that Sackville might despise. It takes generations and centuries to work out the evil wrought by national weakness and violence, which reproduce themselves for their own punishment according to God's will.

The deliverance of the 17th of March was followed in less than four months by the Declaration of Independence. In that act the United States solemnly declared the causes of their separation out of a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. They took their places not as on another planet, not on an isolated continent, where no civilized man had set his foot, but in God's great commonwealth of the nations. They declared they did this as in his presence. There they are, and there they will be. They are bound by all the ties that have ever bound the nations of the world, by all the ties that sense and reason and humanity shall weave from time to time to chain the impious madness of war. No pride of prosperity, no conceit of independence, no audacious abrogation of treaties by a legislative act, no assertion that might makes right, no pointing to the iniquities of other lands, can ever release our country from the obligation to act among the other peoples as a sister. When we declared our separation from Great Britain, we announced our intention of holding them as we hold the other nations of the earth,—“enemies in war; in peace, friends.” Yet there are those who would read those words of Adams and Jefferson and Sherman and Franklin and Livingston as encouraging that fendish suspicion which would hold other nations, “in peace, enemies,” and would court and covet the horror, the crime, the barbarism of war.

In the hard times of Israel her neighbor and rival, Edom, sprang forth from the rocks of Petra, joined her enemies, and threatened to pay the long-deferred debt of vengeance of Esau against Jacob. The prophet Obadiah saw how vain and impotent was this burst of malicious rage; and he pronounced the warning of the Lord in language that seems to ring through the ages against our own nation, if she ever forgets the conciliation, the forbearance, the judicial dignity of Washington and Jay, to give way to petulance, to ambition, to jealousy, and make our flag the symbol not of liberty and union, but of arrogance and rapacity. “Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord.”

Within a very few years of our great deliverance a mighty nation across the sea extended her hand of fellowship to raise us from our low estate. Fast bound by the fetters of an ancient monarchy, she caught the spirit of liberty from us, and bounded into a sea of revolutions that has hardly yet ebbed so as to leave her firm standing-room. Government after government has swept through her borders, overwhelming her with wars at home and abroad, with defeat and victory, with fitful intervals of peace. Each has claimed in turn that it was founded upon some eternal and impregnable principle, which assured it the favor of God, and demanded the allegiance of men. Yet, as consul and emperor and king and president have plunged one after another into the gulf of destruction, one can hear ringing through the darkness the cry of Ezekiel,—“I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, until he shall come whose right it is; and I will give it him.”

When that rightful ruler shall come to a sister nation, it is not for us to say. But to us he has come. He whose right it is to reign over us is reigning over us now, whether we are obedient subjects or rebels. The Father hath set him over us, Jesus Christ, that blessed and only potentate, King of kings and Lord of lords. There are those among us who would have some acknowledgment of religion in the Constitution. I say it is there now, in the essence of it; and, if it is not there in the interpretation and the administration, not all the courts and Congresses that ever sate—though the august forms of our fathers rose from the graves, covered with the moss of a hundred years, to occupy the seats—could ever give it force over the destinies of our nation. Christian we are by the law of our inheritance, and that allegiance no earthly power can dissolve.

When Jesus sat upon the mountain to preach, he beheld at his feet the new built city of Tiberias, named for the worst of bad rulers, combining every grace of body with every deformity of soul. The deputy of Tiberius was governor of Syria, and the deputy of the governor was Pontius Pilate, and the humble servant of Pontius Pilate was Herod, king of Galilee; and beneath this fourfold tyranny the land of David and Solomon lay grovelling in hopeless slavery. Yet he who came to preach the mightiest of all revolutions in the hearts of men, and work out the widest liberty, could not be tortured into a single expression that hinted at sedition or rebellion. The very governor whose cowardly indecision condemned him, himself pronounced him faultless, as Jesus himself declared his kingdom, which was not of this world, the rule of Him who bore witness to the truth. With that very word he set upon his own head more royally than Frederic or Napoleon the crown from every point of whose thorns sparkles the radiance of truth eternal, the energy that discerns, the authority that punishes, the force that shall destroy every rebel, and controls the hearts of man with resistless sway. From that mount of instruction he taught his disciples to look beyond Herod and Pilate, beyond Caesar and Solomon, and pray to the Father in heaven, “Thy kingdom come!” Brethren, for us that prayer is fulfilled. God's kingdom has come, and we are its subjects. It came when the “Mayflower” cast her anchor in the bay at Provincetown. It was here when Winthrop took possession of the three hills of Shawmut, it was here when Washington saw the ships quit this harbor, it was here when independence was declared and the Constitution was ratified. It will be here, supreme and paramount, binding every magistrate and every citizen, although we were to run the round of as many forms of government as France and breed as many Nihilists as Russia. What remains for us, then, but, meekly accepting the rule of our King, in the spirit of our glorious chieftain and deliverer, to bow our head, and complete the prayer with the words, “Thy will be done”?

AN ORIENTAL VIEW OF THE FAMILY.

It is interesting to see how progressive ideas in regard to feminine education and the position of women are spreading even in the Orient. This is illustrated in a book entitled “The Family of Paradise,” written by Mugurditch I., the catholicos or spiritual head of the Armenian Church, the oldest national church of Christendom, who has his see in an ancient monastery at the foot of Mt. Ararat. The present catholicos is a man of exceptional saintliness and benevolence, much beloved by his flock, who call him “Little Father” as a term of affection. This flock consists of about five million people, living principally in Turkey, Russia, and Persia. In its doctrines and forms the Armenian Church resembles High Church Episcopalianism. The catholicos is not regarded as infallible; but his position as head of the church gives him great influence, which is much increased, in the case of Mugurditch, by his personal character. His book on “The Family of Paradise” has run through many editions, and his popularity has helped to give it a wide reading. Mugurditch is a widower; and the liberality of many of his ideas is a refreshing contrast to the illiberality of some eminent ecclesiastics, who have written dogmatically upon the family without any practical experience of family life.

The catholicos emphasizes the importance of the family as the foundation of national life. He says:—

The house and the family are the territory and boundaries of a little kingdom, on whose patriarchal throne sit the parents, the father as king and the mother as queen, and rule over the family, their subjects. In this palace and kingdom there is neither police nor tyranny nor sword nor staff, but instead fatherly love and motherly affection; and the example of the parents is the tutor and adviser of the children. This example makes such an impression that it stamps the picture of the parents upon the children, as in taking a photograph; and the children bear this image when they enter society. Thenceforth it begins to spread, from example to example; and thus, from the good or evil example of family life, the life of society improves or deteriorates, and the nation is built up or pulled down, remains a vital force in the world or dies a living death, and vanishes even to its memory. . . . Peoples and nations do not live by bread alone. They are elevated not only by independence and freedom, but also by their moral life; and of this vital life the family is the giver. . . . Be attentive, and I will describe to thee. A people, when it progresses, takes its first step from the threshold of the family. If it becomes enlightened, its light is from the family lamp. If it is united, its soul and its bond is the family. If it grows strong, its strength and its arm is the family. If it grows rich, its treasury and its treasurer is the family. If its house and table are plenteous and bountiful, the fertile field is the family. If the rivers of Paradise run through its city squares, their source is the family of Paradise. If its jars are full of wine, the grape-bearing vineyard is the family. If it increases ten thousand-fold day by day with noble children, the bearer and care-taker is the family. If it wishes to make good citizens of its children, the first school of good citizenship is the family. If it would live happily in this world, let it believe that the family is the source whence flows the blessed life. If it would inherit heaven after this world, and preserve its hereditary religion, faith, and church, the family is the temple in which to keep those sacred bequests without loss. For this treasure and the priceless pearl of the gospel are not to be found without loss in the emporiums of merchandise nor in the halls of government nor in the colleges of science. Their only faithful custodian is the family.

Thou hast seen clearly in this description, O attentive reader, that a nation takes the impress of its moral life direct from the family. Let us now look at the other side of the picture. The ruin of an unfortunate nation comes from the family. If it has no vital moral life, the deadness is from the family. If it deteriorates, it is the family that opens the way to destruction. If its knees are infirm and it cannot advance, the abandonment and lameness are from the family. If the bewitching fashions of Europe rob it ruthlessly, let it be cautious, and see that the plundering hand is the family. If its children are not well born, it is because the family is enslaved by disease. Let all fathers and mothers remember that it is impossible to form a prosperous nation without forming a good family. Whatever we form, we must know that the first formative element is the family.

But what is it that creates this grand and noble element for the nation? I will tell thee. The preparing hand is education, which it is necessary first to spread under the roofs where the family lives. It is true that the public schools diffuse light and knowledge, but to give a good education belongs to the parents only. They are the highest teachers, the natural teachers of that family school.

What are the causes that trouble the home and divide the family? And what is the remedy, so that its members may live at peace and united in love? The new world teaches that the only remedy is to give a complete education to human beings, not a one-sided education, that shall enlighten one-half of humanity and leave the other half blind, poor, enslaved, and imbecile. I wish to emphasize that I mean the giving of education to both sexes, without any distinction, to each according to its calling, in order that all the members of the family may know their rights and duties, that they may understand each other, may think in harmony, and may keep step together without limping, husband and wife, parents and children, bridegroom and mother-in-law.

In the old times it was easy to preserve harmony in the family, because the patriarch of the family based his rule on the reverence and subjection of the children and wife. But time changes everything. The new life of Western civilization is coming into the Orient like a flood. Who can raise a wall against it? This flood will undoubtedly advance and reach the foot of Mt. Ararat and flood the home of Noah, and will sweep away with it the whole of the old life of the old nations. Would that it might carry away only the bad side of our life! But no, it is sweeping away with it also what is right and good. Very brave are that nation and that family which drop the bad things belonging to the old life, and hold fast to those things in it which were right and good. It must be noted that the water of this flood of Western civilization is very turbid and mixed, evil and good, light and darkness; and irreligious science comes with it. Therefore, the Armenian family must open its eyes immediately to the light of (true) science, and be prepared by a good education. This is the only way to be able to select the good from the mixture of European civilization. But, if it neglects enlightenment and education, and, being foolish and uneducated, opens its mouth (indiscriminately) to the flood, verily, verily I say unto thee, O attentive reader, the life of the Armenian will be choked indeed.

HIGH SETTLE.

There has long been a small demand from architects, furnishers, and decorators for a Hall Stand whose proportions should emphasize the element of height on a base of very small dimensions.

This year we are enabled to present such a design. Much careful study has been given to its details; and, by wise adaptation, many features have been introduced here that are never found in a small stand.

The Box Seat has a lifting lid with a convenient closet for overshoes, gloves, etc. The spindle-work opening at the back adds to the comfort of the sitter. The mirror is a 20-inch plate,—equal to the size of the ordinary hall glass. The umbrella Rack is firmly attached, and takes little space.

It will be seen that nothing is omitted here from the complete equipment of the best Hall Stands. Standing nearly 7 feet high, on a width of only 2 feet 5 inches, this pattern has a strong individual character and no little vigor of style.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,

The catholicos discourses against the free-love doctrines that are invading the country and against the growth of luxury and the spread of European fashions. In the matter of expensive dress he points out that the men are at least as much to blame as the women. The women, he shrewdly remarks, are not idiots. They know that the men admire fine clothes, and therefore they wear them. He condemns the new-fangled practice of demanding a dowry, and says:—

The only really worthy dowry is love, which is unmixed, sincere, and unfeigned, a love which joins with affectionate heart and soul to perpetuate the human race. All the pearls of this world, all adornments and all treasures, if put into one scale, cannot weigh against conjugal love. It is priceless, rare, and stronger than death. Its purpose is sacred and mysterious. Its picture is simple and clean. Let not the fantastic novelists of love mar its shining face. The true photographer of love is Solomon: "Put me as a seal on thy heart and as a ring on thine arm; for love is stronger than death." Yes, the love between two married lovers is very strong. It breathes with two breaths. It joins with two hearts. It speaks with two tongues. It lives with two souls. It grows strong with two lives. If one is wanting, love dies; for love is the unity of two hearts.

On the much-mooted subject of the position of women the catholicos speaks as follows:—

Paul says, "There is neither male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." He shows by this that the duties and rights of all Christians are equal before the free religion of the gospel. These words of Paul, removing woman from her old slavery, do not, however, abolish her duty of obedience, which is natural and moral; but the civilization of Europe, which, thanks again to Christianity, respected this principle of freedom, elevated woman's dignity, and recognized her honor and her rights, while among Oriental nations the position of luckless woman is generally slavery and the deprivation of all rights. . . . The apostle enjoins obedience upon woman. Is it to be like the obedience of the people to their prince, of the soldier to his general, of the slave to his master? No, not so. The woman is neither subject, soldier, nor servant. The woman is the free friend and equal yoke-fellow by all rights. Therefore, the woman is not servant, but house-mistress and queen. Though the man may be the king and the head, he has no right whatever to rule in the way in which the lords of this world usually rule, by force.

This is not in accord with the best thought of the Occident, where in the most enlightened families the husband and wife live together as dear friends, without either of them having the slightest idea that it is the wife's duty to obey. But it is far in advance of the conceptions of most Orientals. Mugurditch continues:—

One must not regard woman as altogether weak, or call her a brittle earthen vessel. She sometimes becomes red-hot iron when the love of religion or of her husband and children fires her, and impels her to overcome every obstacle. . . . In the field of family life there are two equal workers, for whom the word "yoke-fellows" is very appropriate. It indicates the equal life and rights and duties of man and woman, as two oxen walk with equal step and plough the field with equal strength.

Mugurditch condemns the idea that women have no business to take an interest in politics:—

If it is the right of the man to inquire about the domestic affairs of the family, is it not the right of the woman to have information and to know what the men are doing for the government and public affairs?

The catholicos adds a strong plea for the education of women:—

Our future depends upon the right and appropriate education of the female sex. When the right to new freedom removed the veil of reverence from the heads of women, it became necessary that their modest foreheads should be veiled by a true and enlightened education. If the old veil was considered a shadow, let the women now open their eyes through a veil of light, and see the world. It is necessary to cultivate their minds and souls, and to leave them free, that they may become strong and be able to walk in freedom without stumbling or going astray, in order that well-educated mothers may shape the new family and the new life of the Armenian nation. Happy will be the day when the Armenian ladies and women, while preserving the grace of modesty, shall shine also with the light of modern education!

In Shanghai and in many other places in China the crows build and raise their broods in the trees of the city. They are especially abundant in Peking. On account of the Buddhist reverence for all life, no one harms them.

Literature.

THE GOLDEN HOUSE.*

Given a book so beautifully made as this, and even a vicious novel would "lose half its evil in losing all its grossness"; or, at least, the reader would get a pleasure from the bright and handsome page for which the writer would deserve no thanks. When the writer is Mr. Warner, the outward appearance seems the most natural symbol and expression of his clear-shining thought and style; and the inevitable quotation, which we should of course deny ourselves, comes uppermost:—

"For of the soul the body form doth take;
For soul is form, and doth the body make."

Here is a book which, as soon as we have finished it, we find ourselves wishing ourselves rich,—if not as rich as Henderson, rich enough to buy a whole edition, and send it far and wide. It is so good; so honest, simple, and straightforward; so bright and keen; so sure to give the reader a few hours of earnest thought and noble feeling with regard to matters of great social moment at the present time. And especially would one like to send a copy to all happy women just entering on the mystery of motherhood, that they might read the idyllic passage on pages 152, 153, which, without being at all in the manner of Thackeray, is as tender as anything he ever wrote out of those great reserves of tenderness in which he was so strong. And the name of Thackeray also suggests that here, as elsewhere, Mr. Warner is the social satirist. He has been a careful student of social manners; and in many little essays, and in several books, he has before now made his penetrating comment on the vanities and follies of our social life. The skill so learned he brings to the delineation of the characters and scenes that make up the interest of his "Golden House." The satire is not ill-natured nor ungenerous. He is "a kindly wag." The note is never forced. He seems never to be on the lookout for open joints in the social armor; but, when one is exposed, how swift his arrow flies, how firmly it inheres! There are touches here and there any one of which will give the judicious reader more pleasure than can be got from a whole novel of some writer who has no Ithuriel spear.

Mr. Warner's "Golden House" is a continuation of his "Little Journey in the World." That was a noble book, and this one is as good. There we had the tragedy of a woman of high character and generous ideals gradually sinking toward the level of her husband's practical materialism. She dies; and he marries "old Eschelle's daughter," a creature made subject to vanity, who in these pages is every whit as fascinating to the reader as she is to Jack Delancy,—a triumph of the novelist's skill to which some novelists of the highest rank have not attained. "The Golden House" is a less tragical book than its predecessor, because Jack Delancy, the principal personage, is arrested on his downward course, yet not by his own strength. There is a deus ex machina, in the shape of a good uncle to his wife, who reaches him a helping hand. This is as it should be, Jack being what he was. Strong men can save themselves: the weak cannot. The moral is discouraging to a flabby virtue: it is encouraging to kindly sympathy and generous help.

Parallel with the fortunes of Jack Delancy and his wife are those of the Anglican ascetic, Father Damon, and the agnostic physician, Ruth Leigh. It is, perhaps, because Mr. Warner's own religious standpoint is equally removed from either that he renders them both with such admirable discrimination. Between them is an "unplumbed, salt, estranging sea"; but, while each is certain of the other's love, their fate is not so hard.

In conclusion, it should be said that Mr. Warner's novel offers a striking contrast to another of the period, which also deals with New York, four volumes of which we have had already, while there are two more to come. The action of that novel transpires as in a social vacuum. The writer has had little acquaintance with the life of the metropolis; and discretion is for him, no doubt, the better part of valor. In Mr. Warner's book the social atmosphere is all-pervading. He has given us the life of a community, and not merely of a set. Some of his social scenery can easily be identified. It is evidently to the Tiffany studio that the first chapter introduces us, and there is no exaggeration of its mysterious gleams and glooms. But what is most creative is just as true as this to the reality of the form and spirit of a society that is dangerously rich and idle, with an insatiable curiosity for some new fillip for an appetite already jaded with excess.

*THE GOLDEN HOUSE. A novel by Charles Dudley Warner, author of "A Little Journey in the World," etc. Illustrated by W. T. Smedley, New York: Harper & Brothers.

TALK AT A COUNTRY HOUSE: FACT AND FICTION. By Sir Edward Strachey, Bart. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The fiction of Sir Edward's book is mainly in the form which is that of a dialogue between a Mr. Foster and "the Squire." In truth, he is himself both Mr. Foster and "the Squire." The thought continues from one interlocutor to the other. There is none of the difference and opposition of actual conversation to give an appearance of reality to the two persons. The clumsiness and staleness of this artifice does not prevent the book from being a very pleasant one. Sir Edward is well smattered, and proud enough of his acquirements to give a spice of unconscious humor to his page. For the most part, he sticks to his last; and once, at least, when he does not, he is very silly, finding nothing better in the criticism of Kuenen and Wellhausen than an elaborate rehash of the old doctrine that Ezra wrote the Pentateuch. The range of topics is wide. Beginning with Persian poetry, we have a second on a series of family and historic portraits, a third on a general election and political morality, a fourth on love and marriage, a fifth on Tennyson and Maurice, a sixth on the Arthurian legend as related to Sir Thomas Malory and Tennyson, a seventh on arrowhead inscriptions. If the reader cannot always go along with the writer, the challenge of his opinion is not less agreeable than a complete assent. The genial admirations of the book commend it to us as much as any other trait.

THE WORLD'S CONGRESS OF REPRESENTATIVE WOMEN. Edited by May Wright Sewall. 2 vols. Chicago and New York: Rand, McNally & Co.—The historian of the future will find this book of valuable assistance. It is an historical résumé, arranged for popular circulation, of all that occurred at the World's Congress of Representative Women which was held in Chicago in the spring of 1893. Every field of woman's work is discussed at length by the best authorities. Education in general, literature, the dramatic art, science, religion, charity, philanthropy, moral and social reform, the civil and political status of women, and industries of all kinds,—these are some of the general headings. The wealth of subjects in detail is surprising. What intense amazement, horror, and incredulity such a book as this would have caused, could it have appeared seventy-five, or even fifty years ago, it is amusing to conjecture. Yet to-day we accept it as the natural and suitable thing.

PROTESTANT MISSIONS: THEIR RISE AND EARLY PROGRESS. By A. C. Thompson. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.—Mr. Thompson is the author of "Moravian Missions" and "Foreign Missions,"—two books that have already proved his knowledge of the subjects he has made especially his own. These are lectures which were first delivered at the Hartford Theological Seminary. They embrace a period from the time of the Reformation down to the founding of the Moravian missions in 1732. Many are the stories of noble fidelity to this cause and patient suffering endured as a crown, not a cross, by those who were glad of being counted worthy to suffer for such ends. Even when the missions themselves have been failures, the story is well worth telling. One need not approve of the general methods of most missions in order to understand the force of such a history as this.

THE DEVIL'S PLAYGROUND. By John Mackie. New York: Frederick A. Stokes. From the title of this book, and the hints given in its opening chapter, to say nothing of the deep crimson cover where a Mephistopheles in silver brandishes a rapier upon which are spitted a pair of hearts, one may well fancy that he has happened on a wicked little story. He need not be disturbed. The love that threatens vaguely to involve a man and a married woman is switched aside on a safer track before there is any cause for repentance anywhere; and the hero is rewarded for his virtue by the sudden endowment with a wife who adds to her respectability beauty, and to her beauty wealth, whereby he satisfies himself and his relations at the same time. The best of the book is in its pictures of life on a ranch in the North-west, and such incidents as the blinding, whirling blizzard.

HIPPOLYTE AND GOLDEN BEAK. By George Bassett. New York: Harper & Brothers.—The two stories of this volume are clever and original, admirably accomplishing their mission to entertain. The worldly, end-of-the-century tone of the first, and the matter-of-fact atmosphere which surrounds the romance of the second, do not prepare the reader for the strength of the climax in either, when the drama is turned into tragedy with a suddenness that has a flavor of actuality. The character of the narrator is skilfully implied in each instance; and there is no reason why we should not expect more important work from one who has shown himself able to handle his material, and new material at that, so deftly. There is a graceful dedication to Whistler, a model of unaffected friendliness.

A FARM-HOUSE COBWEB. By Emory J. Haynes. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This story of life in a country town before country towns were all suburbs of some large city contains two or three pictures that are worth the reading, such as the evening at the singing school, and again the corn-husking; but the book, as a whole, is weak, both in construction and execution. There is more action and incident than in its predecessor, and it will probably be found more interesting.

The Magazines.

THE NEW WORLD.—The title-page of the March number of the New World suggests a verse of a famous hymn:—

"See the mighty host advancing, Satan leading on";

for the first article is "The Devil," by Prof. C. C. Everett. With great learning and a touch of his quaint humor he traces the development of that personage from the fear of the savage to the fear of the mediæval peasant, taking off his hat to him with something of Burns's kindness at the close by pointing out how the idea of the devil has been useful to man's moral progress. "Race Prejudice" Maurice Bloomfield derives from the struggle for existence, differences in customs and manners, and the presence in each race of a physical ideal. Rev. T. T. Munger writes of "Oliver Wendell Holmes" in a very genial and friendly way. Apropos of Dr. Holmes's references to theology, Mr. Munger says that Unitarianism "was a criticism, a negative movement, and a very necessary one; but it should have been kept within the unbroken body, and not suffered to result in schism. Each side was necessary to the other; and the divorce made two bodies that have since lived on at a waning rate, chiefly engaged in furnishing materials for prelatical churches and for agnosticism. The separation was the tragedy of New England history, and it was as needless as it was wrong. Neither the old Orthodoxy nor the old Unitarianism can stand before evolution and the higher criticism." L. H. Mills writes of "The God of Zoroaster"; Prof. Allan Menzies criticises kindly, but keenly the Ritschlian divorce of intellect and religion, as shown in two notable books by Hermann and Kaptan, in "The Truth of the Christian Religion"; Prof. J. M. Whiton, in a less respectful but successful manner, exposes "Some of Mr. Kidd's Fallacies"; Prof. T. Meinhold follows the higher criticism in dealing with "The Origins of the Religion and History of Israel"; and Prof. Karl Budde, with microscopic scholarship, completes a beautiful little folk-song in the book of Numbers, in "The Song of the Well." Rev. H. G. Spaulding writes with enthusiasm and discernment of "The Preaching of Phillips Brooks,"—an excellent article; and Charles J. Goodwin, starting from the poems of William Watson and Eric Mackay, contributes a fine paper upon "The Poet in an Age of Science." He leaves us, however, with the doleful information that there is no great poet now. Mr. Munger had just said: "It is safe to say that there is not now living a great poet, known to be such. We have more than a feeling of bereavement: we have a feeling of apprehension and fear, a sense of orphanage." And Prof. Goodwin adds: "We need the strong guidance of one who shall show us the order in chaos, the hope in uncertainty, the beauty and glory of human life. The field is ready: it is vacant." This notice has not named the abiding-places of these contributors, because it wishes to emphasize, by naming them all together, what is one of the glories of this noble quarterly,—the range of the scholarly world from which its articles are gathered. Mr. Mills is of Oxford, Prof. Menzies of Edinburgh University, Prof. Meinhold of the University of Bonn, Prof. Budde of the University of Strassburg, Mr. Bloomfield of Johns Hopkins University, and Prof. Goodwin of Wesleyan. The other Americans are familiar to our readers. The book reviews are by Messrs. Everett, Toy, Thayer, Lyon, Cary, Freeman, Christie, Philipson, Estlin Carpenter, Starbuck, Bloomfield, Forbes, Bacon, and Benn; President Cone; Rev. Messrs. George A. Gordon, Chadwick, Ames, Gannett, Cook, Kimball, Lyon, and Whiton. The books noticed are such as no thoughtful man can afford to ignore,—certainly, no thoughtful clergyman. A movement has started to put the New World on a surer financial basis. Not to accomplish this would be a severe blow, not only to liberal scholarship, but to the liberal congregations whom, ultimately, that scholarship should feed.

W. H. L.

The March number of the Arena contains articles by Frances E. Willard and Lady Somerset,—the former on "Scientific Temperance Instruction in the Public Schools"; the other, a paper on social purity, entitled "The Welcome Child." Prof. James T. Bixby writes of "Mohammed and the Koran," believing it practically superior to popular Christianity to meet the wants of barbaric and semi-civilized nations. "Japan: Its Present and Future," is an interesting estimate of this country by a native, Midori Komatz. Three of the articles are studies of occultism, telepathy, and auto-suggestion; while Mr. Flower's own contribution shows how glimpses of the prophetic faculty of the mind may be revealed in dreams. There are also pen pictures of John Burns and Lyman Trumbull, the latter accompanied by a photograph. "An Open Letter to Hon. John G. Carlisle," arraigning the finance minister in unequivocal terms as having "betrayed the people and insulted God," is by George W. Pepperell; and there are other articles of varied nature.

The April number of the Bibliotheca Sacra contains articles on "The Authority of the Scriptures," by Frank Hugh Foster, and on "The Historical Method of Interpretation" and "The Social Ethics of Jesus," by John S. Sewall. The last shows how the hopes and plans of Jesus were centred on the individual rather than on a system. Z. Swift Holbrook concludes his consideration of "The American Republic and the Debs Insurrection," maintaining that the emancipation of the masses must surely come, but that religion, morality, education, must be the divine leaders of politics and economics. Rev. James W. Willmarth, writing on "Restricted Communion," presents the facts and principles which govern Baptists in this matter, and aims to show that "the greater prevalence of error, the more certain and necessary must it be that restricted communion shall remain as a witness to the truth." Howard Osgood presents the doctrine of "President Harper's Letters," and there are the usual departments.

Miscellaneous.

We have received a variety of Easter music from William A. Pond & Co. of New York, including carols and anthems appropriate to the Easter service of church and Sunday-school.

"The Outline Lessons of Ancient Geography," by Francis M. Austin of Wilbraham Academy, are intended to supply that familiarity with the geography of ancient nations which is imperative for intelligent understanding of the classics or of ancient history. They contain the material for close, systematic drill, and blank pages are inserted to be used for taking notes.

Literary Notes.

The late Frank Bolles, who wrote so admirably on outdoor topics, left some poems, which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will bring out under the title of "Chocorua's Tenants."

An "America" testimonial souvenir has been published for the benefit of Dr. Smith. It is handsomely designed, and printed on heavy paper, with covers in two colors, and contains: origin of "America" testimonial, with facsimile signatures of leading citizens of Boston and New England; portrait of Dr. Smith, with autograph; biography of Dr. Smith; fac-simile of "America" manuscript; music and words of "America"; Dr. Smith in his library on Washington's Birthday, 1895; how "America" was written, by Dr. Smith; Dr. Smith's residence at Newton Centre; Reception Committee of Eighty-six, and Executive Committee. The proceeds from the sale of this souvenir will be devoted to the testimonial. Price, 25 cents a copy.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES

By E. BENJAMIN ANDREWS, D.D., LL.D., President of Brown University. With maps. 2 vols., crown 8vo, $4.00.

Although published but a few weeks, President Andrews's history has already established itself as a standard work, filling a unique place among the histories of our country. The cordial indorsement it has received from the press, the immediate recognition of its merits by the public, and the approval and adoption of it by several leading educational institutions confirm the publishers in their belief that the work satisfies the long-felt demand for a brief history that shall be both a genuine piece of literature and a scholarly, reliable, and comprehensive narrative of our country's growth from the earliest times down to the present.

A FEW OF THE MANY INDORSEMENTS OF THE PRESS:

"The freshest and most readable treatise of its class."—Watchman.

"It is heartily to be commended, sure to delight and instruct."—New York Observer.

"His style is clear and concise. One reads with accumulated interest to the end."—Christian Advocate.

"Unquestionably of value. He is a man of broad and judicial mind."—R. H. STODDARD, in Mail and Express.

"It is admirably arranged; it gives much information not hitherto directly accessible to the general reader; it impresses one as being fair in its representations and unprejudiced in its judgments; it gives a wonderfully broad and satisfactory view of national growth, and it is decidedly attractive in style,—terse, pointed, emphatic, yet never tiresome."—Boston Beacon.

"It must be acknowledged as a standard, reliable and trustworthy."—Boston Times.

"One of the best popular histories of America, if not the best."—Advance.

"A brief and admirably lucid history. His style is crisp and energetic."—Church Standard.

"A book which the advanced student will find very near perfection."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

THE CHRISTIAN STATE.

A Political Vision of Christ.

By the Rev. GEO. D. HERRON, D.D., Professor of Applied Christianity at Grinnell College, Ia. 16mo, gilt top, 75 cents; paper, 40 cents.

"Dr. Herron, during the past year, has probably elicited more criticism from the press and from his professional contemporaries than any other man in the American pulpit. His position has been greatly misunderstood. His message is not one of division, but of union; not one of destruction, but of construction. He would not destroy what is, but would pour into it a stimulant and a potency for more intense and remitting righteousness."

Five Services for Public Worship

WITH

SERVICES FOR SPECIAL OCCASIONS.

As stated in its Preface, "The preparation of this book was undertaken in response to a demand for some new book of worship less costly than the book entitled 'Prayer and Praise' and of somewhat different character. The 'Five Services,' here republished, have been arranged in such order that the Te Deum may be sung on the second and fourth Sundays of the month instead of the first and second; and various other changes have been made corresponding to suggestions received from ministers who desire to use them. Especially, an attempt has been made to introduce into the 'rubric' the utmost possible degree of flexibility."

The book is a 16mo, of 226 pages, is bound in cloth, and sold, at retail, for 50 cents, and 40 cents to societies introducing it and to ministers.

Sent, postage paid, on receipt of 50 cents by

"Life-Studies."

The immediate large interest in the two small cloth-bound books of the "Life" series, published during the last quarter of 1894 (each containing four papers), together with the general desire that similar brief essays or "studies" might be had singly in neat periodical form, leads to this monthly issue of Life-Studies.

The two books first issued in the bound series were "As Natural as Life," by Rev. Charles G. Ames, and "In Love with Love," by James H. West, subsequent volumes, uniform in size and general style, being promised from Rev. Dr. E. L. Rexford, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Rev. John W. Chadwick, Rev. Dr. M. D. Shutter, and men of similar power.

Some or all of the writers here named will appear likewise in the present periodical, in a single issue each, while to their papers will be added popular essays or "life-studies" from others among the best and brightest minds of America.

No. 1. By Rev. Marion D. Shutter, D.D. A Way-side Prophet, a unique and brilliant paper.

No. 2. By Rev. Samuel M. Crothers. Making the Best of It, a hopeful and encouraging study.

(Issues to follow.)

No. 3. By William C. Gannett,—one of his characteristic, helpful papers.

No. 4. By Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett,—a suggestive Life-Study (topic to be announced).

No. 5. By Paul Revere Frothingham. Beauty of Character, a forceful paper.

No. 6. By Celia Parker Woolley (topic to be announced).

Annual subscriptions to Life-Studies will be received for 50 cents (ten numbers, published monthly, except during July and August). Single copy, 6 cents. Ten copies of any single issue, 30 cents. Sample copy free.

*Three annual subscriptions will be received for one dollar (to be sent to one address or each subscription to a different address).

MY FRIEND.

BY B. H. T.

My much appreciated friend
Stays by me every day.
She does not borrow, does not lend,
Is seldom in my way.

No sense of loneliness comes now,
Companionship is dear.
To feel her presence seems somehow
To comfort, bless, and cheer.

She fills the arm-chair very well,
She is extremely neat.
Her songs I cannot always tell,
Her time is perfect beat.

She has in me such confidence
And such a loving way,
I gladly own her influence
Is good for me each day.

The neighbor's children love her, too,
And call her Tabitha.
I do not like the name, do you?
Tab, Tabby, Tabitha.

She does not care, she purrs the same
As if her name were Queen.
And, after all, what's in a name
When quality is seen?

THE FIRST DAUPHIN.

BY EVELYN S. FOSTER.

The little boy of my story was born more than one hundred years ago. He was not the first dauphin of history, but is so spoken of to distinguish him from his brother, who became Louis XVII., and who is called the last dauphin. These boys were the sons of the unfortunate Louis XVI. and his queen, Marie Antoinette. Their grandmother was Maria Theresa of Austria, whose story fills many pages of history.

Dauphin was the title given to the oldest son of the French king. As the boy of my story lived but a few years, his brother receiving his title at his death, there were two dauphins in the reign of Louis XVI.

No child was ever welcomed into a home more joyfully than this little boy. The delight shown by his father and mother, the many celebrations in honor of his birth, would make a long story. The king shed tears of joy when he held his little child in his arms. He delighted to watch him. He thought the words "my son, the dauphin," very sweet; and they were often on his lips. He was naturally a quiet man, seldom showing his feelings to those whom he met; but this joy, so long wished for, was too great to be concealed. He now had something to say to every one, and with smiles and tears held the child up at the window, that the people outside might rejoice with their king and queen. And they did rejoice with them. Some one living at that time tells us that "the gladness was overwhelming," that "all heads were turned," that people were seen "alternately laughing and crying," and that those who did not know each other, in their delight, "fell upon one another's necks."

There were some who did not love the beautiful queen; but even they, at this happy time, forgot their hatred, and rejoiced with the rest.

The baptism came soon in the chapel of Versailles. A long name was given to the little stranger, Louis Joseph Xavier François. Music followed, solemn and grand. Then came fireworks, great illuminations, gay processions, speeches, and gifts.

Louis XVI., though a king, understood the art of printing. He was also a skilful locksmith. Partly for that reason, perhaps, the gift that pleased him best came from the locksmiths of Versailles, who presented him with a secret lock, wishing him to solve the mystery himself. He soon discovered the secret by pressing on a spring which caused a beautiful little steel dauphin to appear from the centre of the lock.

Probably some of my young readers fancy the son of a king as a boy always dressed in elegant clothes, living in elegant surroundings, with the right to command all those about him. The child of my story was taught that simplicity, modesty, and kindness are better attributes of a royal child. He often wore a simple sailor suit, he was not allowed to show any haughtiness or pride, he was expected to treat every one with courtesy and kindness.

This lovely consideration for others he saw in his mother, who treated Mme. Le Brun, her court painter, not as a servant, but as a trusted friend. She was careful not to wound her feelings; and, when the artist was sick, even though a queen, with her own hands she was ready to render her a service.

Mme. Le Brun painted many portraits of Marie Antoinette, and a lovely picture of the queen with her children, that has been copied again and again, and only a few months ago appeared in a popular magazine.

We can imagine the dauphin and his sister in the studio of the famous artist, watching her as she painted the portrait of their beautiful mamma, or perhaps listening to stories of her own little girl, her lovely Jean Julie Louise, her "little brunette," as she called her.

Like many boys and girls in our own country and in our own day, the dauphin found his best happiness in the company of his mother. No mother ever loved her children more tenderly or watched over them more devotedly than Marie Antoinette. She entered into their sports, danced with them, and planned little comedies for their pleasure, often acting in them herself.

A pretty saying of the dauphin's brother, Charles Louis, shows how sweet the queen's voice sounded to her children. As she sang, the child was so quiet some one said he was sleeping, when he immediately spoke, and asked, "Can any one sleep when Mamma Queen is singing?"

While the first dauphin lived, Charles was entitled the Duc de Normandie, and was his father's "big Norman," and, because so healthy and strong, his mother's "peasant child." His oldest sister was called Mme. Royale. The baby sister, Sophie Beatrix, died a short time before Mme. La Brun painted her famous picture of the queen with her children.

The queen wished her children not simply to be happy themselves, but to be mindful of the happiness of others; to consider not only those around them, but the sick and the poor.

Once at New Year's she sent for some costly toys, and showed them to the children. After they had admired them, she told them the toys were indeed very beautiful, but that it was more beautiful to distribute alms. She told them of people who needed food and clothing; and the children willingly gave up these rich playthings, that the money they would cost might be used for the suffering.

It is pleasant to think of these happy years, for the last part of the dauphin's life was full of weakness and pain. His back became misshapen, his face grew thin and pale, and an expression of anguish showed his sufferings. He could not walk, or even stand, without support. No medicine helped him. The tenderest care gave him no relief. He grew rapidly worse, and died in his mother's arms before he was twelve years old.

Mme. Le Brun's beautiful picture was taken away. The queen could not bear to look at it: it reminded her so painfully of her sorrow. But, even in her grief, she thought of the artist, and bade some one tell her why the picture was removed, that she might not be made unhappy by it.

There are no more painful pages in history than those following the death of the first dauphin. The boy, who is described as "beautiful as an angel," who delighted all by his goodness and kindness, was indeed taken away from "evil to come."

WANTED: A DOG.

There was no doubt about it, Will Tait did want a dog very badly indeed. Just then there was a fancy for dogs abroad, among the shoeblack brigade. Tom Sawyers had one, a sharp black terrier who followed his master through the day's work, and was a fruitful subject of conversation with every customer who stood to get his boots brushed. Jim Turner had another, an ugly little creature it was, and of no earthly use or pleasure to any one. Even Jim himself never referred to him without a kind of apology. Two other boys joined, and went shares in a gray mongrel; and altogether Will felt that it was a duty he owed to himself to get a dog at once.

He had seen exactly the kind of dog he wanted, too,—a white one with black ears: it belonged to the telegraph clerk at the freight station up the road. Will had been trying to bargain with him for the last three weeks.

The telegraph clerk began by demanding six shillings, then he had come down by sixpenny stages to half a crown, but lower than that he would not go; and, as Will had eightpence, the proceedings had come to a deadlock.

He was thinking it over as he took his lunch on the dock wall, and in truth did not quite see where the balance was to come from. Still, he had never failed in anything he set his mind to yet; and, if that clerk would not come down, it was clear that the half-crown must be made up somehow.

"It's one and tenpence, twenty-two pennies," he observed half aloud. "If I stop a bit later and begin a bit sooner, and don't miss a single chance, I might—I might get it in a fortnight: it's only twopence a day, after all. There's one customer now."

A stream of passengers was coming up from a ferry-boat, and one big, portly old gentleman was vigorously signalling to him. One of his boots was in the highest state of polish; but the other had evidently dipped into a pool of lime or whitewash, which had caked into a solid crust about it. Will looked down at his brushes rather doubtfully.

"Never mind your brushes, my lad: look at my boot. I'll give you threepence if you make it like the other in less than three minutes. I want to catch a train."

Will brushed with right good will. Threepence for one boot was something more than fair pay. He got through his task in the allotted time, and made the boot as presentable as its neighbor. The gentleman regarded it approvingly, his head a little on one side.

"You have done that very well, my lad. It was some horrible compound for whitewashing the cattle-sheds, and I stepped right into it. There's your threepence. Good-day."

He hailed a passing hansom, and drove off at a rattling pace. Will watched him out of sight, then he looked at his fee before he put it into his pocket. One penny, twopence,—and there he stopped in utter amazement. Sandwiched between the two pennies was a glittering half-crown, new and fresh from the mint! Never in all Will's business career had such an event befallen him before.

"Why, if he hasn't gone and given me half a crown!" he cried to Tom Sawyers, who was standing close by, the black terrier at his heels.

Tom whistled. "You're in luck's way to-day, and no mistake! I wish somebody would do as much for me."

"Yes, if he'd meant it; but he didn't. I'll have to give it back to him again," said Will, turning it over and over in his palm.

"Give it back to him!" echoed Tom, derisively. "How are you going to catch that cab, with all the start it's got? You're a bigger duffer than I took you for, Will Tait."

"Who was talking about catching the cab?" retorted Will. "He's sure to be coming across the ferry another day; and it's easy enough to see him,—he's not that little."

"I'd be very sorry to go hunting after any old gentleman," returned Tom, scornfully. "Money's surely cheap your way. I thought you were wanting that dog, too?"

Will's face grew suddenly scarlet. He had wanted it, and here was the exact sum. Why—why, that very night he might be the proud possessor of that black and white dog, and there would not be another like it in the whole brigade. The old gentleman ought to have been more careful. People had no business to go making mistakes of that kind. Somebody ought to teach him a lesson; and it would serve him just right if he, Will, were to keep it.

Will thrust the half-crown deep into his pocket and shouldered his brushes. "I can't stop here talking all the afternoon," he said shortly: "there's two boats missed already."

Something was wrong with Will all the next day. Generally, he was the brightest, merriest lad in the whole company. To-day he wandered about without a civil word for any one. He kept a keen watch upon the coming and going of the boats, too; but it was from behind a convenient fence, whereas his usual post was in the very front rank of the brigade, and his brethren of the brush only reaped what he could not gather up himself.

It was not the weather that was at fault. The sky was blue as summer, and the sunshine made a rippling pathway of light on the water; but there was little light or blueness about it to Will. Everything was shrouded under a cloud of uneasiness and discomfort. Once that afternoon he caught a glimpse of a portly figure in the distance, a perfect stranger, but it sent him with a beating heart into hiding under an archway, till he was quite sure of that fact; for Will had lapsed into the crooked path. He was going to keep that half-crown. He was going to buy the dog, and get the desire of his heart a full fortnight before he had dared to hope for it; and he ought to be feeling particularly happy and jubilant in consequence. But somehow he was not.

He meant to go and see that telegraph clerk this very evening. There wasn't any necessity now for working later; and it might be just as well to miss a boat or two in case. He did not care to finish that sentence even to himself.

Round to the freight station he sauntered accordingly, but at the very gate he came to a full stop. Some wagons inside were being loaded with bales of esparto grass. Will surveyed the process listlessly through the bars. His head ached, his feet ached, he ached inside, too. What was the use of going in about the dog now?

If he got it to night, he didn't believe it would be a bit of pleasure. He didn't like sulking in corners out of sight, as he had done to-day. If he had to go on doing that, he might as well have no dog at all. Will suddenly dragged his cap over his brows, and determined to go home to bed, and end the day as quickly as possible.

And, if the day had been bad, the night was still worse. Will got up at daylight, resolved to stand it no longer. Not for all the half-crowns or all the dogs in the city would he go through another season like this.

It was the very first time he had ever tried to keep what did not belong to him; and it should be the last,—the game was not worth the candle. If the old gentleman came by to-day, he should have that luckless half-crown back. If not, he should have it to-morrow, the next day, or any day that he chose to put in an appearance. Will had done with it; and, if Tom Sawyers made any more remarks about it,—well, so much the worse for Tom Sawyers.

Will was himself again. He took possession again of his front row, and promptly ousted one or two upstarts who had invaded his territory on the strength of yesterday. He whistled over his work as gayly as if he had not a care in the world. There was no hiding under arches to-day, no fears and misgivings at the sight of any portly figure.

Turner asked him rather enviously as the day wore on.

"No, but I'm going to get rid of one," laughed Will. "Never you want to be rich, Jim. I've tried it, and it's no joke I can tell you."

A good many gentlemen were going to and fro from the ferry-boat, but not the one Will was watching for. That was Wednesday. Thursday and Friday it was the same story; but Saturday morning, as Will was taking an early lunch, perched on his favorite wall, came a welcome interruption.

"Now, young man, are you too busy to touch up my boots again?"

Will was off his perch in an instant, his face in a glow. "Oh, I've been looking out for you every day since Wednesday. You went and gave me this last time."

Will was tugging at his pocket as he spoke. He dragged forth a piece of rag, with the half-crown carefully tied up in a corner of it.

The gentleman looked down at it in some surprise. "Oh, it was you that got it, was it? I knew I'd paid it away somewhere."

Will brushed away cheerfully. The gentleman stood thoughtfully turning over his recovered property. "You did not think of keeping it for yourself, I suppose?" he inquired curiously. I couldn't have proved that you had it."

Will's head bent a little lower over the boot on his block. "Yes, I did think of keeping it the first day," he answered, "not after. It was the worst day I ever had."

"I'm glad to hear it," was the comment; "and how did you propose to spend it,—cakes?"

"Cakes!" echoed Will, indignantly; "I was going to buy a dog with it."

"A dog!" echoed the gentleman in return. "What possible use would that be to you? Dogs are always in the road; and they want feeding, too."

"Yes!" Will admitted that; but this dog was different from all others. "Why, he knows me quite well already, just from going past the doors; and he understands every word I say to him, the same as if he could talk."

"Then by all means go and buy him at once. He can't be dear at that price," laughed the gentleman, suddenly dropping the half-crown on the block. "There, that includes to-day's polish, my lad, and twenty-nine others if I like to claim them. We'll make no mistake this time."

The freight station closes at two o'clock on Saturdays. At three minutes to two Will dashed through the gates. At one minute past he came out in triumph with his black-and-white dog beside him.—The Quiver.

JACK'S PRETTY STRIPED THING.

Once upon a time—so long ago that the little child I tell you of is grandpa to half a dozen boys and girls—Jack's father said to his mother,—

"Wife, how would you like to go and live in the country?"

"Oh, so much!" she answered. "And it would be a good thing for little Jack, good for his health. Now and then, when he grows larger, he would have farmers' boys to play with, and not learn the wicked ways of the city."

"Well, wife," said the man, "there will not be many boys to play with just yet, for out West, where I want you to go, we shall clear forests to make our farm, and build our houses of the trees we cut down. We'll have to take provisions for a long time and live rough lives; but three or four men I know are going, and, if you like, I'll join them."

So they talked it over for a while, and Jack's mother agreed to go. Jack did not know much about it. He was pleased with the idea of going "day-day" in the "choo-choo" cars, and had some idea that "mooley-cows" and "chickabiddies" lived in the country. He was a big, bouncing, jolly little Jack, even then; and, when they reached the far, far West, where all those trees were to be cut down, and all those houses built, and all that corn and wheat and those peas and beans and potatoes to be planted, he went paddling about all day, and seemed to think no one could get on without him.

There were buffaloes out on the plains yet; and, when Jack saw some, he clapped his hands, and said, "Nice 'little buffy, tome play with Jack." Now and then a wolf howled. Jack laughed.

There were many dreadful thunderstorms in summer. Jack's mother used to feel nervous, but Jack used to dance with delight, and after a great peal of thunder would say,—

"Mamma, ask the angels to do that again."

"Ain't you frightened, Jack?" some one asked him once; but Jack answered:—

"No. Good angels up in heaven wouldn't hurt Jack."

This was after he was bigger, and had been taught about God and heaven.

When little Jack was three years old, his father made him a little bench just outside the kitchen door, and put a little trellis over it; and his mother planted a beautiful vine and made Jack a little arbor all for himself.

"Just my size," Jack used to say; and, when she gave Jack his bread and milk or his mush and milk, she used to carry the bowl there, and Jack would sit down on the bench and take it on his knees and eat it with the nice shining spoon.

They used to give little boys pewter spoons in those days, but Jack's shone like silver. Now and then he bent it double, but his mother only laughed and gave him another one; for, when his father had time, he used to melt the bent or broken spoons down, and pour the molten pewter into a mould and make new spoons of them, and there was no need of anxiety about them. So the loving mother used to sit at her sewing, or iron, or make bread, and listen to her little boy in his funny little arbor. He talked most of the time; he talked to the cat, to whom he gave some of the milk in a big clam-shell; he talked to the birds in the branches, and to the flowers that nodded at him from the tendrils of the vine; he talked to the yellow butterflies and to himself a great deal.

One day his mother heard him talking to something he called "pretty sing." Evidently he was feeding it. What it could be she did not know, and she became so curious that she looked out of the window; and what she saw very nearly made her faint. There sat little Jack, smiling and happy, and coiled up beside him, swallowing the bread and milk as fast as it could, was a great rattlesnake! Rattlesnakes are very fond of milk, and will always steal it if they can.

Now, if Jack's mother had known nothing about snakes, she might have screamed and caught up a poker and made the snake angry; but, as it was, she bethought her on the instant what was best. A great pan filled with milk stood on the table. Taking it in her hands, she leaned over the sill and placed it on the ground. Jack's little bowl was nearly empty, and as soon as the snake smelt the large quantity of fresh milk in the pan, it turned its head, saw it, and wriggled away toward it. Then Jack's mother reached out of the window, lifted Jack in, and having shut it down and bolted the door, took him in her lap and cried over him.

"Pretty 'triped sing," said Jack, "ate it all up!"

There was a snake-hunt that night, and a nest of snakes was killed; but no one ever told Jack about it until he was a big boy. To him snakes were always pretty. He never could think of them as ugly and venomous, as some people naturally do. When he was a man, he used to talk about them as though it were as possible to love them as any other of God's creatures. Of course, he knew that many were dangerous and their sting deadly, some so dreadfully so that, if one should be bitten, there is scarcely any help; but he believed that very often people need not be stung if they behaved sensibly. Then, too, there are snakes that never yet hurt anybody. A little garter-snake does no more harm than an earthworm, and will wriggle away in terror when it sees any one coming. At all events, to get into a panic is very foolish. Cowardice puts one into danger.—New York Ledger.

A RUSSIAN SLED.

Riding down hill on a cake of ice would not seem to us very amusing, except, perhaps, to the spectators, who might enjoy it as a sort of frozen tub-race. As a matter of fact, though, a cake of ice in the hands of a Russian boy will make a very good and rapid sled. He saws out a block that is longer than it is thick, and about high enough for a comfortable seat. Then he scoops out a hollow like a saddle a little back of the middle of the upper surface, and upholsters it with straw or rags. It is then ready for its first trip down hill; and, if the rider is skilful, he will make very good time on it. But carrying it back to the top of the incline would be too hard work for even a Russian boy, and pushing it up hill would be about as bad. A clever lad once thought of a better way, and all other boys have copied him ever since. He found a good rye straw, and began blowing through it at the front of the block with the end of the straw close to the ice. Soon he had a little hole in the block, as neatly drilled as a steel tool could have done it. In the course of an hour and a half he had driven a hole slantwise through the ice, coming out at the top just in front of the saddle. A stout string passed through the hole and knotted completed his sled, which could then be drawn up hill almost as easily as the best coaster that ever was made. If a boy is careful of his ice sled,—and he is apt to be careful, for considerable work is necessary to make one,—it will last all winter. Imagine him freezing on a new set of runners when the old ones have worn out!—Harper's Young People.

GENERAL GRANT.

How Near His Personal Memoirs Came to be Lost.

A Valuable History Written by a Dying Man. — Proper Nourishment Enabled the Author to Live Until the Completion of His Book.

The fortitude shown by General Grant in writing the second volume of his personal memoirs while he was literally on his deathbed, excels even the remarkable courage exhibited by this famous soldier in his many achievements on the field of battle.

Col. Fred Grant, speaking of his father's last illness, says:—

"During the last four months of his sickness, the principal food of my father, Gen. Grant, was Bovine and milk; and it was the use of this incomparable food alone that enabled him to finish the second volume of his personal memoirs."

Dr. T. H. Douglas, Gen. Grant's physician and friend, cordially indorses the above statement.

What Bovine did for Gen. Grant it has done, and is now doing, for thousands every day. It is the most wonderful concentration into a small bulk of all the life-giving, muscle, flesh, and blood-making elements of lean, raw meat ever produced.

It is in no way a medicine, simply a food invigorant, that by its strengthening qualities gives the worn-out or disordered vital centres of the body an impetus that again starts them performing their natural functions.

It is indorsed by eminent physicians everywhere, and blessed by thousands whose lives it has actually saved.

To neglect to use this wonderful food in all cases of debility, wasting diseases, overwork, stomach and nerve diseases, or for weak infants, chronic invalids, loss of vitality in old age, is to throw away one of the greatest chances of saving life.

EBEN CARLTON SPRAGUE, LL.D.

The late Eben Carlton Sprague, who peacefully finished a beautiful and useful life on the 14th of February last, was the son of one of the founders of the First Unitarian Church of Buffalo, now known as the Church of Our Father. His lifelong and intimate relations with this society, his prominence as an interested layman at most of the meetings of the National Conference of Unitarian Churches at Saratoga and elsewhere, and his wide personal acquaintance in New England seem to invite the expression of something more than passing comment in the columns of the Christian Register.

Mr. Sprague was born in Bath, N.H., in 1822, but lived in Buffalo the remainder of his life. He was a graduate of Phillips Exeter Academy and Harvard College (1843), receiving the honorary degree of LL.D. from Harvard University in 1893. By profession a lawyer, he stood at the head of the local bar. As president, at one time or another, of the Buffalo Library, the Buffalo Club, the Liberal Club, and chancellor of the University of Buffalo, as well as a director in many other associations of a philanthropic character, Mr. Sprague showed his active interest in and sympathy with his fellow-men of all kinds and conditions. The projectors of every movement for the betterment of social conditions, for the promotion of culture, or the spread of just and liberal ideas, always turned to Mr. Sprague for help and guidance, if, indeed, he happened not to be a prime mover in such enterprises himself.

Strength of character and sweetness of nature were seldom more winningly blended in a man than in this open-minded, open-handed, cultivated gentleman. "He was," says his pastor, "one of the most gentle and approachable men I have ever known." A professional brother, who knows the value of words, pronounced him "the finest flower of American citizenship." Always a hard worker, he found solace and refreshment in good company and good books to the very last; while his conversational gifts made him a coveted guest at every board.

A workman in a street-car, overhearing a talk between Mr. Sprague and a friend, remarked, as the former alighted from the car, "Fine old man, isn't he?" It was a perfectly spontaneous tribute. All men loved this man, because he loved all men. The best legacy he could have left his city was the example of his life. Next in value, perhaps, was the statement of his life's philosophy contained in an address on "Liberalism" made by him as president of the Liberal Club at its first dinner in the season of 1894-95. "A man," he said, "may be touched with noble anger: this is one of the sinews of the soul. But a man can never be touched with a noble contempt for any one of his fellow-beings."

What Mr. Sprague was to his own household we know, but may not say. But to all his friends, without exception, it seems as though the beatitudes of a manly, honorable, pure, and upright life conspired at its close to insure the good man a happy translation. With faculties unimpaired, with all sympathies with his kind warm and fresh, after an evening of reading aloud by his own fireside, as was his wont, he simply fell asleep. It was the beautiful ending of a beautiful life.

Temperance.

Following the example of Sweden, Russia has gone in for a State monopoly of the manufacture and sale of spirits.

The School Board of St. Joseph, Mo., has decided to expel from the public schools of that city any scholar found using cigarettes.

A "home saloon" has been fitted up in Chicago with all the familiar accessories of the ordinary saloon, including free lunches, but with no intoxicating drinks for sale. It is to be under the oversight of Bishop Fallows of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

Marro found that 31 per cent. of criminals whom he studied were children of alcoholized parents; and Rossi, out of 71, found 31 per cent. of the same hereditary taint. This includes those who were criminals from direct intemperance only so far as they were children of drunken heredity.

Mr. Charles Féré, a well-known authority at Paris on nervous and mental diseases, has taken an original method of ascertaining the effect of alcohol on embryonic life. He exposed hens' eggs during the period of incubation to the fumes of alcohol. Some were thus treated during twenty-six and some during forty-eight hours. He observed that this delayed the growth of the chick in the shell, and occasioned numerous monstrosities. One batch of eggs was kept under alcoholic fumes for a hundred hours. At the end of that time the germ was not as much developed as it would have been after twenty hours of hatching under the ordinary conditions. The doctor concludes from this that the children of drunken parents are at the time of birth less developed than those of sober parents, and that there are positive arrests of development in many cases. In proof of the correctness of his conclusion the Quarterly Journal of Inebriety gives convincing figures relative to twenty-four families,—twelve temperate and twelve intemperate.—Inquirer.

Personals.

The late Prof. Froude left directions for the burning of all his papers. This disposes of considerable material relating to Carlyle, the publication of which many people were awaiting with much interest.

After long and invaluable service in the library of the Institute of Technology Mr. Clement Walker Andrews has been unanimously elected librarian of the new John Crerer Library of Chicago. The general testimony is that no man could be found better fitted for the position.

Dr. Martineau will be ninety on April 21. An address of congratulation for presentation to him on his birthday is in course of signature by Unitarian ministers, officials, and others. It recalls the untiring interest which he has manifested in the principle and welfare of the churches, in education of the young, the progress of religious thought, and the advancement of learning.

Prince Guy de Lusignan, head of the royal house of Cyprus, Jerusalem and Armenia, and Grand Master of the order of St. Catharine of Mount Sinai, has conferred upon Rev. Dr. E. R. Knowles the decoration with the commander's rank. The order was instituted in 1063; and the royal family of Armenia, already illustrious, became a reigning house with Hugues III. in A.D. 900. The late Armenian Patriarch, Khorene de Lusignan, was the brother of H. R. H. Prince Guy de Lusignan.

Here and There.

The empress of China has started a vast silk-weaving department, in which employment will be given to thousands of girls and women. The industry will be carried on in the palace grounds, which her majesty is forbidden to leave.

Arizona has a greater number of varieties of forest trees than any of the other States or Territories of equal area west of the Mississippi River, a greater number than Michigan or California, and nearly 18 per cent. of the species of the United States.

The number of sea-gulls on the Thames has become one of the sights of London. People make a habit of feeding them with bread and biscuits thrown from the bridges or the embankment. Owing to their famishing condition, they have grown quite tame.

Eighteen years ago Peter B. Brigham, a native of Vermont, gave $1,000,000 for a free public hospital for Boston, to bear his name, on the condition that the bequest should remain untouched and draw interest for twenty-five years. When it becomes available, seven years hence, the trustees will have nearly $3,000,000 in their hands.

It is not generally known in England that the Russians are making great effort to acclimatize the tea plant on the eastern shore of the Black Sea. Within the past year or two several new plantations have been commenced with a large expenditure of capital supplied by some of the great firms of tea merchants in Moscow. The results up to now have been most satisfactory.

Between the years 1763 and 1775, when indigo was at the height of its importance, South Carolina had a most unexampled period of prosperity. Ramsay tells us that "indigo proved more profitable to South Carolina than the mines of Mexico or Peru to Old or New Spain." Wealth poured in upon the people, many of the planters doubling their capital every three or four years. During the years preceding the Revolution it is said that "a larger number of children were sent to England for education from South Carolina than from any of the colonies, and this on account of the greater wealth of the colony, owing to the superiority of her products,—rice and indigo,—which gave abundant means."

LIP-READING.

A Columbus paper has published some accounts of the stone-deaf Ohio lawyer, in full practice, who depends absolutely upon lip-reading, and who has tried cases in Columbus courts. For twelve years now Mr. N. B. Lutes of Tiffin, Ohio, has depended entirely upon lip-reading to do all that any lawyer does for his clients in court and in every phase of the practice of the law.

The latest issue of the Missouri Deaf-mute Record gives an account of a lady who reads the lips of ministers and public speakers. Mr. Alexander Hunter of the United States Land Office in Washington, D.C., is "deaf as an adder." Though far from perfect in lip-reading, he has read one hundred and fifty words "given out" from the dictionary without making a mistake. He has read the lips of Beecher and Booth almost faultlessly, and has greatly enjoyed pulpit and platform orators and some of the great actors, the chief drawback in reading their lips being the shifting of their positions on the stage, so that their lips were at times invisible.

Mitchell, the chemist, an examiner in the United States Patent Office, graduated from the Clarke Institute, Northampton, Mass., and, though a poor lip-reader, graduated from the Worcester (Mass.) Polytechnic School as an analytical chemist.

For many years a totally deaf man has occupied a place in the United States Civil Service, receiving his first appointment on the strength of admirable papers in the civil service examination. Notwithstanding his infirmity, thanks to his lip-reading, he took the regular course at a great university, recited with his classmates, attended lectures, and secured his degree. I doubt if president or professors knew that he was a deaf man. Certainly some of his classmates did not know it. For business reasons his deafness is kept secret, and a keen newspaper man went through the office in which he was employed a few years ago in search of a deaf clerk, and failed to find such a man or any one who knew of the existence of such a case in that department.—Dr. S. M. Miller, in the Popular Science Monthly for March.

Music.

We need fresh music for Easter, as we need fresh flowers; and, while there are many old anthems and solos that bloom anew every year, organists and choirs and congregations are looking for something new and beautiful. Oliver Ditson & Co. have a catalogue of Easter music which embraces many new compositions as well as established favorites.

Charities and Reforms.

The idea prevails in Europe that nervous diseases are creating great ravages every year in this country, owing to the exciting mode of life of the people and to some other causes. One of the latter is excessive tea-drinking, which forms the text for an article in the London Spectator.

The report of the Burnham Industrial Farm shows that 223 boys of criminal, vicious, truant, or disobedient habits have been received. Of these 57 are now in the school. 80 per cent. of those discharged have proved by useful lives the value of their teaching and discipline. This institution was founded in 1886.

According to Mr. Amos G. Warner, who has compiled reports on over eight thousand cases of destitution in Boston, New Haven, New York, and Baltimore, only 25.1 per cent. were due to misconduct, while 74.9 were due to misfortune. The misconduct cases are classified by direct causes and nationalities, and it appears that 15.28 per cent. were due to intemperance. The Americans are slightly below and the English slightly above this average. The Germans are far below it, furnishing only 7.83 per cent.; while the colored people are even more temperate in their habits, furnishing only 6.23 per cent. The Irish, on the other hand, furnished a larger percentage under this head than any other nationality,—23.62. Taking all the causes of destitution due to misconduct by nationalities, we find that the Irish lead, with 30.4 per cent.; the English come next, with 27.99 per cent.; the Americans, 27.33 per cent.; the Germans, with 16.84 per cent.; and the colored people last of all, 13.73 per cent.—Ram's Horn.

CARE FOR YOUNG CRIMINALS.—In Austria, as in England, there is a strong humanitarian feeling in favor of discriminating between youthful criminals and those whom a long career of crime has hardened almost beyond hope of reclamation. A debate took place on the subject last week in the Austrian Diet, the discussion centring round the question whether or not young law-breakers should be sent to reformatories or houses of correction instead of to the common gaols, there to herd with unshamed gaol-birds. Herr Schöffel, deputy of the Provincial Diet, was the chief pleader for the enlightened policy of separation. It was true, he said, that, owing to his persistency and continual rudeness, they had passed a law requiring reformatories to be established; but it had largely remained a dead-letter, no one seeming to care whether or not it was carried into effect. Herr Schöffel contrasted the apathy of Austria with the vigilance of England, stating that, while English criminal statistics showed a falling off in youthful delinquents of sixty-five per cent., in Austria the number of sentenced young criminals had increased forty-two per cent. Last year in Austria three thousand children had been convicted of small offences, and yet the two Austrian reformatories of which he had knowledge were only about half full. He prophesied an awful criminal future for the country if they continue to send ninety-two per cent. of their young offenders to the common gaols and only eight per cent. to reformatories.

Mrs. Anna Garlin Spencer does not believe that poverty alone is sufficient reason for separating children from their parents. She says: "I am not a believer in the extreme creed of some branches of the charity organization movement in England, which seems to have the moral and sympathetic nerve so strongly developed, and yet can say: 'Here is a mother with six children. She can take care of three. Strike off the other three, and put them somewhere else.' But, if society undertakes to take care of those three children taken from their mother, it will, in the long run, pay in some other way as much in actual money for the support of those children as it would cost to help the mother until the children were grown to help her and themselves. When you do such a thing as that, you waste all that long careful training of the ages which the parent has had in parental affection, you waste by cutting the close tie which grows stronger and stronger as the years go on between parent and child. I would use the surgeon's firmness in making the separation when there are moral taints that must be fatal in their effect upon the child if it is to have a fair chance in the world. And I care nothing for that parental affection which looks upon its children simply as so much merchandise. I know that a great deal of parental affection is a very cheap sort, not much above that of the cat or the dog; but, on your peril, do nothing to lessen it."

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Spring No. 2, for the Gouty Diathesis, Bright's Disease, Etc.

Dr. Thomas H. Buckler, of Paris (formerly of Baltimore), Suggester of Lithia as a Solvent for Uric Acid, says:

"Nothing that I could say would add to the well-known reputation of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER. I have frequently used it with good results in Uric Acid Diathesis, Rheumatism and Gout, and with this object I have ordered it to Europe, from Coleman & Rogers, of Baltimore. Lithia is in no form so valuable as where it exists in the Carbonate, the form of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER. Nature's mode in which it is found in BUFFALO LITHIA WATER of solution and division in water which has passed through Lepidolite and Spodumene Mineral formations."

Dr. William B. Towles, Professor of Anatomy and Materia Medica in the Medical Department of the University of Virginia.

"I feel no hesitancy whatever in saying that in Gout, Rheumatic Gout, Rheumatism, Stone in the Bladder, and in all Diseases of Uric Acid Diathesis, I know of no remedy more efficacious than BUFFALO LITHIA WATER. Its effects are at all comparable to BUFFALO LITHIA WATER marked in causing a disappearance of albumen from the urine. In a single case of Bright's Disease of the Kidneys I witnessed decided beneficial results from its use, and from its action in this case I should have great confidence in it as a remedy in certain stages of this disease. In Dyspepsia, especially that form of it in which there is an excessive production of acid during the process of nutrition, in some of the peculiar affections of women, and in Chronic Malarial Poisoning, etc., I have found it highly efficacious."

Dr. Graeme M. Hammond, of New York, Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the New York Post-Graduate Medical School and Hospital:

"In all cases of Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, I have found BUFFALO LITHIA WATER of the greatest service in increasing the quantity of urine and in eliminating the albumen."

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age.

Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Pleasantries.

He: "Do you subscribe to the theory of evolution?" She (the hopeless parvenu): "No. What are the subscription rates?"—Pacific Unitarian.

A little three-year-old, looking out of the window the other day, called out eagerly: "Oh, see, see! There's the letter-man coming with his hot-water bag."

Fred: "What do you think of my argument?" Will: "Sound,—most certainly sound." Fred: "And what else?" Will: "Nothing else,—merely sound."—Boston Globe.

"Did Alfred show you the picture he painted for this exhibition?" "Yes." "Do you think it deserved to be hung?" "No. I think it should be burned."—Beacon.

Proud Father: "That is a sunset my daughter painted. She studied painting abroad, you know." Friend: "Ah! that explains it. I never saw a sunset like that in this country."—Puck.

A young Scotchman at Aldershot fell ill, and was sent to the hospital. A bath was ordered. It was brought into the chamber where the invalid lay. He looked at it hard for some time, and then threw up his hands and bawled: "O doctor, doctor! I canna drink a' that!"

From Advice to Subscribers in a Popular Weekly Paper.—When you are introduced to a lady and the remark is made, "I am pleased to meet you," you may say, "I am sure the pleasure is mutual." If it is a gentleman who is presented and makes the remark, you might simply say, "Thank you," and smile. How reassuring to be told that it is not improper to smile "when it is a gentleman"!

One day recently, in a Dundee, Scotland, school, the teacher was examining the class in history, and asked one of the boys, "How did Charles I. die?" The boy paused for a moment, and one of the other lads, by way of prompting him, put his arm up to his collar to signify decapitation. Boy No. 1 at once grasped, as he thought, his friend's meaning, and exclaimed, to the great amusement of the class, "Please, sir, he died of cholera."

A Unitarian minister of this State has a small boy just now devoted to athletics. It was the good fortune of the family to entertain Mrs. Julia Ward Howe the other day, and the older daughter tried to impress the little fellow with the importance of their guest. "She is a great woman," said the sister. "Not so very," said he. "But I mean she is a very remarkable woman, dear." "Hm!" was the answer; "I don't believe she can even hang by her toes."

Mr. Eugene Field, according to the Chap Book, once in London took a prominent literary lady in to dinner. She was monumental and impassive, and several courses passed in a decent and orderly silence. Finally, she turned to Mr. Field and said: "Tell us of Chicago,—of your habits and customs. I have never known any one who lived there." And Mr. Field replied, beginning thus: "Well, when I was caught, I was living in a tree."

Mr. Wiman gave two handsome public bath-houses to Toronto, which are situated on either side of the bay, and inscribed in bold letters "Wiman's Baths." Some time ago, as the British Association excursion was sailing into that city, one of the scientists discovered the signs. "Ah," said he, turning to a friend, "I told you the Americans were an uneducated lot!" "Why so?" returned the other, in amazement. "Don't you see those signs there? What an atrocious way to spell 'women's'!"—Boston Home Journal.

A STORY OF MASOAGNI.

A good story was told recently by a member of the Melba concert company of Mascagni, the composer. During the latter's visit to London, while in his room at a hotel, he heard an organ-grinder play the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana." The man, playing the piece entirely too fast, exasperated Mascagni, and, descending into the street, the composer addressed the organist, saying:—

"You play this entirely too fast. Let me show you how it ought to be played."

"And who are you?" asked the wandering minstrel.

"I happen to be the composer of that piece," replied Mascagni; and then he played the intermezzo for the astonished organ-grinder in the correct tempo. Imagine Mascagni's surprise when on the following day he saw the same organ-grinder in front of his hotel with a placard on the organ, on which was inscribed in large letters

"PUPIL OF MASOAGNI."

Editorial.

THE addresses delivered at the last Boston Unitarian Club, which we publish this week, open the important question of the uses of a church. It is treated very fully by Mr. Fenn in the opening paper, and on special and suggestive lines by Rev. E. R. Shippen and Rev. F. A. Gilmore. The field for discussion is a fruitful one. In the largest sense a church stands for the idea of God and the idea of man. It means worship and brotherhood; but just how it shall work out, practically, its ideal it is not so easy to say. There is a danger, which Mr. Fenn points out, that it may broaden out its activity until it becomes thin and inefficient; but there is an equal danger that, in contracting its sphere, it may contract its ideals. There is a healthy conviction that a church is not a church to-day unless it is a house of man as well as a house of God. We believe that no hard and fast lines can be drawn as to its precise functions. It must depend a good deal upon where it is placed, the needs that appeal to it, the wealth of its opportunities. The problem of the country church, though ideally the same, is practically different from that of the city church. The church on Fifth Avenue has a practically different problem from that in Washington Square or Rivington Street, though both are seeking to make God like men and women. Often the best work of a church may be done in inspiring its members to enter into lines of work and effort in the way of philanthropy and education which are larger than it can undertake itself. An associated charity organization, a good government club, a literary club, is better when organized on undenominational lines than on those which are sectarian. Yet a church which opens its doors and introduces specialists to discuss these themes is educating its members in social, fraternal, and philanthropic duties. No church can be really theistic which is not humanitarian. The church, wherever it is, must keep in touch with the life and needs of its age. The church which stands for a theory of religion on one side, or for some sectarian method of philanthropy on the other, is not fulfilling its function. But the most useless of all churches is the one which sits still and sucks its thumbs, and wonders what it is here for.

It requires but little provocation to make some of our senators and representatives put on their feathers and war paint, seize their knives and tomahawks, and go through the motions of a scalp dance. The "Alliance" incident has furnished an opportunity to these dramatic politicians and others to indulge in a good deal of jingo bluster. We do not mean that the firing upon American vessels by a Spanish cruiser is a trifling matter. It is something which should and which did receive the prompt attention of the Department of State, and there is no reason to suppose that Spain will not make a proper apology. But it is hardly time before we have received the Spanish version of the affair to put down the pen and take up the sword. The pursuit of a "vigorous foreign policy" is a convenient and common device of certain politicians to court popularity. It is so easy to wrap one's self in the American flag, strike an attitude, and clamor for its vindication. We would not diminish the national pride of these impetuous patriots, but we would have it take a more rational manifestation.

THERE is a good deal of political trading going on at the present time, based on a supposed allegiance to the American flag. A new newspaper has been started in Boston with the American flag at its head and with the avowed purpose to speak the truth. The flag is a noble symbol for any paper to adopt, and the determination to speak the truth is a laudable ambition for a newspaper. But neither of these things ought to be uncommon. Every American paper ought to be both patriotic and veracious. No paper can have a monopoly of patriotism simply by carrying the American flag at the masthead, and the sincerity of the declaration to tell the truth must be judged by the way in which it is fulfilled. If the Standard is going to be a really American paper, let it show its patriotism by protesting against the pseudo-Americanism which, fostered by secret societies, has deliberately undertaken to persecute a large class of American citizens on account of their religious beliefs. There is no more un-American organization in this country than the American Protective Association; and, if the Standard does not succeed in speaking the truth any better than many of those who champion that movement, its veracity will be as poor as its patriotism. If this paper succeeds in representing the highest ideals of Americanism and the highest ideals of truth, it will do something for journalism and something for the country. But a good deal that poses as Americanism to-day is foolish, unpatriotic drivel.

MANY warm controversies have flamed up in the Church on the question of church music, which has always seemed to be saturated with inflammable material. A great agitation occurred in Puritan churches when the singing of hymns was substituted for the singing of psalms. There was a fight over the introduction of flutes and bass-voils, over the introduction of choir singing, and then afterwards over the introduction of the organ. This has been a burning question in Scotland and in the United Presbyterian Church in this country. And now the Jews are going through the same controversy. The Jewish World objects to the innovation on the ground that to play the organ is to work, and work is prohibited on the Sabbath. This objection might be removed by introducing an electric or water motor; and, if the manipulation of the keyboard, which many people regard as "play," is still classified as work, an automatic organ, such as the Symphony or the Æolian, might be introduced. If our Hebrew friends want to be historical, perhaps they will introduce the ram's horn. It might not have the effect of blowing down the walls of the synagogue as it felled the walls of Jericho, but it would probably drive out a good many of the congregation.

THE question of the use of individual cups at the communion service has been discussed pro and con in the Christian Advocate. It has been objected that the use of individual cups would develop caste feeling. But Rev. Dr. Holliday of Columbus, Ohio, says: "As we do not regard the use of individual cups as unscriptural, we care nothing about the squeamishness of their use; nor do we see any 'caste' in this innovation. Some ministers have been wiping the rim of the cup with a napkin, while others have been carrying a cup in each hand,—one for ladies, and the other for gentlemen. There might be some evidence of 'caste' in the last-named arrangement, but we fail to see any in separate cups at the Lord's table any more than at any other table." Rev. Dr. Ryan of Michigan writes: "We use the individual cup, simultaneous method, in First Methodist Episcopal Church, Ypsilanti, Mich.; and, so far as I know, it is the unanimous testimony that it constitutes the most beautiful, chaste, solemn, and impressive sacramental service that it has ever been the privilege of the people here to attend. We have a membership of nearly seven hundred, and I do not believe there is a single individual among us who would be willing to return to the old method." Some Unitarian churches have regarded the contents of the cup as more dangerous than the vessel, and have substituted water for wine. Others do not pass either bread or wine, but hold a simple memorial service. It is evident that in the whole matter the spirit is more important than the form.

THERE are Presbyterians who believe in Calvinism, and there are Presbyterians who do not. The Cumberland Presbyterians are of the latter sort. They point out the contradictions and difficulties of a system which they long since abandoned. Thus in a late issue the Cumberland Presbyterian said: "The number of the eternally reprobate as well as the number of the elect is 'so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.' At least, this is the teaching of the Presbyterian Confession of Faith. Now, if one of the eternally reprobate should die in infancy, what would become of him? He could not be saved, for that would be adding one to the number of the elect and making the reprobates one less. We must conclude either that God allows none but elect infants to die—that is that he takes better care of reprobate than elect children—or else that he sends some non-elect infants to perdition. True, not one in ten of our Presbyterian brethren believe in this medieval nonsense; and this makes it the more surprising that they do not revise it out of their book."

THE question of church unity between different denominations is not more difficult of settlement than the question of unity between different branches and divisions of the same denominations. Thus there are several different kinds of Presbyterianism, and it is hard to find a composition which will weld them together. Federation of these different sections has often been proposed, and is again under consideration. But Rev. Dr. J. L. Scott, in the Presbyterian Journal, shows some of the difficulties that will be encountered: "The entire federation will consist of sixty-four delegates. One-half will be composed of psalm-singing churches, and their vote will tie the convention from the first. It is just as possible, or more so, to federate with the Episcopal Church as with at least four of the churches named. It is not a matter of individual volition, but every one of those delegates is tied to a system from which he cannot escape. Thirty-two cannot sing a hymn: twenty-four under no circumstances would allow the use of an organ. It would require five tables, separate and distinct, in order to celebrate the communion." Dr. Scott predicts failure for the scheme; and, unless some great unifying principle is accepted to draw all to a common centre, it is probable that the prediction will be fulfilled.

AMERICA'S UTTERMOST.

The recent report of the Tenement House Commission, and the farewell letter of Gen. Booth in the New York World, would compel us to ask if American civilization be really based on the Christianity of him who came to save "to the uttermost." On the contrary, has not another sort of Christianity ruled the world, for the most part, up to the present date? The New York Commission does little more than echo a report made forty years ago by a committee of the legislature, which closed by saying that the first and only consideration before the people was to provide sanitary homes for every man, woman, and child; that as the houses were, so were the people; and that, if you would cure drunkenness, you must attack rotten tenements. The later committee says that it finds that America, with all its boasted progress, has succeeded in packing humanity more densely in least hopeful conditions than even the oldest cities of Europe. The city of New York has 143.2 per acre population. Paris comes next, with 125.2; but the conditions of existence in Paris are far superior to those in several American cities. In New York's Tenth Ward there are 626.26 to an acre, while in one district the density culminates at 986.4 persons to every one of the thirty-two acres. How is this density accomplished? Simply by adding to the bad enough ordinary tenement rear buildings so as to cover the whole area of a block almost solidly with houses, leaving only a narrow space of possibly fifteen feet between walls seven to ten stories high. Down into these pits sunlight never finds its way, and hardly any light. The air is eternally pregnant with poison and stench, and the steam of a thousand employments. The bottom strata has a basement lower still,—a cellar life from which Dante could have borrowed pictures of hell as horrible as any that comprise his Inferno.

Those who have looked into this matter personally—and it is the grand duty of every citizen to do so for himself—will have stamped on his brain a never-fading picture of human horrors. Winding by narrow, tortuous, slimy steps, one comes on door after door which opens to reveal degradation that cannot be written down. Girls and boys nearly naked, a drunken mother, and poverty at its worst; but at the next door a clean room and a helpless old woman, with a Bible and a fag-end of life burning out in dreary loneliness. She has seen better days; but, for the most part, it is a terrible struggle to live. Not one in fifty of these families occupying only a single room, or at best two rooms, but has a degree of longing for betterment. They are only too glad to have their children taught bread-winning and soul-saving truths. Many of them live in almost total darkness; and the eyes of whole families become afflicted with ophthalmia, and then blindness. The sick cannot be cared for. There are no such things as sanitary conditions or healing conditions. "All hope yield, ye who enter here."

Mr. Booth is disappointed with America. From his standpoint he has a right to be. Whatever we have done politically to advance human conditions, we have fallen completely into the slough of European social helplessness. In fact, Glasgow, Birmingham, Berlin, are reforming away from us. Mr. Booth says: "I expected to find you extremely wise. I don't think I ever saw so much humbug, so much appeal to prejudice, so little calm decision in matters affecting public safety. The millionaire is on top now, and the great crowd is struggling underneath in misery. They are the sans-culottes,—the breechless fellows. The next revolution will not be by force: it will be by your own ballot-box. You have here the darkest New York, besides your tramp population of one million,—the criminals, gamblers, and all who live by the vices of others. They procreate like vermin. This is just as it is in darkest England."

But let us understand that the social sentiment of the day does not believe in the need of pauperism. It has slowly been convincing itself that society may absolutely abolish the disease of poverty. There will then still be an uttermost, but a saved uttermost,—an upward and not a downward-looking uttermost. The plan proposed by Mr. Booth to attack social misery as founded the world. He actually believed pauperism could be done away with, and poverty be left nowhere without a silver lining. Members of Parliament laughed. Bishops preached him down. But a few said: "Give him a trial. He has faith." But this faith has spread. The scheme proposed by Mr. Booth included labor bureaus, shelters, workshop, a prison gate house, and farm colonies, besides a household salvage brigade and depots for food. That this is the finality in our social struggle, and wholly workable, is not worth discussing. It is certainly getting down to the roots, where soup-houses and promiscuous charity and legislation for temporary relief never did get. The English legislative programme turns on this same question of abolishing social misery. It is charged with new faith. No ministry could last a month that left out social reform from its budget. Germany has inaugurated child colonies. It has also adopted a system of old-age pensions. It has based these on compulsory insurance of all laborers against illness, and of all employees against accidents. Insurance comes one-third from wages and two-thirds from employers. Legislation to the same end in this country has been less rational as well as less useful. There is a spirit in it all of vote-buying. But the air is full of confidence that the horrors of our present social system are remediable. To the uttermost there may and must be salvation. Every one should have not only sympathy with poor, but should, above all, make a thorough study of the subject, and be ready for enlightened voting as well as co-operation otherwise. The day for preaching up another world as a balance to this has passed: we must take the world we have and make it the best.

Where does faith come in? Have we given up the old gospel? Really, at no period of religious history has faith been more needed or had a more generous welcome. The work that goes down to the bottom of society needs such faith in God as was never exercised before,—and such faith in man. Optimism is the first duty,—not mere belief, but a working faith. The world never before saw a deliberate purpose to put out misery and create social conditions involving betterment and hope for every human being. The whole of Christianity so exhausted itself in believing creeds that quarrelled over eternal rewards for the handful and hells for the masses that there was no strength left for faith in God here and now, and in the salvation of the pitiful from present damnation. Even the rise of modern science, while overthrowing mediævalism, did not deliver us from pessimism. Heredity took the place of decrees, to keep the uttermost down. We got rid of Malthus and Calvin, only to get a scientific restatement of the doctrine that some are born under a hopeless blight. But a better faith shines forth. It is Jesus in the colleges; it is Christ in the legislative halls. We must save to the uttermost, or go down from the uppermost.

THE NORWEGIAN BILL.

We have received the following communication from the secretary of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society, replying to an "Editorial Note" in the Christian Register of March 14, in which we urged that it would be better for the society to let the bill have a fair trial:—

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

1. We have placed no "orators in the field." The only persons authorized to speak for us on the system were Rev. Dr. Plumb and Dr. H. A. Gibbs, who were desired by the society to appear before the legislative committee, and did so March 14, after the Register article was printed.

2. We have printed no pamphlets on the subject. The January number of the Temperance Cause contained an article against the system, and the February number had an article in reply, favoring the system. We have issued no leaflet on the subject since September, 1893, and have not circulated any for over a year.

3. At the annual meeting of the society held Jan. 23, 1895, which meeting was legally advertised, a vote was passed unanimously condemning the system. No member or contributor has complained to the office of the attitude of the society.

4. There is not the slightest evidence that the president of this society officially signed any document favoring the system.

ALFRED NOON, Secretary.

In another letter Dr. Noon says, "Please remember that I did not say the society is not opposing the Norwegian Bill, but that we did not do the specific act that you had supposed, and probably had good reasons to suppose"; that is to say, the circulation of tracts and the putting of an orator in the field against the system.

The specific acts referred to were not what we complained of, but the opposition of the society to the Norwegian Bill. The system was condemned at the annual meeting January last; and, though no orators were placed in the field, Rev. Dr. Plumb and Dr. H. H. Gibbs, as the secretary states, were authorized and desired by the society to appear before the legislative committee in opposition to the bill.

We do not deny the right of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society to take action against this bill, and to send members to the State House to do all they can to defeat it. We only regret that, if the society cannot encourage the bill, it should not be willing to withhold its active opposition and to give the permissive law an opportunity to be tried. The collections of the society have fallen off in the last year, partly owing to the hard times; but we believe there are many who will be surely alienated if the society is to be diverted from the educational work which is its true function to the work of opposing legislative measures for the regulation of the traffic made in the interest of temperance and good order. It is undoubtedly true that the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society, in educating men and women to abstain from intoxicating liquor, can accomplish results which cannot be obtained by the Norwegian system; but we also believe that, under present conditions, the Norwegian system can accomplish results in the reduction of the traffic which cannot be obtained by the society.

Meanwhile the liquor men rejoice that the most serious legislative blow which has been aimed at them should be opposed by this society; and, if they relax their efforts this year in the legislature against it, it is because they are willing that Dr. Plumb and Dr. Gibbs, in behalf of the society, should secure its defeat for them.

Mr. Noon's statement that the president of the society has not officially signed any protest against the bill is calculated to mislead those who do not place the right emphasis on the word "officially." The ground ex-Gov. Long has taken may be seen from the following letter written last year and with a postscript written a few weeks since:—

Dear Mr. Thorp,—I have not given the Norwegian Bill sufficient study, nor do I comprehend its effect enough to give an opinion as to its merits by which I should wish to be bound. But I am much impressed by the statement which Mrs. Livermore makes. Under our present law we have prohibition in all towns that vote for it; and, the Norwegian Bill not applying to them, they would not be affected by it.

I understand that it will apply to those only which have twice in succession voted for license. In those, therefore, it would be simply a question between the present system of license (with the profit going to the professional liquor-seller, who has every stimulus to enlarge that profit) and the Norwegian system, which more sharply restrains and regulates the traffic and gives the profit to responsible hands, with no inducement to enlarge it. Even in our license towns it could not be adopted except by majority vote. It would seem, therefore, that, first, there is very little chance, even if the bill is enacted, of its becoming operative at present in more than two or three municipalities,—the rest will wait the result in them; and, second, that in those two or three it cannot be worse, but is likely to be better in its effects than the license system which it will displace. Under these circumstances, I am inclined to think that it would be wise to try the experiment, if only as an experiment, in those two or three towns that would give it a chance.

Truly yours,
JOHN D. LONG.

J. G. THORP, JR.

Dear Mr. Thorp,—I am still of the same opinion, and am glad that your bill of this year adds still further safeguards.

Truly,
JOHN D. LONG.

March 9, 1895.

There are many strong temperance men who practically believe as ex-Gov. Long does, and who therefore prefer to follow the leading of the president of the Massachusetts Total Abstinence Society rather than that of the secretary.

CONSIDER THE LILIES.

It is like shutting the stable door after the horse is stolen to describe the spring exhibition of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society when the cut flowers have faded and the hundreds of blossoming plants have been scattered to the many greenhouses of the State. Still, those who failed to see the exhibition of last week may be incited to take a lesson from the flowers when next the Horticultural Society opens its doors to the public.

The two halls were scenes of marvellous beauty, bewitching the eye with the wealth of color and perfection of form, and ensnaring the senses with the mingled sweetness of Easter lilies and orange blossoms. To one who has gathered the scented cyclamens of the Austrian Alps, or on the sunny hillsides of the Ionian Isles has picked handfuls of their white and pink-tinged blossoms, the cyclamens of this exhibition were simply wonders. The original shades of color were there. The general outline of form was unmistakable. The leaves were the same mottled and richly beautiful objects clustering above the roots. But in profusion, in size, in depth of color, they were wonderfully unlike. There is no more difference between the court ladies of Athens and the bare-footed peasant girls among the hills than between the almost ethereal cyclamens of Greece and the royally clad beauties that flaunted their magnificent colors in Horticultural Hall.

"Where did they get that deep rich color?" we asked a gardener.

"Oh, we've been working for it for years," he replied.

"And this mass of white, on which, by count, three hundred flowers, each four inches across, are blooming,—how did you get that?"

"By cultivation." It was the same story everywhere, though more pronounced in the case of the cyclamens; for there has never been such an exhibition of them in Boston before. The roses; the cinerarias, in their Joseph's coat of many colors; the innumerable individuals of the lily family; and many another plant and flower,—repeated the same tale. They were all the results of cultivation, of education, of patient toil and incessant care.

And yet, with all this mass of beauty, this absolute prodigality of hue and increase of size, there was something intangible missing. One stood beside great roses, almost like young cabbages in size and fulness, and thought with a tinge of regret of the single-petalled Cherokee rose, in its brilliant whiteness; or the eglantine, half hidden among its fragrant leaves; or the simple "violet by a mossy stone." The cinerarias were masses of bloom; but, somehow, they suggested over-dressed, dusky belles. And their simpler cousins of the composite family lost nothing in grace and simplicity by comparison. And even the gorgeous cyclamens, so heavy with beauty that they leaned on each other for support, had lost the delicacy of their wild sisters, each balancing on its own stock in the autumn wind; and, as one bent over them, there was no sweet breath of perfume such as we were wont to know.

Is there in this a parable? Is it true, as some modern writers claim, that along with the culture, the training, the higher mental and physical development of humanity, a certain spiritual essence has disappeared? It is said that in India, when the young men have received a college training, and have once broken caste, they are apt to become intemperate; and it is believed by many that in Russia a striking tendency of the higher education is to lead to laxity in morals. And in this country the complaint is constantly heard that the scientific student and the man of letters forget that there is such a thing as religion, as represented in any of its organized forms. But that this is not necessarily so some of the noblest scientists, the most brilliant students, and the most beloved of men of letters are ample proof. There is, however, enough truth in the criticism to serve as a warning.

But there is one thing to be remembered. These beautiful productions of the natural world,—the fruits and flowers that gardeners love to bring together as evidence of their skill,—though they may seem only to flaunt brilliant blossoms, are sound of heart and well-rooted. The very fact of their luxuriance is proof that they have the principle of life at its best. All the soul they possess bursts forth in the beauty of the flower. That is all that one can ask of human education. If the soul be evolved, as well as the muscles and the mind, we need not fear a decadence of the truest spirituality or of the religious instinct. Though we may say of the flowers under modern culture, "Lo, Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these," we may also say of the well-developed human soul, "A greater than Solomon is here."

Musings.

Two years ago I made a delightful pilgrimage to Delphi. I was centuries too late to consult the oracle. The priests had long since vanished; but there were the shining rocks, the deep gorge, the beautiful Kastalian spring pouring forth a volume of water and Mount Parnassus lifting its head into the clouds. There were the dark groves of olives in the plain below, and from the heights above could be seen the placid waters of the Corinthian Gulf. On the site of the ancient temple the French Archaeological School were busy making their excavations. It is a tempting field, which American archaeologists once had an opportunity to secure, and might have secured if money had been more promptly pledged. One of the most fascinating experiences in excavating is to find a stone that speaks. It may be a speaking face, like the beautiful Hera head found by the American School at Argos; the incomparable Hermes found at Olympia; or some of the joyful, bewitching Tanagra figures; or a stone bearing an inscription which reveals thought and history. But it is rare to find a stone which not only speaks, but sings. Such was the good fortune of the French School soon after I left. The excavators had the joy of announcing to the world that two stones containing a hymn to Apollo had been found in the Athenian treasure-house at Delphi. The importance of this discovery was not in the words of the hymn, but in the music which accompanied it, and which Messrs. Reinach & Weil of Paris succeeded in transcribing. It furnished to us the most complete example of Greek music that we have from the past.

This music was reproduced about a year ago at the French School at Athens. I have ever since had a great curiosity to hear it. Two weeks ago I obtained from Harvard College the transcript made by the French experts, and, through the kindness of Prof. Irving J. Mannatt, LL.D., of Brown University, a transcript of the same hymn, with piano accompaniment arranged by Mr. Polykratos of Athens. Other kind friends were willing to co-operate in rendering the hymn. A chorus of a dozen voices was organized; and at a lecture on "The Religion of Greece" a photograph of these ancient stones was revealed with pictures of Delphi, while behind the screen on the stage the chorus helped us to imagine the Athenian pilgrims singing this hymn as they moved toward the sacred shrine. The five-eight rhythm in which it is written was a little hard at first, and the progressions in the latter half of the hymn are somewhat trying to our modern ear for tonality. It is hard to tell just where you are and where you are going; but there are bars in the first half which are beautiful and impressive, and a modern composer might find in them a fruitful theme. To me it was of great personal interest to think that the melody hidden in the stone for more than twenty-two centuries should break forth again and be sung in a part of the world then undiscovered. It is curious to find the Greeks setting a hymn of praise in a minor mode: it is something like setting the "Hallelujah Chorus" to the tune of old "Windham." Twenty-four hours after I heard Mr. Horatio Parker's brilliant rhapsody for baritone and orchestra, "Cáhal Mór of the Wine-red Hand," and Schubert's C major Symphony No. 9; and I concluded that, though we are far behind the old Greeks in plastic art, we can beat them altogether in the matter of music. It may not be fair to judge Greek music by a single specimen; and I have heard worse music in Greece to-day, and also in some of our hymn-books, than this hymn to Apollo. Nevertheless, I think it is perfectly safe to say that music in its highest development is a modern achievement.

Brevities.

We have complications enough at home without introducing foreign ones.

There is a true conservatism: it is the salt which preserveth. There is a true radicalism: it is the root of vitality.

The opera feshet has set in again at Boston; and we shall have an inundation of charm,—none better than the Fire Charm.

"Words," says the Religious Herald, "cut deeper than the sword." And the wounds they make are often harder to heal.

In regard to Negro immigration to Africa, it may be said, if the deportment of the white men is what it ought to be, it will not be necessary to deport the Negroes.

The American Unitarian Association is looking for free silver, but would prefer to have the same weight in free gold. Several tons of it would be very acceptable.

It now remains to be seen whether Harvard College, having entered the football contest, will be able to make its goal, or whether it will be obliged to close for lack of students.

Rev. Norman Fox, D.D., a prominent Baptist minister, maintains in an article in the Independent views on the subject of the Lord's Supper which will seem radical and revolutionary to the close communionists.

The Congregationalist says: "It is surprising that any friend of temperance should consent to oppose such a measure as the Norwegian Bill. With all deference to those who oppose the bill, we continue to believe that to cripple the serpent of the saloon as much as possible, since it cannot be killed outright at once, is the wisest policy."

Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute has met with a great loss in the death of Mr. Hamilton, who had charge of the music, and whom many of the North have heard sing from year to year as the second bass in the quartette. Mr. Hamilton was a graduate of Hampton, and had much natural ability as a musician. He played the piano, and was a good solo singer. He was always courteous and gentlemanly, and was a general favorite in his repeated trips to the North.

Though withdrawn from the active ministry for many years, Rev. Frederick W. Holland was a familiar figure in Boston and vicinity, and maintained his lifelong interest in religious and charitable work. Of the class of which he graduated at Harvard in 1831, which included Wendell Phillips and many distinguished names, but few survive him. Mr. Holland retained the use of his faculties to the end of his life, and his interest in current religious movements. For several years he was a frequent visitor at the Register office, taking magazines and newspapers to the inmates of the Cambridge jail.

AN OPPORTUNITY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Those attending the series of Saturday afternoon Sunday-school lessons given by Rev. William H. Pulsford at Channing Hall are given to question why many permit this opportunity to pass unimproved.

Mr. Pulsford is rarely gifted in power of keen intellectual criticism, presenting the latest results, combined with a deeply reverent spirit for the essential truth, which he illustrates with a graphic vividness which makes the Bible scene a living reality. Under his teaching the Bible is read anew, and one can hardly understand how those engaged in Sunday-school or in parental instruction can permit this opportunity to pass. The remaining lessons of the series will be given to the closing scenes in the life of Jesus. G. H. H.

THE PROBLEM OF PUNISHMENT.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

A famous evangelist, preaching to a congregation of convicts at the penitentiary of Ontario, is reported as follows: "It is the rottenest rubbish for people to say God has no place of punishment."

This evangelist teaches, I believe, the doctrine of eternal punishment. I conceive of the Spirit of God being perfect and unchangeable, and also of his being the "Spirit of Love." He must therefore be the Spirit of Love at all times and under all circumstances. He is a loving teacher, to whom the passion of anger is alien.

Now, whatever God is, he must act in accordance with the laws of his own Being, else he would be changeable, capricious, and imperfect. If all nature is subject to the same perfect law, it is impossible for any creature to violate its nature: it must, of necessity, act in accordance with the laws of its nature. Good and evil are merely relative terms, used by man to describe actions when judged by their results. In reality, there is nothing evil; for are not all things of the nature of God? The natural consequences of our actions teach us the laws of God's nature, and I hold we are in the position of the student who must learn his own lessons: no other can learn them for him. Humanity is the student; and God, through nature, is the Teacher, through whatever existence or school we may be passing. We make the mistake of compelling obedience. Should we not rather lead, and study tendencies, and encourage? We have no right to make such arbitrary rules concerning private conduct, with unnatural penalties incurred for the breaking of such rules. What is excess in one is abstinence in another; and, in making such rules and penalties, we place dams in natural channels. We have the right to protect ourselves. Indeed, we cannot help doing so; and the natural penalties consequent upon certain actions have that end in view. God, through nature and the reasonable action of man, effects all reforms.

Punishment is the plan adopted by the savage to coerce the weaker.

If a tiger destroys our children, we destroy the tiger; but we do not torture it. Why should we submit a human being to torture, as we do when we take away his liberty, and cage him, and underfeed him, giving him work to which he may be totally unsuited, clothe him in hideous garb, and brand him as an outcast, when perhaps we have obtained the power which enables us to so treat him by treading upon him and raising ourselves at his expense. Upon what is our social rank built, if not upon those whom we affect to despise?

Punishment, indeed! Have we not made God in our own image? But, as our knowledge increases, and we get more civilized, we believe in a gentler, manlier God. We first say that he could not punish eternally, and then we say he is Love itself.

The day of might—savage physical might—is on the wane. The dawn of the day of sympathy and love is at hand. The God of might, yet jealous of his weak creatures, is in his death less terrible than of old. Freedom we may have by ceasing to cower before him, by rising and adoring the mightier God of pity and of love.

HYMN.

GOD WITH US.

BY SARAH E. BURTON.

When, in the spirit's solitude,
We meet the Over-Soul,
The self is lost in oneness with
The all-embracing whole.
And then the silent depths within
Are rapturously stirred
With thoughts of human brotherhood,—
The heart's divinest word.

To make this union with the Soul
The bloom of every hour,
This word divine within the heart
The fragrance of life's flower,
We meet and blend our orisons;
And thus, with prayer and song,
The Over-Soul of solitude
We find amid the throng.

Oh, how the electric messages
Through every fibre run,—
A brotherhood of human souls
Inhering in the One!
And hearts and lives, with nobler beat,
Approach the longed-for goal,—
An ever-present consciousness Of God, the Over-Soul.

THE USE OF A CHURCH.*

BY REV. W. W. FENN.

It costs a great deal of money to carry on a church. The prominent churches of any one of our large cities probably require, on an average, at least $8,000 a year apiece for their successful maintenance. But in an estimate of cost we ought, in fairness, to add to this sum the interest on money invested in the plant, which would be perhaps $5,000 more, making a total of $13,000 a year as the cost of supporting religious services. A thoughtful man cannot help inquiring into the use of a church, whether the result justifies the outlay. And the question becomes more important when we enlarge our view, and consider not one church alone, but all the churches. The last census gives as the value of all the church property in the United States about $680,000,000. At 4 per cent. the interest of money invested in buildings devoted to religious uses amounts to about $27,000,000. Statistics for current expenses are not available; but comparison of such as are accessible, with the estimated value of corresponding church property, makes it probable that, on an average, the running expenses are about 16 per cent. of the value of the property. At this ratio the maintenance of religion in the United States is at an expense of about $113,000,000, which, added to the $27,000,000 representing interest on money invested in land and buildings, gives a total of $140,000,000. When, now, we consider the mass of suffering and vice due to miserable conditions of life which might be alleviated, were more money available for the measures proposed by wise, enlightened philanthropy, such as are now indicated by the government in England should the Welsh Disestablishment Bill become a law, the query is inevitable whether the $140,000,000 might not be used to better advantage. What if all the churches in the land would give for their support in ways of practical helpfulness,—Would it not be better for our communities and for the country at large? First of all, then, as thoughtful men, we are bound to ask what is the use of a church, of churches, which, in face of squalor and misery all too apparent about us, represent so enormous an expenditure?

It may be we are inclined to reply, when the question is put in this form, that it is nobody's business but our own whether the money is well used or not. A wealthy man may say that he allows himself the luxury of wines, cigars, carriages, beautiful pictures; and, if he chooses to expend money for the luxury of noble architecture, exquisite music, and eloquent preaching, no one has a right to interfere, or even question the propriety of his action. Well, we waive, for the time, considerations which may be deemed sentimental, and criticise the argument solely on the low ground where, so far, we have been dwelling. In the vast majority of cases church property is exempt from taxation. This means that every man's tax bill in the city is a trifle higher than it would be if this immunity did not exist. In ancient times in New England a direct tax was levied upon the inhabitants of a town for the support of public worship. Now, with the voluntary principle, there is still a tax upon every property-owner for the same purpose, though less in amount and indirect in character. Therefore, every tax-payer has a right to ask whether a church is of sufficient benefit to the community to justify its freedom from taxation. In a word, the State does not tax church property because it is believed to be of benefit to the entire community. Therefore, if we resent the inquiry into the use of a church, saying that it makes no difference to any but ourselves how the money it represents is employed, we ought not to claim remission of taxes. To regard a church as a personal luxury, and still to claim for it freedom from taxation as a public benefit, is dishonest. Therefore, our question for this evening interests us not only as thoughtful, prudent men, but also as citizens. What is the use of a church that warrants us in placing it on the list of untaxed property?

Once more, only a small proportion of the inhabitants of this country is in the habit of attending church. Among the non-church-goers two feelings are easily discernible,—indifference and hostility. The first feeling seems to me almost contemptible; for an institution so powerful and far-reaching, claiming such privileges, so potent for good or evil, ought not to be an object of indifference to any thoughtful man. But how can we explain the very obvious fact that there are some who are manifestly antagonistic to the Church, and would gladly see it swept out of existence. It is not because of the financial burdens it entails; for most of those to whom I refer are seldom, if ever, visited by the tax-gatherer. Neither can it be wholly because churches are considered a bulwark of conservatism and hostile to progress; for there is no such outcry against institutions of higher learning, although it has frequently been asserted that educated men are usually stumbling-blocks in the way of great reform movements. One explanation is to be found in the fact that, commonly, those who rail at the churches speak respectfully, and even admiringly, of Jesus. He was right, they say; but the Church isn't his kind. It is partly because the Church is regarded as unfaithful to its founder that men are hostile to it: in the light of his ideal the Church is condemned. To this others may be indifferent, but not we who have taken for our motto "the religion of Jesus." Therefore, it is not only as thoughtful men and as citizens, but also as those who believe in Jesus as revealing the true way of life, that we must ask seriously and sincerely, What is the use of the Church?

A few years ago, in one of our Unitarian Clubs, the question was proposed, "What can a Church that is in Earnest do?" The speaker of the evening began by answering, "Everything, anything." Undoubtedly, it can; and the reply is not alien to our idea of religion as having to do with all departments of human thought and activity. But should it attempt to do "anything and everything"? Prof. Haeckel has reminded us in his latest book that in early times what he calls the soul, meaning the entire mental activity, was distributed throughout all the cells of the body. "Only in the higher animals," he says, "is the soul life found to be localized and connected with special organs." Division of labor, specialization of functions, is the law in progressive societies. In these days an organization or a man attempting to do everything is anachronistic. Therefore, while, in a sense, it may be true that the Church must do everything, the presumption is that it may leave much to other agencies which it inspires and directs, and also that there is some special function, peculiarly its own, which it cannot delegate to another.

In seeking to discover whether the Church has any such proper work, to which it may devote itself increasingly as specialization becomes more close, we shall find no better method than that which Socrates employed. We must build up an ideal man; and then see where, if anywhere, the Church finds work which it alone can do. What, then, do we desire for ourselves and our children? First, health. We wish for our children perfection of the physical organism,—steady nerves, obedient muscles, senses capable of accurate perception. Second, we desire intelligence,—mental health, sanity of mind. We educate our children, that the laws of the universe may be written upon their brains, till their thought is true to the processes of nature. Third, we insist upon character,—that the laws which make for the strength and stability of societies may be obeyed also by the individual. Certainly, these three elements enter into the ideal man,—health, intelligence, character.

It will be observed that they are arranged on an ascending scale. If we cannot have both health and intelligence, the latter is preferable. Moreover, any father would rather have his son honest, pure, loving than unscrupulously intelligent. If there be any momentary doubt, our permanent and unbiassed admiration removes it. We admire physical perfection, we respect intelligence, we reverence character. Furthermore, each of these constituents affects slightly its superior, but is far more deeply affected in return. With our knowledge concerning the physical basis of thought, it cannot be denied that physical health has much to do with mental development; yet the mind, by its power to discover hygienic laws, the conditions of disease, and means of immunity, has a far greater influence upon the body. Similarly, intelligence has determinative force upon character; yet it will be acknowledged that, as Ruskin says, every duty we leave undone obscures a truth we should have known. To lie is to weaken the power of seeing truth: only the pure in heart see God anywhere. And if, as we believe, the laws of nature are at heart moral, no man can discern them truly and fully save as their moral side is revealed in and to personal character. Health, intelligence, character,—these are three elements of the ideal man, arranged on an ascending scale, each affecting the one above it, but more deeply influenced in return.

Are these three all? Obviously, not; for a man may be in perfect physical condition, thoroughly trained and equipped mentally, and of undoubted character, and still be unable to appreciate Raphael's "Sistine Madonna," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, or Tennyson's "Idylls of the King." No man blind to the beauty of nature, for whom Browning, Inness, Schubert, are as if they had never been, can be a perfect, ideal man: there is lacking to him that which, for want of a better term, we call ideality. In Arthur's hall, which Merlin built, were four zones, in the lowest of which beasts were killing men, denoting the supremacy of physical strength. In the second men were slaying beasts, symbolizing the victory of intelligence over the mere animal. In the third were perfect men, knights without fear and reproach, as the emblem of character. But above were men with growing wings of aspiration and ideality. This, therefore, we may place last and highest in the scale. Physical health contributes to it; intellect broadens its base and enriches by association its products, guiding its activity; character helps it more by opening the eyes to the beauty and wonder of the world; and, on the other hand, ideality, through its organ, the imagination, aids in the quest for hygienic laws, foresees physical danger, and provides the way of escape, is invaluable for the student who would fain predict on the basis of fact, and through the ideals it creates gives richness and power to character. Thus ideality, imagination, does not exist for itself alone: it is not merely the solace and refreshment of an idle hour. It is of service in every realm of being, giving freshness, vitality, outlook, to all; and, as one rises in the scale, it becomes increasingly useful. It is the glory and crown of man; the true master, existing for the welfare of all underlings. Whatever, then, contributes to the strength or guides the activity of this faculty really affects the entire man in the largest and most natural way.

Here, then, are four traits of an ideal man,—health, intelligence, character, ideality; and where does the Church come with its specific work? Is it the task of the Church to care for the physical conditions of existence? One would think so from the emphasis laid nowadays upon the idea of a sociological church, devoting itself to philanthropic work. From all sides comes the penetrating cry for what is styled practical religion: the Church must feed the hungry, clothe the naked, make war upon vile tenement-houses, and lead in all movements of reform. With this demand all of us, I think, most cordially sympathize. Yet may it not be that the idea is being carried to an extreme,—that we are in danger of falling into a partial view of the use of the Church, and even, it may be, losing sight of its distinctive function? One principle is all-important; and that is that to do another's work is bad for him and bad also for one's own work, which is robbed of so much energy and time. The chief lesson of Dr. Parkhurst's success in New York lies in this, that he did not attempt to close saloons and gambling-houses directly, but did seek to arouse public sentiment to such a pitch that it would compel the police force to do its sworn duty. It is a lesson worth learning and taking seriously to heart. It is bad policy to do work which belongs to somebody else instead of compelling him to do it. Now, it is the distinct, unmistakable duty of the State to care for the physical welfare of its citizens: for this cause was it born into the world, to protect the lives of its members. For instance, there is in the State a department of justice and a department of health. If, therefore, injustice is done and unwholesome conditions exist, it is not the business of the Church to resolve itself into a law and order league and buy brooms, but so to arouse the civic responsibility in each citizen that the officials whom the State employs for this very purpose may be obliged to do their duty. One objection that must be made to a great deal of work upon which the Church is now urged to enter is that it would be undertaking to accomplish what another agency has been created to do and ought to be obliged to do, and so is diverted from its special work,—about which more by and by. It can work best through existing agencies, by creating or strengthening ideals of citizenship and civic responsibility.

We need not shrink from applying to this principle the most crucial test; and, for one, I am willing to assert that it would be indefinitely better if the Church, as such, could abstain altogether from the administration of charity. A great deal of the waste and harm in modern charity is due to the undisciplined zeal of pious but unskilled church people, who by lack of discrimination, and by the tendency to overlap, frequently do more harm than good. If, for instance, a charity society already exists, supported by the community, all the charitable work of the town, except, perhaps, in very unusual cases, ought to be put into the hands of that society. If its officials are not wise and sympathetic, they should be removed, and their positions filled by more competent servants. The drift is toward the secularization of charity, and the Church ought gladly to leave the field. But, if this conclusion is sound, how much truer is it in the case of the innumerable things looking in the same direction which the Church is so often called upon to perform! In all strong and growing organisms specialization is an inevitable law, which must be obeyed. It is often asked, What is the attitude of a church toward socialism, nationalism, and kindred schemes of social reform? But, clearly, the solution of our present difficulties must come from specialists in sociology and political economy; and the hap-hazard talk of which so much is heard in our churches is not only useless, but even mischievous. The Church can create an atmosphere in which the sociologist may work, and which shall make easier the acceptance of his discovered remedy. But the way out of our difficulty must be shown by the specialists. The principle, then, is this,—open to exceptions, of course, but valuable as a general guide,—that the physical well-being of society, the health and safety of the community, have been intrusted to the State or are gradually coming into the control of secular organizations; and it is wise for the Church to allow specialization to have its perfect work. It may be necessary for the Church to lead the way, to foster and intensify the ideals which should govern other agencies; but it should be clearly recognized that the present and, as I think, commendable tendency is to take these functions out of the care of the Church.

Rising in the scale, the next element, in the consummate man—intelligence—need not detain us long; for the process of secularizing education has been pretty thoroughly carried out, and is generally accepted. By common consent, in our democracy the State assumes the education of children,—at all events, up to the college grade; and the Church, as such, is expected to keep its hands off. It may be, indeed, that there is need of a more sympathetic allegiance to the public school system. Speaking for myself, I dislike private schools, except in the case of unusual boys, and would have every boy and girl begin school life in the public schools. Time is wasted, of course. All my early education was gained here in the public schools of Boston; and fully half the years spent were thrown away, so far as intellectual acquirements are concerned. But time is lost to good advantage if loyalty to the State and democracy of spirit are won. One who realizes that for the enlargement which has become his through educational facilities he is indebted solely to the State cannot help feeling gratitude and civic loyalty impossible to another whose training has been in a private school. Of equal value is the democratic spirit engendered in the public school. A member of the present Freshman Class at Harvard remarked to me only this week that the Boston Latin School fellows of his own class whom he had met were a splendid set of men; and he added, "What I like best about them is the democratic spirit they show everywhere." That is a legitimate fruit of public school training; and, if parents who feel—and often justly—that the public schools are not good enough for their children would turn to and improve them, instead of packing their sons off to private schools, the result would be better all round. By encouraging true ideas of citizenship and democracy, the Church can and should keep us alert to the needs of State education; but it ought not to undertake what the State or other agencies can do more efficiently and to much better advantage. Here, again, it may be necessary for the Church to lead the way. In Chicago the First Church has supported for many years a Herford Kindergarten, but it is work that ought to be done at public expense; and, when public kindergartens are fairly established, the Church will cheerfully give up its charge, feeling sure that it is better so. Similarly, in Unity Clubs or study classes the Church has done noble service in intellectual advancement; but, ordinarily, it would be poor policy for us to attempt to carry on this work in competition with University Extension. Generally, then, it may be said that the tendency toward the secularization of education, leading to its assumption by the State or other agencies, is wholesome, and that, as this specialization goes on, the Church will be freed more and more from this duty, and left to work, if there be such, which is peculiarly and specifically its own. If the Church will only not impair intellectual development, it will do more than many churches succeed in accomplishing nowadays.

In coming to character, we feel instinctively that here, certainly, we are in the legitimate province of a church. But for right-doing two things are required: first, a knowledge of what is right; and, second, a sufficient willingness to do it. Ordinarily, in situations of grave ethical importance, we know the right; but inspiration is lacking. Moral laws have been rubbed into us by the experiences of many generations, so that, for all practical purposes, we may be said to know them. But the struggle is to obey. If, then, the Church has to do with character-making, it must be more in the way of inspiration than of information. Whence, then, come our most powerful ethical inspirations? Shall we not agree that it is from the realization of personality? When we realize our own personality, self-respect is born, which is one of the very mightiest forces that make for righteousness. The essential of ethics, we have been told, is that a man should "realize his neighbor," never forgetting, not only that the man with whom he deals suffers as he suffers, but also that he has personality to be respected and revered like his own. For patriotism, we have the State, conceived of not as an aggregation of individuals, but as a unit, with a personal existence. When we speak of the civic conscience, we are not using a figure of speech: the State is, as poets and orators have described her, an august moral personality, with a destiny of her own. And, then, finally, when one asks for the ground and warrant of personality in man and the State, he must find it ultimately in the personality of the world, in God. If there is nothing in the world corresponding to human personality, then man, as he becomes more personal, gets out of harmony with his environment, and is under condemnation. The worth and the promise of the personality of man lie in the personality of the world. Unless that be real, our ideals, born out of personality and tending to enlarge it, are without sanction. In the realization of personality, then,—in one's self, in his neighbor, in the State, in the world,—we find the supreme moral inspiration.

Manifestly, this power of realizing personality is a part of ideality. Music, art, poetry, holy lives, reveal the personality of nature. And at this point we come upon religion in its purest form. For the great word of religion is personality,—personality in man, personality in the universe. The chief organ of religion is the imagination. And here, as I take it, we come upon the Church and its peculiar work as the agency by which we are aided to realize personality. Its prime concern is with those prophecies of personality, developing along ethical lines, which we name moral ideals. Art educates ideality in one way, religion in another; and yet religion, with its thought of God, insures the validity of all ideals whatsoever. And since, as we have previously seen, ideality reaches down through all the spheres of being, animating all, the Church, which deals with that power in man, to strengthen and direct it, helps through it, in the best and most natural way, all the relations of human life. God is infinite Personality, disclosed as life in the physical forms, as wisdom in the intellect, as holiness in character, as grace in ideality. Health means his full presence in the body by obedience to hygienic laws; truth, his presence in the mind by obedience to mental laws; holiness, his presence in character by the fulfilling of moral laws; beauty, his perfect presence in ideality, when the conditions of the incoming Spirit are met by the culture of the imagination. Hence the Church which makes God real to man is, in the strictest sense of the word, doing everything; but it is doing it in nature's way, by touching man at his highest and sending its influence downward through already existing natural agencies.

This, then, is the peculiar work of the Church, to encourage and nourish ideality,—especially along the lines of moral, as distinct from æsthetic, development,—and in this way to move the entire man. Not that the time has yet come when the Church can afford to do this alone, for the specialization is yet very far from complete; not that the Church must not now do many things which other agencies will finally perform. It is far from my thought to disparage or discourage the extraordinary interest of the Church in practical philanthropy. Only it ought to be clearly recognized that in such departments the Church will do its duty best by making itself unnecessary as soon as possible; that, soon or late, it will be free to do its own specific work; and, most of all, that in absorption in practical philanthropy the Church cannot afford to lose sight of its own most important and permanent duty. Beyond doubt the sociological church, of which we are hearing so much nowadays, devoting itself to what are called works of practical benevolence, is a noble and right development; yet is there not danger that it may become as one-sided as was the phase out of which we are emerging? Are there not indications that the distinctive mission of the Church is fading out of view? Without in the least denying the value of the sociological church, may we not plead also for the idealistic church,—the church of meditation and worship, seeking to read the religious implications of the new sciences, and to touch human life on its highest reaches? And, if we are to have an idealistic church, it must be also a theological church.

To speak in praise of a theological church may seem to many reactionary, old-fashioned. We are shy of theology, half inclined to cross ourselves and halloo for holy water whenever it is mentioned. But what is theology other than the thought structure of a man who believes in God with all his mind? When it is said that theology is out of date, the meaning must be either that thinking is anachronistic or that God need not be in all our thoughts. What our churches need—and not ours alone, but all the churches of Christendom—is not less theology, but more,—more close, hard, conscientious thinking about the facts of religion as disclosed in history and experience, and about the world in which we live, with man its yet unfathomed mystery. Thought lies back of conduct, or ought to; and character must have some sort of theology behind it. For, as has been said so often, idealistic ethics without a base of theology cannot be justified to our thinking. Shall we strive for what is termed religious feeling, and let theology go? But thought is the permanent possibility of emotion; and healthful religious feeling springs up within, and is not stimulated constantly from without. It is simply an absurdity to suppose that religion can exist, pure and permanent, without theology. If a church is to stand for the defence and culture of ideals, it must have a theology to establish the reality and validity, not of its own alone, but of all ideals. Shall we not, then, have done with the tiresome, senseless hue and cry against theology?

We, most of all; for, if there ever was a church in any period of the world's history which was manifestly called of God to be a theological church, it is ours. The future historian of religious evolution will look back upon the last half of the nineteenth century as the most momentous epoch in the entire course of religious development. For now the thought basis of religion is shifting from the supernatural to the natural. In government the divine right of kings has given place to democracy. By a precisely similar but far more remarkable change the supernatural revelation of ecclesiasticism is yielding to the natural revelation of humanity. The old order dies hard; but, unless all signs fail, the religion of the future will be grounded in the natural order alone. And, of all the churches in the world, our Unitarian Church, or, at least, a large portion of it, having discarded all extra-natural sanctions, and resting solely upon the human reason and moral sense,—occupying, that is, the position of future religion,—is in a position to-day to do more than any other church toward helping forward the natural evolution of religious thought. Other churches cannot do it, for their basis is still supernaturalism; and the liberal men working at the present problems are like men trying to untangle a fish-line held behind their backs. The theological thaw in Orthodoxy, of which we have heard so much, has resulted so far only in theological slush. When one thinks of the mighty thought problems pressing upon us, and understands that the religious life of the future, and of innumerable men and women in the present, must be grounded in natural theology, if it is to exist at all, and that our Church alone to-day is in a position to think that theology out, wonder deepens that there should be among us such scorn for theology, and so much seeming neglect of the great work laid at our doors. Can it be that, overcome by the magnitude of the task, and shrinking from the labor it involves, we are prone to sink back in dreary despair? But a great deal of our religious life to-day is a survival from the old discredited system, not a growth out of the new. It is our supreme business to show how the persistent facts of religious experience may coexist with the new system of thought,—not as survivals from the past, but as natural, inevitable outgrowths. This is what I mean, chiefly, by saying that we are set to do a theological work. Understand, I would not say a single word against the work of practical philanthropy. Only I do urge that, in doing this, we should not be unmindful of the unparalleled opportunities that are ours of aiding the process of religious growth. We need not cease to be a sociological church if we become also a theological church.

Once more, let us not forget that the principal activity of the Church must be on the higher reaches of life. By degrees, as time goes on, the philanthropic and educational work will be taken up by other societies; but what other organization is there now, or is there likely to be, which will undertake what has been described as the specific work of the Church? Against idealism the forces of our time are contending; against moral ideals our passions, and, more than all, our apathy, are arrayed. Surely, then, here is work, and work of the first importance, which the Church is called to perform. You will recall the scene in Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Marcella" in which Mrs. Boyce marvels that her daughter should be so ignorant of the real agonies of life,—as if hunger and cold were the worst that can befall us. The real tragedies of this world are broken spirits and crushed hearts, unfulfilled hopes, stunted natures, and in the cry more heart-rending even than the appeal for bread, "O God, for a man to arise in me, that the man I am may cease to be!" And for these spirits in prison the Church alone has a message of comfort and good cheer. We cannot afford to neglect the greater in our care for the less. A seven-day church is admirable, but most admirable when it is open for worship seven days; for some of us are still so far behind the times as to desire to have one place where all the associations conduce to reverent, exalted thought. Is it not written, "My house shall be called a house of prayer for all the nations"? Is it old-fashioned to believe with Jesus that the life is more than meat and the body than raiment, that man cannot live by bread alone, and that it profits nothing to gain the world at cost of a soul? Starving souls are more numerous than starving bodies. Shall they, too, not be fed? And it must be borne in mind also that, in the long run, the hope of philanthropy lies in that very moral idealism which it is the peculiar function of the Church to foster.

This, then, in a word, seems to me the principal work of the Church,—to foster moral idealism. To do this, it must be a church of high thought, and, more, of hard thinking; a church of personality, of worship, of mysticism. Whatever else it may be, this it must be. And the use of such a church in the life of the community is simply incalculable. It does what no other organization attempts; and its influence is felt, although it may not be acknowledged or perceived, in all human activity. The money that the church costs is not to be mentioned compared with its usefulness. But if, absorbed in "practical" concerns, the Church fails to touch men on their highest level, and give, in the realization of personality, the grandest inspiration of character, it must bear the rebuke of Jesus, "These ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone."

ABSTRACT OF ADDRESS OF REV. EUGENE R. SHIPPEN.

There has indeed been no collusion between Mr. Fenn and myself, nor is there likely to be a collision; for the reason that I have myself many times urged the more serious study of theology as lying at the basis of our religious life. You will pardon me for not attempting to dovetail my remarks into those of Mr. Fenn, and, indeed, for pursuing a somewhat diverging line.

We may say that the permanent and abiding use and purpose of a church, which distinguish the institution in every age, and which give continuity to its existence, are worship and the service of man, which, translated into the language of the essayist for the evening, are the search for personality and the realization of personality in society; but the forms of worship and the forms of social service differ from generation to generation, according to the intellectual and social needs of the day. On this occasion I wish to speak of one of the social needs of the present,—one which the Church, better than any other institution, is adapted to meet, which the Church must meet if it would fulfil its twofold purpose and justify its claim as a servant of mankind as well as of the truth. I am convinced that one of the most important services a church can render to society to-day is to teach the lesson of democracy, and to act as a mediator between the warring factions of society,—not as a legal adviser, but as a common friend and moral arbiter. Democracy has been realized as a political ideal: as a social ideal it is scorned and flouted. The tendency of modern society is away from democracy. You cannot dispute that. There is no more social unity in America than there is racial unity. There is less and less social cohesion as years go on; but few there are who stop to think what this drift means to our social welfare. Men persuade themselves that philanthropic activity can unite the rents in the social fabric; but, though the forms of our modern charity are generally above censure,—that is to say, they are rational and scientific,—the spirit of much of our modern charity is that of patronage, the descent of the rich to the poor,—patronage which divides rather than unites men. How little do our charities start from inner lives and touch inner lives! There is care for the body, but there is lacking sympathy and love. How fruitless, from a large social point of view, are the attempts of the well-intentioned to heal society's wounds by means of the ordinary charity salve! Democracy, I say, is farther from us than ever.

Again, it is perfectly evident to you that our industrial difficulties are no nearer a settlement than they were five years ago. The bitterness between the employer and the employed is growing, not decreasing. The end of all this is the most serious question confronting thoughtful men to-day. And at this moment, I think, it is more serious, more pressing—not more fundamental—than even the theological question. It seems to me evident that our comfortable lot blunts our sensibilities, so that we are not half aware of society's danger. And yet I am no alarmist. Most of the men I meet discuss the social question in an after-dinner mood.

I will not speak of remedies. They are the work of specialists not in the ministry. As the causes of society's ill-health are deep, so are the cures. I am not childish enough to propose a panacea; but I may legitimately suggest how the Church ought to meet the situation, so far as it can. The Church is fitted to teach the well-nigh forgotten lesson of democracy, because it is founded upon laws of ethics, and not on laws of etiquette; and because, ideally at least, it recognizes in every man a child of God and a brother. The Church is furthermore fitted to act as a mediator between the warring factions of society, because its God is a God of love and justice, its interests are spiritual, not temporal.

Now, it is generally acknowledged that the Unitarian branch of the Church universal has fully and adequately met the intellectual needs of men. We have come on to the solid rock of rationalism, naturalism. Our theology and our forms of worship are, generally speaking, in harmony with the most advanced thought and critical scholarship. This cannot be said of any other church. But it is as clear as daylight that the Unitarian Church is not meeting the social needs of the present. It was Dr. Hedge's wish that our denomination substitute the name Humanitarian for Unitarian; but when have we shown our full right and title to the former name? Splendid humanitarians we have had, but I am speaking of the prevailing tone and temper of our body. The lack of correspondence between the name and the reality would be ridiculous. There is only one body known to me which is consistently humanitarian, and that is the Salvation Army. And I, for one, do not think that its enthusiasm for humanity is bound up with its irrational theology. I believe in a church of the future that is as earnest for man as is the Salvation Army, and as earnest for truth as we have been in the past. Unitarianism, in very truth, is the religion of the people, for the people, by the people; but the Unitarian Church is notoriously not a people's church, not a democratic church. Go into our city churches, and, for the most part, you are impressed with and depressed by the uniformity of type in the pews. Our churches are social clubs, and we cannot deny the charge so generally made. Where is there a church among us to-day with unity in variety? Where is there a church that has stood as unequivocally for democracy as it has for rationalism? The world knows pretty well where we stand on the matter of creeds: has our note as to democracy been as clearly sounded? Again, what attempt have we made to mediate between the warring factions of society? Where is our Church spoken of as the champion of equal justice? Has any community in the United States asked for the establishment of a Unitarian church for social reasons, because it was trusted as a peacemaker and a righteous judge? It almost seems to me, in the light of our history, that we have become a highly specialized, differentiated organization,—an organization for rationalism pure and simple. If this is the case, our banner should be "Love to God," leaving out "love to man." But "whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

I know well what the criticisms of all this will be. But I know that they will not be criticisms from the ethical point of view. You cannot stand on your platform of love to God and man and take offence at what I have said.

I see in this audience ministers who, like myself, are met at every turn by a great wall of conservatism, of social tradition, and of refined selfishness in our churches. Even if that wall were insurmountable, it would be none the less our duty to assail it. But I believe we shall assail it with success, triumphantly, if you, the laymen of our denomination, will give us encouragement.

ABSTRACT OF ADDRESS OF REV. F. A. GILMORE.

I wish to speak especially of the function of the Christian Church in view of the agitation of the social problems which are now so much to the fore. I apprehend that, from a careful study of the social problem, two principles will be discovered. One of these principles is this, that man is a social being: he never has lived, he never can live, outside society. The aim before every rational man is what Mr. Fenn has called the development of his personality,—the putting forth of every energy of his spirit, every power of his mind. In order to do this, he must be a member of the social order. The second principle is this: no man can develop himself until he develops other men. He cannot be an all-round man if those lives which touch his are ignorant and partial. These principles, I apprehend, will be found to be true; and the second seems to me not to be sufficiently understood. Self-development for any man means the development of other men. For instance, a father is not a complete parent until he has sacrificed himself for his family, until he has labored and saved for his children. As he sees them growing into wise and useful manhood and womanhood, he thereby completes himself.

The root of our social problems, I believe, will be found in the selfishness of men. Here is the employer too selfish to care for his workmen, the workman careless of any rights but his own. That is the labor problem. Here a group of citizens too selfish to examine their sanitary condition,—another one of the problems of society. Here a man fosters intemperance because he makes money by it. Here a man seeks divorce because he wishes to make a more advantageous marriage. Now there are various plans for removing the evils of society, but any scheme that shall answer the great social questions permanently must strike at the root of selfishness in the hearts of men. It must point out clearly that the selfish life is the partial life, the defeated life; it must show the way of self-realization through self-sacrifice; it must convince every citizen that his true life is to be found in serving society.

It is precisely here that communism, anarchism, socialism, nationalism, are all found to be wanting. They all propose a rearrangement of the units in society, a change or modification of external circumstances. The Christian religion alone goes to the root of the matter, and strikes at the narrowness and the selfishness in the hearts of men. The Christian religion, gentlemen, has this further advantage: it is something more than a proposition to ameliorate the condition of society; it is a mighty force that has been at work in the world for two thousand years. A careless reading of the history of that period shows the Church opposing progress, grudgingly acknowledging the growing power of the people; but a deeper examination will show, as Mr. Kidd has so well pointed out, that the progress of society,—the disappearance of slavery, the decay of feudalism, the enfranchisement and the education of the masses of the people, the more equal distribution of political power,—these things did not take place because some student discovered a new principle of political economy, but were due to a growing humanitarian sentiment, to a gradual deepening and softening of character caused by the Christian religion. The Christian religion proposes to regenerate society through the self-realization of all the individuals in society. A regenerated society is the kingdom of God, and to bring in the kingdom of God is the aim of the Christian dispensation. Every individual in society is unspeakably precious in the eyes of God; and the interest, the pity, the love of God, are centred in every individual. From God to men there come in a thousand ways the solicitations to the larger life.

Society is an organism, and man must find his true life in an organism. But, as the New Testament teaches us, "We are all members one of another; and, if one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; if one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it." That is the organism of the social order. Self-perfection found only in self-sacrifice and laboring for others. That lies at the heart of the teachings of the Christian Church,—“He that will save his life shall lose it,” while he that dies to self rises thereby into true self-realization; that is, it will be found that the Christian religion contains those two principles which I have said would be deduced from a careful study of society. In Christianity the philosophy of society appears as the purpose of an all-wise God.

And here let me digress for a moment to speak of the pursuit of intellectual culture as it is carried on in some of the Christian churches, and especially in our own. Consider how many clubs we have in our churches whose aim is the study of all manner of interesting themes,—of history, literature, science, art,—all good in their places; but do we not know that there is something higher, and that that something is the service of the living God? We say, “Go to now, let us cultivate our sympathies, or let us cultivate our æsthetic natures.” Gentlemen, the very self-consciousness of those expressions should warn us that they are not enough. “Elevate it as we may,” says Dr. Martineau, in a splendid passage, “we are in this world for something more than this. We are put here, not to remain at home forever, dressing up our own personalities to the last degree of refinement, but to be carried out and to be borne away by the glories and the sorrows of the world; to be the organs of a truth that may bring us only scorn, of a love of right that may meet with no response, of a pity which sees nothing but the grief which it heals.”

The fundamental office of the Christian Church I apprehend to be this: to be a revealer and a quickener of life,—life not in any narrow or superficial sense, but that deep life of service which a man shall reach only as he consecrates himself under God to the uplifting of the world.

OUR FLAG.

BY LYDIA J. SANDERSON.

I.

“A sceptre all who meet obey.”—Byron.

The flags, banners, or standards which the early voyagers planted upon American shores in token of their sovereignty and occupancy must ever remain a subject of conjecture. Nothing certain concerning them can come down to us.

We find that the Aztecs of Mexico, whose remains are found in various parts of the United States, had for their standard an eagle pouncing upon an ocelot, emblazoned on a rich mantle of feather-work; and to-day the flag of Mexico bears the eagle resting upon a cactus plant, commemorative of an incident in the early history of the Aztecs.

The North American Indians were found by the early discoverers to carry as their standard a pole full-fledged with the wing feathers of the eagle, doubtless “the same great American eagle,” according to a recent writer, “that so often flaps his wings and screams for us to-day.”

The first flags unfurled upon the shores of the New World were beyond doubt those brought by Columbus when he first landed upon the island of San Salvador in October, 1492, a description of which, given by his son, reads: “Columbus, dressed in scarlet, first stepped from the little boat which bore him from his vessels, bearing the royal standard of Spain emblazoned with the arms of Castile and Leon in his own hand, followed by the Pinzons in their own boats, each bearing the banner of the expedition; namely, a white flag with a green cross, having on each side the letters F and Y surmounted by golden crowns.”

From the “Records of Massachusetts” we gather that the red cross of St. George was in use in that colony in 1634, if not earlier; and it was, doubtless, the flag brought to these shores by the Pilgrims of the “Mayflower.”

The flags of old England would naturally be used by the American colonies previous to their separation from the mother country, though such does not seem to have been always the case. At the British State Paper Office, according to Preble in his exhaustive work on flags, is found a drawing of the flag of New England under the administration of Sir Edmund Andros, showing the cross of St. George borne on a white field occupying the whole flag, the centre of the cross emblazoned with a gilt crown over the cipher of the sovereign king, James I. A crimson flag in which the Jack was a red St. George cross on a white field was the ensign most generally used in New England. Sometimes a hemisphere or a tree was shown in the upper canton next the staff formed by the cross, and occasionally the field was blue.

In the early days of the Revolution each State seems to have had its own banner. It is often said that the Bunker Hill flag was a blue ground, a field in the corner quartered by the red cross of St. George, and another section filled by a pine-tree and the motto “Liberty or Death”; but no contemporary accounts are satisfactory respecting the flags used at the battle of Bunker Hill. It is not positively ascertained that any were used by the Americans. Certainly, none were captured from them by the British.

The first instance of the thirteen stripes being used upon an American banner is found upon that which was presented to the Philadelphia troop of light horse in 1774 or 1775 by Capt. Abraham Markoe, and is still in the possession of that troop.

In June, 1775, Gen. Washington was escorted by this same troop of light horse from Philadelphia to New York; and he was doubtless familiar with the sight of this standard. And, possibly, as Preble says, it suggested to him the thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, emblematic of the thirteen united colonies against the oppressive acts of Great Britain (whose symbol they yet retained in the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George), which we find him giving to the breeze at the time of the grand flag-raising at Cambridge in January, 1776.

But the time had come when this country must throw off the last semblance of royalty, and give to the nations of the earth a new power. Consequently, the crosses of England’s and Scotland’s saints must make a place for a blue field dotted with stars of a new constellation, according to the resolve of Congress on Aug. 14, 1777, “that the flag of the United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, and that the union be thirteen stars in a blue field representing a new constellation.”

The history of our flag is interesting. Undoubtedly, there was much discussion preceding the adoption of the stars and stripes; but no record has been preserved to us. There are many theories as to the origin of the device. By some the stripes are supposed to have been borrowed from the Dutch; by others, from the designating stripes on the coats of the Continental soldiers. It has been also said that the design of the flag was derived from arms borne by the family of Washington; but MacGeorge, in his book on “Flags,” says there is no foundation for this, and again says: “The white and red stripes are not peculiar to the American flag.” A flag of similar design was for a long time a well-known signal in the British navy. A British antiquarian, Lowes, supports the idea that Washington’s arms furnished the device, saying: “It is not a little curious that the poor, worn-out rag of feudalism, as so many would count it, should have expanded into the bright and ample banner that now waves from every sea.”

The same idea is maintained by the author of “Dame Heraldry,” who says: “The fact is, we are displaying, actually displaying, some of old England’s cast-off glory! Our stars and our stripes—altered a little, to be sure, to meet the needs of the occasion—come from the old Washington coat-of-arms.” And Ellis, in “Antiquities of Heraldry,” states: “The flag of the United States of America was adopted from the armorial bearings of Washington, their founder.” An English writer in 1780 ridicules the fondness of the American colonies for the number thirteen in this way: “Thirteen is a number peculiarly belonging to the rebels. A party of naval prisoners lately returned from Jersey say that the rations among the rebels are thirteen dried clams per day; that the titular Lord Stirling takes thirteen glasses of grog every morning, has thirteen enormous rum bunches on his nose, and that (when duly impregnated) he always makes thirteen attempts before he can walk; that Mr. Washington has thirteen toes to his feet (the extra ones having grown since the Declaration of Independence), and the same number of teeth in each jaw; that the Sachem Schuyler has a top-knot of thirteen stiff hairs which erect themselves on the top of his head when he grows mad; that Mrs. Washington has a mottled tom-cat with thirteen yellow rings around his tail, and that his flaunting it suggested to the Congress the adoption of the same number of stripes for the rebel flag.” Preble says it has been conjectured that the idea of the stripes as a symbol of union may have been derived from the flag of the Netherlands adopted for the national ensign as early as 1582, and also states: “It will probably never be clearly known who designed our union of stars. The records of Congress are silent upon the subject; and I have been unable to find mention of it in any of the voluminous correspondence or diaries of the time, public or private, which has been published.”

Some writer has said: “The stars represent a constellation of States rising in the west. The idea was taken from the constellation of Lyra, which, in the hands of Orpheus, signified harmony. The blue of the field was taken from the edges of the Covenanters’ banner in Scotland, significant also of the league and covenant of the United Colonies against oppression, incidentally involving the virtues of vigilance, perseverance, and justice. The stars were disposed in a circle, symbolizing the perpetuity of the Union.”

John Quincy Adams, in his oration at Newburyport, July 4, 1837, on the origin of the flag, gives color to the theory that Lyra was the emblem of the Union. The construction of the first national standard took place at Philadelphia in 1777, under the personal direction of Washington, aided by a committee of Congress, who called upon Mrs. John Ross, who carried on the “upholder” trade,—an occupation similar to modern upholstery,—with roughly drawn plans, which were redrawn according to her suggestions. She called attention to the six-pointed stars, like the stars of coins then in use, made according to English heraldry, suggesting that five-pointed stars would be more effective, thereby following the heraldry of Holland, France, and Germany; and so our first flag was made with the thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, and thirteen white, five-pointed stars in a blue field.

The resolution of June 14, 1777, says nothing about the arrangement of stars in the union; but in Trumbull’s painting of the “Surrender of Burgoyne” and Peale’s portrait of Washington we find that the artists have arranged them in a circle. In consequence of the admission of Vermont in 1791 and Kentucky in 1792 into the Union an act was passed increasing the stars and stripes on our flags from thirteen to fifteen, to take effect May, 1795.

The “Star-spangled Banner” that waved over Fort McHenry the night of Sept. 13, 1814, which Francis Scott Key has immortalized in his glorious poem and song, had fifteen stripes; and the union, with the fifteen stars in parallel lines, rested upon a red stripe, as did all the flags from 1794 to 1818. As other States were admitted, it was necessary to make a change; and in 1818 an act was passed which provided that the flag should be thirteen stripes, and one star be added to the union for every new State.

The manner of arranging the stars was never prescribed; and, in consequence, there has been a lack of uniformity in the matter. When our States numbered thirty-one, we find that the flags of most of the foreign vessels had the stars strewn over the blue. Some were arranged in the form of a lozenge, a circle, or a diamond: others had an anchor formed of the stars. On some the stars formed the letters “U S,” and on others we find one large star formed of thirty-one small ones. What wonder that the Dutch government was led to ask, “What is the American flag?”

One of the most interesting of the Revolutionary flags is the white silk flag of Washington’s life-guard, now in the Museum of Alexandria, Va. The neatly painted device represents a guard holding a horse and in the act of receiving a flag from the genius of liberty, personified as a woman leaning upon the Union shield, near which is an American eagle. The motto is “Conquer or die.”

The Maryland Historical Society has in its possession another most interesting flag,—that of Count Pulaski, who was appointed a brigadier in the Continental

Army in September, 1777. While the wounded Lafayette was a recipient of the care and hospitality of the Moravian nuns at Bethlehem, Pa., he was visited by Pulaski, whose history and presence made a lasting impression upon the minds of the sisters, who prepared a crimson silk banner with designs most beautifully wrought by their own hands. They enriched it with their blessing and consecration, the memory of which is preserved in Longfellow’s verse,—

“And the nuns’ sweet hymn was heard the while, Sung low in the dim, mysterious aisle,”— and sent it to Pulaski,—

“Take thy banner! May it wave Proudly o’er the good and brave!”
“The warrior took that banner proud,” bearing it gallantly through many martial conflicts, until he fell at Savannah in 1779; “And it was his martial cloak and shroud.”

The precious flag was saved, and carried to Baltimore, where it welcomed Lafayette in 1824.

The honor of displaying the United States flag in England for the first time belongs to an American painter rather than to a captain of a vessel, if a painted representation of it can be considered. To John Singleton Copley of Boston, the father of Lord Lyndhurst, must be awarded the honor; for he painted it streaming from a gaff on a ship bearing to America the intelligence of the acknowledgment of independence, as a background to the portrait of Elkanah Watson.

Great curiosity was excited among the people of China when the stars and stripes first appeared at Canton. News was carried hither and thither that from a far-away world a ship had come bearing a flag like a beautiful flower. Everybody went to gaze upon this flower-flag ship,—Kaw-kee-cheun they called it,—a name which at once established itself in the language; and America to-day is called Kaw-kee-kob, the flower-flag country.

The flag of the nation to-day has the thirteen stripes, red and white, and forty-four stars, the union of many States. Its history is a history of victory. When the breezes first caught its folds, more than a hundred years ago, it guarded a narrow strip of land. To-day it floats over a vast country washed by two mighty oceans. It is known on all seas and the remote places of the earth. Heroes have fought and died for the standard whose hues have been so poetically expressed in the lines:—

“And world-crowned America chose for her standard
The blush of the day and the eyes of the night.”

These beautiful colors have been immortalized by the artist Church in his painting, “Our Banner in the Sky.” Our sweetest poets have sung of it, our most gifted orators have eulogized it, but none with more eloquence than Charles Sumner, when he said: “Its highest beauty is in what it symbolizes. It is a piece of bunting lifted in the air; but it speaks sublimely, and every part has a voice. Its stripes of alternate red and white proclaim the original union of thirteen States to maintain the Declaration of Independence. Its stars, white on a field of blue, proclaim that union of States constituting our national constellation which receives a new star with every new State. The two together signify union, past and present. The very colors have a language which was officially recognized by our fathers. White is for purity, red for valor, blue for justice; and all together,—bunting, stripes, stars, and colors,—blazing in the sky, make the flag of our country to be cherished by all our hearts, to be upheld by all our hands.”

Spiritual Life.

The sense of the Divine Presence in all things is a gift of God, reward of faith, heaven on earth.—Mozoomdar.

The best faith is that the foundations of which are laid under the search-light of honest doubt.—David H. Moore.

Christianity is a way of life and righteousness, and it identifies righteousness with life; and it is so perfect in its spirit that life to it is nothing else but righteousness.—Merle St. Croix Wright.

The life of evil is from the same origin as the good, illustrated by the heat and light coming from the sun, which gives life alike to beautiful and healthful vegetation and to the opposite. The forms which receive it decide the result.—Swedenborg.

I believe that, if we could only see beforehand what it is that our heavenly Father means us to be, if we could have a glimpse of this, we should not grudge all the trouble and pains he is taking with us now to bring us up to that ideal which is his thought of us.—Annie Keary.

Our Lord teaches us as to those very little things in order that we may know and feel that nothing is too little to be ordered by our Father, nothing too little in which to see his hand, nothing which touches our souls too little to accept from him, nothing too little to be done for him. Dr. Pusey.

All is working in the right direction; for, in our view, there is a beneficent law and purpose inherent in the universe. But we must work with that law, so far as it is revealed to us. The struggle for existence still goes on; and, while it is no longer the same brutal conflict that was waged between savage races, or which we may witness in the plant and animal world, it is sharp and bitter. The moral side of life is weak. John Learned.

The vast burden of every human life is routine, and one's own routine is seldom "interesting." The real problem of every education is how best to prepare a man to carry his lifelong burden joyfully. Surely, it is not by deceiving him into the hope that it will be entertaining, nor by teaching him to avoid it as far as he can! Is it not rather by trying, in so far as in us lies, to make him see the interest which the uninteresting may have for him?—Atlantic.

The Sunday School.

Attention is called to the advertisement in another column announcing the publication of a New Song and Service Book by the Unitarian Sunday School Society.

A new tract for free distribution, No. 6, is just out, published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society. It is written by Rev. William H. Lyon, who takes for his subject "Music in the Sunday-school." This comes quite fitly now on the appearance of the New Song and Service Book, and will be a practical aid to the right use of that book.

The usual Channing Hall "talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, will be held next Saturday, April 6. Subject, Lesson XXVIII., "Jesus entering Jerusalem." Primary at 2 P.M., conducted by Miss A. C. Dockham; Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

NEW YORK UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—Next regular meeting, Monday, April 8 (second Monday), at the parish house of All Souls' Church, 104 East Twentieth Street. Directors' meeting at 4.30 P.M., business meeting at 5.30 P.M., supper at 6 P.M., discussion at 7 P.M. Subject, "What shall we do with Easter and Other Church Days in our Sunday-schools?" opened by Mr. E. J. Luce of Rutherford. George H. Badger, Secretary.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL MEETING OF BOSTON.—On Monday, March 18, the Unitarian Sunday School Union of Boston held its sixth meeting of the season. Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham of New Bedford introduced the subject, "The Relation of the Sunday-school to Citizenship." The mechanism of government need not be taught in the Sunday-school, but the spirit that underlies good government should be. Teach the absolute need of obedience to law; show the need of serving if one's country calls; surround the word "citizen" with a new, a higher, and more glorious meaning. No man can be a good man unless he is also a good citizen. This teaching need not crowd out lessons in the Bible, for one may learn much from the absolute devotion of the Jew to his city because he considered it holy. Then, too, these lessons should be taught only in the older classes. And by them we may meet two great weaknesses in our school; for we shall hold the older boys, and may induce more men to take classes in the school. Mr. Frothingham would place over every Sunday-school the advice of Pythagoras, "Make the child a good citizen of a good State."

Mrs. Fanny B. Ames says that the aim of the Sunday-school is to awaken a sense of citizenship in a large world. If a person is conscious of his relationship to civil society merely, he is a politician; if to industrial society merely, he is a labor agitator. Even the word "America" alone may have a narrowing influence; but there is a larger society still, the brotherhood of man. The Sunday-school is the beginning of a little spiritual world, in which the larger lessons of life may be taught.

Mr. John O. Norris of Melrose found the greatest danger to our institutions due to the ignorance and indifference of our people. The Sunday-school must teach a broader definition of citizenship than that taught in the Constitution. To be a good citizen, a man must know what he ought to do and have the will to do it. He must therefore be a good man, and that is his first duty as an American. Mr. Norris recommended Mrs. Wells's book for young children, Mr. Dole's "Citizen and Neighbor," and his more advanced book, as helpful in this work; but he believes that lessons in practical philanthropy and good citizenship may be learned from the daily papers. Above all, he would implant a right standard in the youthful mind. The young need to feel that material victories are of little value compared with spiritual ones, and that they must consecrate their lives. Other speakers were Rev. Edward A. Horton, Charles G. Ames, and George H. Hosmer.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. J. MICHAEL JONES, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

REV. WILLIAM M. BRUNDAGE, Ph.D., having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

WOMEN'S ALLIANCE.—At the next meeting of the New England Associate Alliance, which will be held in Lawrence April 18, Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows will speak of "The Faith and Courage of the Women of Armenia." One of the sessions will be given to Alliance work. Full particulars will be given next week.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Bradley Gilman will preach April 7. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D., will conduct the half-hour noon service at King's Chapel on Wednesday, April 10, at twelve o'clock. All are cordially invited.

Services will be held next week as follows: April 8, Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke, 5 P.M.; April 9, Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D., 5 P.M.; April 10, Rev. S. M. Crothers, 5 P.M.; April 11, Rev. Charles F. Russell, 5 P.M.; April 11, Rev. Charles F. Russell, 8 P.M., communion service; April 12, Good Friday, Dr. William Everett, 11 A.M., service and sermon; April 12, Dr. William Everett, 5 P.M.; April 13, Rev. John Cuckson, 5 P.M.

Ministers' Monday Club: April 8, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Thomas J. Horner will preside. Rev. Alfred E. Mullett will give the address, on the question, "Why should Liberals celebrate Easter?"

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Afternoon at 3.15; evening at 8, when Rev. C. R. Eliot will preach upon the subject, "Is Christianity a Failure?" Monday evening, debate at 7.45, upon the question, "Shall we give Greater Power to the Mayor or to the Common Council?"

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Popular Sunday evening service, April 7, at 7.30 o'clock. Speaker, Rev. Charles G. Ames. Subject, "The Path of Life." Music furnished by Mr. Fred E. Hahn, violinist, of Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr. Leon Van Vliet, cellist; Mr. Arthur M. Dow, tenor. All seats free.

The South Friendly Society of Dr. Hale's church has arranged a series of three entertainments for the benefit of their charities, when the following programmes will be presented. Monday, April 8: Dr. E. E. Hale, "A Man without a Country"; Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic"; Mrs. Julia Houston West, songs. Monday, April 15: Mrs. J. W. Andrews, "A Trip to India"; Music, "A Hindu Song." Monday, April 22: Dr. E. E. Hale, "Reminiscences, with his First and Last Battle"; Mrs. L. B. Fenderson, "The Star-spangled Banner," etc.; recitations. An informal reception will be held each evening from seven until eight o'clock. Season tickets, $2; single admission, $1.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS.—The congregation of the Austin Street Unitarian Church have availed themselves of a recent birthday of their junior minister, Rev. William H. Johnson, to present to him a handsome purse as a token of their hearty good will and of their appreciation of his labors, together with the assurance of their earnest co-operation in all good works, and of their hopefulness for the future of the parish. The arrangements were made with the utmost secrecy, and the surprise was complete.

CHELSEA, MASS.—By request, Miss Margaret B. Barnard will preach at the First Unitarian Church Sunday, April 7.

LAWRENCE, MASS.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian parish was recently held. Supper was first served by the ladies. Officers were elected for the ensuing year. The treasurer reported $5,888 raised during the year for regular expenses and paying off a debt of $2,250. The Unity Club, Women's Alliance, and the Sunday-school were all reported as specially prosperous.

NEW BRIGHTON, L.I.—On Sunday afternoon, March 31, dedicatory services were held in the new Unitarian church edifice. The Sunday-school was present; and the children opened the programme by a processional, under the leadership of Miss Elizabeth Curtis. Rev. Stephen H. Camp made the introductory, and Rev. Robert Collyer the dedicatory prayer. Addresses were made by Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, Rev. Theodore C. Williams, and Rev. Robert Collyer. Owing to the illness of Mr. Kirk B. Newell, his address on behalf of the church was read by Mr. Charles M. Porter. Many friends from New York and Brooklyn were present; and the church, which seats one hundred and fifty persons, was crowded. The new building is a pretty structure of brick and wood, with a vestibule and a library well stocked with books, which is kept open for the public as a library and free reading-room. The church cost $6,500. The membership numbers one hundred persons. Having settled no regular pastor, the services are conducted by neighboring ministers. On April 7 Rev. John W. Chadwick will preach.

PORTSMOUTH, N.H.—A series of lectures on "Noted Women" has just been given by Rev. George H. Young of Lawrence at the Unitarian chapel before the Unity Club. Subjects: "Elizabeth Barrett Browning," "George Eliot," "Charlotte Brontë," "Margaret Fuller."

SOUTH HINGHAM, MASS.—The parish at South Hingham celebrated its one hundred and fiftieth anniversary Sunday evening, March 24. The church was prettily and tastefully decorated, and a large audience listened to the inspiring remarks and the finely rendered music. Addresses were made by Rev. Minot J. Savage, Mr. W. H. Baldwin, Hon. John D. Long, and Rev. J. W. Day. Rev. Joseph Osgood, D.D., and Rev. W. E. Cadmus of Hingham took part in the services; and letters were read from Dr. Henry A. Miles and Rev. W. I. Nichols, one of the former pastors, and the original letter of acceptance written by Dr. Daniel Shute, the first minister, in 1746. Rev. A. G. Jennings of Toledo, once settled here, contributed an original hymn; and Rev. C. T. Billings, the present pastor, delivered an anniversary address. The occasion was a very successful one, and will be a pleasant memory for many days to come.

Business Notices.

Tour through Europe.—Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb have planned a magnificent European tour for the coming summer. The party will sail from New York May 18, on the splendid steamship "Lucania," and after a round of travel through Ireland, Scotland, and England, cross to the Continent, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Germany, Austria, Holland, Belgium, and France, together with other sections of Europe included in the continental tour; and there are to be many special features, such as a voyage through the western fjords of Norway and to the North Cape, and a visit to the great fair at Nijni Novgorod, one of the world's quaintest sights. A full itinerary of the trip may be obtained of Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street.

An Interesting Fact.—Deep down in the heart of every person of taste there is a love of leather-covered furniture and a yearning to own it in larger measure as modern competition reduces it in price. This year the drop in the price of leather-covered furniture is unprecedented. The prices quoted at the Paine warerooms on Canal Street are especially sensational. It is impossible to realize that leather furniture is so low in price until one sees the great crowd of buyers which have been at these warerooms all this month.

The preparation for Easter flower vases is larger than ever this year. Jones, McDuffee & Stratton have gleaned their stock from original sources in many countries. Mr. Stratton is now in Japan, and Mr. Theodore Jones in Austria, on their annual journeys through the potteries and glass houses.

For Coughs, Asthma, and Throat Disorders "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are an effectual remedy. Sold only in boxes.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

In Dorchester, 30th ult., Charles Barnard Fox, eldest son of Rev. Thomas B. and Feroline W. Fox, 62 years.

In Plymouth, 27th ult., Lydia M. Kendall, daughter of Rev. James Kendall, D.D., in the 82d year of her age. Miss Kendall was one of a large family sisterhood, one of whom alone is left. In common with her sisters she possessed a strong mind, pure heart, and a devoted spirit. The passing of such pure souls and the breaking of family ties make earth seem bereft, but they have an afterlife of blessed remembrance.

THE ANSWER.

BY E. F. MOSBY.

Within the ancient heavens, alit with dust
Of glittering stars, my soul did seek for God.
There awful Love, with beauty clad about
As burning flame; and Death, who thought not scorn

To lay her hands on man, that he might live;
There velled Sorrow led the young child, Faith,
Who scarce could say the name of "Father" plain;
And other shapes I saw, or bright or dark,
But saw not God.

Seeking His place with tears,
"In me," indignant Love replied; and Hell,
From depths unknown, responded low, "In me";
"Hast thou not heard," said, softly, gentle Death,
"I am the Resurrection and the Life?"
The earth—our earth—clung close about His feet,
All worlds and generations claimed Him theirs;
And in her longing my own soul beheld
The presence of her life, long sought in vain.

EVERY-DAY PHILOSOPHY.

BY WILLIAM ROUNSEVILLE ALGER.

VI.

Ill times well change when they change what is ill into what is well.

The votaries of falsehood always call a conversion to truth apostasy.

It is the universal interest, not the individual, that redeems and glorifies us.
The inspiration of an army is in their banner, not in their uniform.

When the lesser is most perfectly embraced in the greater, then is its office best fulfilled. Is not the heaven holier and sublimar than the spire which points to it?

The severity of our cross is the measure of our imperfection.

PLOTTING CONSPIRACY.

Holliness is consecrated impartiality.
There have been all through history powerful temptations persuading men to favor those whom they love, or admire, or revere, or desire to be participatingly associated with. An immense amount of evil has thus been done, and is still done. The following negative precepts forbid this vast fivefold wrong:—

Favor not the beautiful!
Favor not the strong!
Favor not the rich!
Favor not the ambitious!
Favor not the wise!

In contrast with these seductive forms of wrong, the right is summed up in one comprehensive precept,—namely, this: Approve and loyally aid the good, the true, the useful, the just, the docile; but show favoritism—that is, give disproportionate support—to no one. This maxim once uni-versalized in conduct, the world would be redeemed.

The last test of the religion of any one is, Does it fill him with obedient gladness and contentment? Alexander of Hales, the irrefragable doctor, said, "The three marks of grace are light, peace, and joy in the inner man." One of the most repulsive objects to be met in this world is a gloomy and grouty disciple whose religion plainly disagrees with him.

Through modesty and docility alone are the divinest things to be reached. One often finds that the higher he has ascended in pride among men, the lower he has descended in worth before God. If love be the queen of the Christian virtues, her favorite handmaid is humility.

ANALYSIS OF COMPLACENCY.

What is the nature of complacency, and what is its moral quality? Complacency is a reflective sentiment of self-congratula-tion, a mode of personal pleasure approvingly aware of itself. It is a feeling of satisfaction with one's self or with something assimilated in experience. It has three forms,—one neutral, one vicious, one meritorious. It is neither censurable nor laudable when it is simply justified by the facts of the case, as when one has fairly done his duty, but without sacrifice or enthusiasm. It is blamable when it is selfish, surcharged with egoistic bias, as when one gloats over a revenge he has taken. It is praiseworthy when it is disinterested and pure, evoked by a generous sympathy with others or with something especially noble and beautiful, as when we regard with delight the good of another person or a universal good, as if it were our own. The great danger of complacency is its tendency to degenerate into a dispro-portioned self-satisfaction, not based on worth, but on vain conceit. Under the pleasing and fondled impulse of this fallacy the mere good-natured happiness resulting from health and strength and prosperity flatteringly interprets itself as a proof of merit and a direct signal of the divine approval. Then one relishes himself so much that he cannot think of others. Thus attentive docility is smothered, and improvement prevented. On the other extreme, a fretful depression, or an exaggerated and idle remorse, is equally morbid and hurtful as an impediment to the true goal of blessedness. The desideratum is the wholesome, balancing virtue of disinterested complacency in the right.

FROM LONDON.

Our "Forward Movement" has had its day. We cannot claim for it a Japanese success. Many were called, but few have chosen. Each of us managed to hold his own little fort with distinct and emphatic bravery. Some of us did so almost single-handed, our own people, with altruistic grace, not venturing lest they should crowd out the unconverted. The weather also fought against us. No sooner did we set about telling the things commonly believed among us than the temperature fell even below the reputed Unitarian coldness. For a full month the frost prevailed. Then influenza also broke out. A doctor raps at every door. The death-rate, consequently, has its forward movement. And, as the last of our enlightening lectures—to crowds that never came—was given, we were in the thick of an epidemic.

"All things go together
To make a year
Or a sphere."

At Hampstead, where our families are thick upon the ground, Dr. Herford, despite everything, is reported to have beat down the Satan of empty pews under his feet, and to have seen seats lining the aisles. One can dimly imagine that such a sight must be a vision splendid. "Not always on the mount" have the rest of us been. It cannot be said that we have toiled all night and taken nothing; but, certainly, there is no net-mending requisite because of an overdraft.

Of clerical converts we have just now no lack. The curate of St. Sepulchre,—an old church near Newgate, whose bell tolled when Christians were about to hang one of their brethren,—has come fairly and squarely over to us. A priest of Rome is now an ex-priest, and is about to enter upon probation in our midst, Rev. Thomas A. Gordon. One of my Congregational neighbors, settled over his congregation for seventeen years, seeks now one of our free pulpits. A very interesting, genial, and cultivated gentleman, Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc., has also come over to us from the Roman Catholic Church, and has taken one of our London pulpits. Curiously enough, as I am told, quite a number of ex-Romanists have gathered to him, and form a good proportion of his more catholic congregation. The secret of this little exodus from Rome is interesting. Some months ago St. John Mivart published his much discussed article on "Happiness in Hell." To quite a number of Romanists hell had been, for some time, morally incredible. They were Roman Catholic Universalists, and they hoped that the infallible church might some day declare that eternal and hopeless torment was not. But the pope was so prompt to put "Happiness in Hell" upon the Index that their hope ceased. To believe in the authority of Rome was to believe that God would not only keep his anger forever, but pursue with his unjust wrath thousands upon thousands of their brethren, his own offspring, the brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ!
Rome, therefore, rules them no more. They are delivered from her bondage into the glorious liberty of a more just and hopeful belief. Dr. Klein, doubtless, better than any one else, knows how to meet the religious needs of such souls. I only hope that he may not find himself hampered in any way by certain old-fashioned Unitarian methods and traditions. Even Unitarians sometimes are slow to learn how many are the ways of the Spirit. Our modes of worship are often narrow, inert, and exceedingly lean,—calculated to starve rather than feed the hunger of many-sided souls.
Some of our people seem to feel that it is enough not to believe as others do, and not to worship, if we can help it, as others do.

Among interesting books on our tables just now are "Tales of Mean Streets," by Arthur Morrison; Jusserand's "Literary History of the English People"; and Max Nordau's "Degeneration." Mr. Morrison is a young man of whom we are likely to hear more. Even if we never do, we can but be glad that he has given us these tales, —sad ones though they be; and they are as sad as our saddest London life. His stories are as perfect transcripts of our East End characters and experience as Miss Wil-kins's charming tales are of New England life. Her material is far less grim, but she has not used it more faithfully. There is just one story, "The Red Cow Group," which does seem a little off the track of reality, a bit crudely imagined. But, then, so does Miss Wilkins's "Pembroke," in places. I think any one who reads these "Tales of Mean Streets" will learn how people live, what they are, what they are not, what they suffer, and how they endure the life that is given them, perhaps better than by living six months or a year in a University Settlement. Jusserand's book is a translation. We always lose a little when the delicacy of the French is exchanged for English, but less in this instance than usual, perhaps. At any rate, the book presents the English from a new point of view,—the literary rather than the governmental and social. Of course, all three grew together; but to take your picture from literature gives your history a new flavor. Jusserand is master of his material; and his style is free, full of color, is light, graceful, humorous, quite charming.
The preface is a model. Max Nordau's book is nothing if not lively reading.
Where most you disagree, he takes you entertainingly and vigorously to where he would have you be. The pages are many, but one does not yawn. Perhaps one feels at times that the argument is delightfully delirious, and concludes that one of two things must be true,—either that we do live in a strangely degenerate time or that Nor-dau himself is far gone in degeneration.

Last Monday evening Gen. Booth received from mighty London his welcome home.
Most hearty, rousing, and touching it was.
The ovation was in every way as remarkable as the man. The great Albert Memorial Hall has seen few more notable gatherings. Its capacious interior was packed from floor to ceiling. Twelve or thirteen thousand persons were ranged tier above tier round its huge amphitheatre. All the afternoon, too, the main thoroughfares of London gave evidence that something unusual was going forward. The sidewalks, the omnibus tops, the underground-railway carriages, were bright with stains of the real Salvation blood,—warranted genuine, and no mistake. No end of the stiff and ugly scoop bonnets of the lasses, or of the various uniforms of the masculine corps.
As I waited a chance to cross Fleet Street,
I heard a very unsaved rough say to his pal: "Look ye! There's some d—d blooming thing on to-night. All these blooming, bloody fellers about." The particular "blooming, bloody fellers" he indicated were six lasses just then mounting a 'bus.

When I entered the Albert Memorial at 6.30, half an hour before the time announced, the spectacular effect was already surprising. Four-fifths of the people were in their places. Directly in front of box 18, where I sat, quite across the hall, under the great organ, were massed hundreds of men quite hidden by their brightly burnished brass musical instruments. On either side of them, rising tier above tier, were ranged other hundreds of women in soft-tinted array, many-hued, the dominating colors being salmon, white, delicate pink and blue, —the whole effect singularly pleasing, quite a contrast to the usual crudeness of Salvation color. A little before seven the general's family arrived,—Bramwell Booth, his wife, and three of the general's daughters, with seven grandchildren. They were received with acclaim. At seven the exercises commenced, but as yet no general; and seats for more than a thousand persons were yet vacant, just in front of the great platform. The organ, the orchestra, and ten thousand voices united in "Boundless Salvation,"—a kind of religious song written by the general. The effect was certainly vigorous. Now and then tambourines and castanets and rhythmic clapping of hands, with waving of thousands of little bannerets, added to the material effect in which the moral and spiritual were en-fleshed. We had the "Marseillaise," and a hymn tune, "Monmouth," by the brazen instruments. We had a rather repulsive solo and chorus about the "Wounds of Jesus," to teach that these wounds are still "open for you." That teaching may have a meaning, but it does seem very carnal. Then we had the hall darkened, and "lightning flashes," showing us the general leaving Euston and many bits of America, all the way from Ottawa to Salt Lake City, and Fifth Avenue, New York, ending with arrival at Southampton,—just a flash along the path through which the conquering hero had come. We also had a prayer, very brief, just to its own point, —one that didn't tell God anything about how infinite or eternal or almighty or incomprehensible he was, but only thanked him that we had got "our dear general back again."

After all this had been going on for an hour, there was an instant of silence. Four staff officers came down from the platform, quite across the hall to its main entrance, the doors of which then opened, and there met the general and fell behind him. He entered, they following. The sight that then met his eye visibly staggered him.
The whole throng had risen to its feet. A mighty shout went up, before which the walls of Jericho would have had no chance.
Handkerchiefs waved, hallelujahs arose,
the organ pealed forth in triumphant tones, a storm of joy prevailed. After collecting himself, the general made his royal progress across the hall to the platform. This demonstration was so real that no one could witness it unmoved. Strong men all around me gave way to tears, and handkerchiefs just now on the wave were needed for drying eyes. What followed was equally touching,—a long procession of workers in the army. As it filed in, it seemed as if it would never end. And it represented about everything with which the army has to do.
First came International Headquarters Staff, twenty of them,—all men any church or sect might covet, if one may trust outward appearance; then foreign representatives and British field officers, and a hundred children; the Women's Rescue and Social Work contingent; also nurses, domestic servants, sailors and soldiers, all soundly saved, followed by firemen, and waifs and strays and dossers and men from the farm colony, the rear at length brought up by a number of officers about to be dedicated to foreign service,—some destined for Japan.
These various representatives, all of them with considerable brightness in their array, and constituting an altogether novel spectacle, wound up one side of the hall, mounted the platform, saluted the general or presented him an address, and then filed down the other side to the point of entrance almost, and then up the central aisle to the thousand seats or more that until now had been held in reserve for them. The general's family did homage unto him, and the seven grandchildren each received a kiss from him. Certainly, no one who witnessed all this could say, "There is no new thing under the sun." Evolution in our time has brought forth a species of religiosity and spectacularity altogether unprecedented.

The general at length spoke to his thousands. As one listens to his harsh, unsympathetic voice, and waits in vain for anything that savors of imagination or poetry or eloquence, or even of spirituality,—listens and listens, as I have often done, for morality touched with emotion,—the conviction comes that this man's power is not resident in his words. Mrs. Booth's words were with power. Very few have been such preachers as she. But here the heavy foot is never off the ground. There are no wings. Sentiment and fervor, when reached, seem forced and strained. Hundreds of captains and colonels in the army are better speakers than the general. Yet, if you ask, Has this man power? you have but to look around you. All these thousands, a large proportion of whom were coarse, dirty, indecent, despairing, sinking deeper and deeper, are now gentle, clean, self-respecting, full of illimitable hope, on their way to—nay, rather in the midst of—glory. It is a wonderful result, account for it how one will. Many prophets and kings may have desired to see results comparable to this that he sees, but died without the sight. Perhaps it will dawn upon the undiscerning at length that real bravery in brotherliness, downright determination to help and save in a very practical, common-sense way, is nine-tenths of this great sect and church-rebuke's power. He doesn't cast his deadly doing down, he doesn't argue about views, and he doesn't waste time in cool precisions of criticism. But for the saving of others, for the regeneration of thousands, he,—with all his prosaic utterances and all the egotism now forced upon him, and against which he knows that he must fight,—he has found a more excellent way. No doubt, millions will rise up to call him blessed. Has he any lesson for the Unitarian brain?

WORSHIP AND COMMON PRAYER.

BY REV. A. W. LITTLEFIELD.

We have builded many attractive rooms in our denominational temple. We have made them large, they are well lighted, the rubbish of the builders has been carefully swept out, good, honest, solid furniture we have put in, and everything seems well appointed. Here, surely, are comfort and rest; here the intelligent and honest man or woman may find the best that is to be had.

But we are not the only denomination that has been at work upon its temple of faith. Others are building. A little curious, we make a friendly visit to see what our neighbors are about. In comparing their results with ours, the results are, at first sight, very gratifying to us. Their rooms are still full of the workmen's rubbish,—old paper, with creeds and confessions scribbled on the back, and many a foot-note of curious attempts at interpretation. The architect either did not care enough for his reputation to carry away the evidences of his methods of work, or else he thought the owners might need the plans to explain matters to the timid and the uneasy. Then, too, the floor is covered with chips,—some, even, from the "German workshops" (brought over, perhaps, in the packings of some of the mediæval furniture imported from the Old World to adorn this modern temple in the New World). In every direction there seems to be confusion and disorder. Even the window-glass distorts the light of heaven.

The comparison, I repeat, is very favorable to us. Or would be, that is, but for one most obvious fact: in this cluttered and ill-lighted temple of our neighbor's, with its insubstantial and deceptive furniture, and amid the rustle of its crumpled paper creeds, the people outnumber those gathered in our beautiful, substantial, heavenly lighted, well-swept temple, five to one. And why? Not altogether obvious the cause, but still not so very hard to find. Our neighbors have neglected many things that should obtain in a modern temple; but they have not forgotten to put into their structure a great big fireplace, not to hurl the heathen and the unconverted into, but to warm and give glow and cheer to all within their gates, the stranger, the unconverted, and the heathen, as well as the communicant. A bright and ruddy fire they keep burning on the hearth. Whatever their other mistakes, they have made no mistake in this appointment. We have made just this mistake. Sitting in one of our comfortable chairs, made of solid oak for modern men, we may look out through windows so clear that we see distinctly the last-discovered star. We are sure that all is solid wherein we rest. But, however closely wrapped in the garments of our self-content, we feel the chill around us. And, what is still worse for us, others feel it, and go out and enter the temple across the way. No matter, for a while, that they do not see the distant star; little consequence if the floor be safer to sit upon than the rickety chairs that have hardly three sound legs to stand upon,—no matter, they say, about these things: we are, at least, warm.

We Unitarians have forgotten to provide appliances for heating our beautiful temple. The train of high and noble thought, alone, can no more keep us warm in our modern temple than spiritual fervor, alone, could keep our Puritan ancestors warm. The multitude turns its backs upon us. For this is a cold world, and the winds of misfortune are bleak. The crowd will gather around the fire, even in spite of the litter of creeds, the unswept floor, the rickety furniture, and the distorting window-glass. When they are sufficiently warmed, then they will take more kindly to viewing the stars. A few of us—perhaps—may possess a mantle ample enough and warm enough, so that we can run the risk of sitting in the chilly room and gaze out at the far-off stars. But not so the multitude: death would come too soon under such circumstances. Warmth first, and then the right: this is the natural order. We forgot our fireplace: hence our depopulated temple.

Now, to leave this figure and come straight to the point, we are suffering, as a denomination, to-day because we do not have in our churches the fire and warmth of an active devotional and expressive worship. No thought was ever clearer than that which comes from the Unitarian pulpit and press, no moral action grander than that inspired by the liberal faith. But never was a religious body so weak as ours as regards the devotional spirit of its public worship. The fact is, we are afraid of expressive and devotional worship. The joints of our neck and back and knees are stiff from fear. To ask one of our Unitarian congregations to kneel in common prayer together would be received by them with about as much delight as if one were to ask them to kneel before the guillotine. No! We are afraid of a devout and expressive worship.

The explanation is very easy. We have looked abroad in the past, and have seen that, unmistakably, the bulk of the immorality has come from those who outwardly worship most and most expressively. The author of "The Service of Worship and the Service of Thought" ably suggests this. Worship and hypocrisy have become almost synonymous terms, as we see things around us. Hence our fear of worship. But it is not because of worship that hypocrisy is rife, but because worship is largely associated with doctrines that are untrue and false to moral standards,—e.g., the vicarious sacrifice, etc.,—and because the object of most of the worship of Christendom—i.e., Christ—is not the proper object of worship. God is the only object of true worship, his moral law the only true standard of life. It is the associations of worship, and not the worship itself, that makes the hypocrite. The Pharisee and the publican both worshipped, but only one was a hypocrite. We should fear the false doctrine associated with worship, but not the worship itself. Worship is the sacred fire that warms into life our thought and action. Without worship, to give heat and vitality, our thought becomes the "chill negation," and duty but a philosophy of despair. When we can all kneel together in common prayer, devout and expressive, then our churches will warm into life and vigor. When we heat the beautiful temple of our creation, then the multitudes will come; and, having warmed them with the glow of worship, we may then enlighten them and inspire them with moral activity. Where are our children in our churches? Never taught to worship in the temple at the side of father and mother, kneeling in common prayer, they have, in too many instances, gone to kneel with strangers, or out into the prayerless world and its infinite temptations. Worship must have equal place with thought and work in our churches, else our temple will be deserted by every warm and devout soul. Let us have no fear of true worship.

One word more. If we are to have common prayer together, then we must have a common form of prayer. The liturgy is the logical necessity. We fear the liturgy, but needlessly. The Prayer Book never of itself made a hypocrite. Dorothea Dix's library was full of liturgical books. It is not the Prayer Book, but the falsities and untruths in the Prayer Book that create the hypocrisy. With a false note in the Prayer Book, a sophistical interpretation is necessary to explain and retain it. Hence the moral lapse. The liturgy, if it contains no false doctrine, is very helpful. The liturgy is an absolute necessity to common prayer, as much so as common prayer is to warm spiritual life. A liturgy expressive, honestly, of our great principles of religion and life would be the stoutest bond for our denomination that we could possibly have.

One faith expressed in one worship is a mighty power in any religion: the law holds good with us as well as with other denominations. A common liturgy (as I believe, the old English liturgy—our ancestral inheritance—modified) would draw us closer together and give us more denominational warmth than anything else possibly could. The father and the mother with the sons and the daughters kneeling together in common prayer, conscious also that everywhere where the liberal standard is planted other parents are kneeling with their children in the same common prayer,—this would indeed be an inspiration! And from it would stream the glow and warmth which we so much need to carry our magnificent truths to the American people, that these truths may find lodgment in the popular affections and bring the people gladly to our temples. Kindle the true and pure devotional fire, good liberal friends, then your temple will be "warm and bright and good to all," and will be all alight with the radiance from within as well as from that which gleams from the distant star.

THE STORY OF THE CIVIL WAR.*

This handsome octavo volume of two hundred and seventy-four pages has the external features which invite the reader. Its topography is beautiful, and the indispensable maps of such a history are so arranged as to be easily consulted during the reading.

Mr. Ropes is well known in Boston among a large company of those who are interested in the study of the campaigns of the war for the Union as one of the most accurate and well-informed of military critics.

To a wider body of readers his discussion of some of the special campaigns of the war, as well as his contributions to Napoleonic literature, have given him the reputation of one who can throw important light upon some of the disputed problems of war, and whose treatment of the issues between North and South will always be judicial, and as generous to the Confederate as to the Union soldier.

This book does not aim to present a picturesque and flowing narrative of the secession war, but is rather a series of critical studies, fresh and suggestive, of the motives (political and social), the military conduct, and the ability of the leaders upon both sides of the war.

As a key to the Southern spirit, emphasis is specially laid upon the difference between the man of the South and the Northern citizen in their respective estimates of their patriotic obligations. The Southerner, it is said, had been taught from youth to consider his most sacred loyalty to be due to his State, while the Northerner thought first of his national responsibility. A remark of Secretary Cass is quoted upon this point: "I speak to Cobb, and he tells me he is a Georgian; to Floyd, and he tells me he is a Virginian. I am not a Michigander: I am a citizen of the United States."

Undoubtedly, this extreme State rights feeling was a more powerful influence upon the Southern imagination than upon that of the average Northern man; and yet the State pride was pretty well developed, as it is still maintained, all over the North, inasmuch that a New Englander was apt to resent national legislation apparently aimed at the interest of his native State quite as vehemently as did the South Carolinian.

I suspect that the first outbreak of fervor for the Union awakened in those who stood by the nation a sentiment of nationality which had been dormant before, just as the Mexican War begat in the troops enlisted from the Southern States a zeal for national success not less than that displayed by the men from Massachusetts.

The truth is that, when there is a conflict betwixt duty to one's neighbors and kindred and to one's remote associates under protection of a common government, blood will invariably be thicker than water. The Southern people had been wrought up to a pitch of distrust of the nation, under false reasons, to be sure, but none the less persuasive, such as was utterly unknown to anybody North; but there was a time sixty years before when the New Englander was not shocked at the idea of secession. This explanation of the action of men of sensitive principles like Lee, Mr. Ropes remarks, should be taken into serious account in judging their morality in fighting against the country which had educated and honored them.

In his ample discussion of the differences between the administration and McClellan concerning the operations of the Army of the Potomac the author distributes praise and criticism with impartial hand. He blames Lincoln for his many unwise attempts at deciding military matters upon which he was ill advised, and criticises McClellan for those defects which have been apparent to all students who are out of reach of the partisan atmosphere of the time.

There is a disposition among the admirers of Lincoln to accredit him in 1861 with a sagacity and knowledge in his proposed strategy which, in my opinion, belongs, if anywhere, only to a later period of the war. Experience is a widener of minds which have a capacity of being taught, and Lincoln learned many things in two years of which he was very ignorant at first.

But this unacquaintance upon the President's part with the management of armies was often unduly presumed upon by McClellan, who had as much to learn of politics and human nature as others had of the art of war.

Mr. Ropes mentions a fact which has not been generally understood, that McClellan's overestimate of the enemy's numbers was a common fault of the early generals, due principally to the incapacity of the secret service officers for obtaining trustworthy information. The provost marshal's department later learned to get the truth to a high degree of accuracy from examination of prisoners and deserters.

It will be interesting to those who are acquainted with operations in the West, upon which Mr. Ropes only briefly touches, to see his high estimate of the talents of Gen. Buell, who was retired midway of events, like his friend McClellan. He rates the judgment of Buell, as displayed at the beginning, as that of a first-class soldier. The present volume, as its title-page indicates, treats only of the period of 1861, and that chiefly in the department of Washington. It will be followed by other volumes.

G. A. T.

INTRODUCTION TO THE PEDAGOGY OF HERBERT. Edited by Charles De Garmo. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co.—This introduction to the works of Herbart is an authorized translation under the auspices of the Herbart Club. Such an introduction has certainly been needed, partly, as President De Garmo says, because of the organic nature of his systematized thought and the importance of the ideas themselves, but also because it has been difficult to understand the aims of Herbart and his school without such a guide. The development of sound moral character through the activities of the school is put as the end of education, and the apperception or mental assimilative power of the child guides to the means by which the end is to be reached. This introduction, says the editor, "has been the bridge over which thousands of teachers have passed to independent study and research"; and it may well be as useful in this country as in Germany.

THE LITERATURE OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By William Minto. Edited by William Knight. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Even among the many recent books on various phases of English literature there is room and welcome for anything written by Prof. Minto, whose "passionate desire for clear thinking and clear expression" made him an inspiration to his students and a valuable critic of literature and philosophy. These lectures, after considering the position of men of letters in the eighteenth century, study carefully the poets and novelists of the period. Prof. Minto died about two years ago; and his friend William Knight contributes a biographical sketch to this volume, which will have the effect of acquainting many with his work and character to whom he has hitherto been but a name.

CASTLE RACKRENT AND THE ABSENTEE. By Maria Edgeworth. With an Introduction by Anne Thackeray Ritchie. New York: Macmillan & Co.—Mrs. Ritchie's introduction is a charming preface to these two stories of Irish life by which, she thinks, Miss Edgeworth will be best remembered. The picture of "the capital, bright soul" is as graphic as are all the rest of Mrs. Ritchie's portraits. The history of the Rackrents and "The Absentee," of which Ruskin once said, "You can learn more of Irish politics by reading of it than from a thousand columns out of blue books," will please their old friends in this attractive form, and win new ones, if there are any of the younger generation who can spare the time for a leisurely, old-fashioned "narrative," as the writer called it.

MODERN MISSIONS IN THE EAST: THEIR METHODS, SUCCESSES, AND LIMITATIONS. By Edward A. Lawrence, D.D. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This report of mission work is based on a twenty months' missionary journey round the world, with the express purpose of studying the aims and methods of different denominations in this field, and was first presented in lectures in Andover Theological Seminary and in Yale College. The author has recently died suddenly, and Dr. Eaton of Beloit College has written a memorial introduction to the volume. Dr. Lawrence's convictions as to the value of the missionary work were genuine, and his words as to its future full of hope and courage, even when recognizing the dangers of a sacerdotal or intemperate Christianity.

JAMES HENRY CHAPIN. By George Sumner Weaver, D.D. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This biography of one of whom it has been said, "He performed the common duties of every-day life in such a royal way that he was an inspiration and joy to those who knew him," follows him through his school and college days, his career as a minister, as agent for the Sanitary Commission, the Massachusetts Universalist Convention, etc., as professor and financial agent of St. Lawrence University, and in his travels, up to the time of his death in 1892. It is a loving tribute to Dr. Chapin's personal manliness and genuine service to the cause of humanity.

MOLIERE. Translated by Katharine Prescott Wormeley. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.50.—The third volume of this series contains "Les Femmes Savantes" and "Le Malade Imaginaire," together with a brief introduction, chiefly devoted to a study of the influence of the Hôtel de Rambouillet and its delightful coterie of writers, statesmen, and charming women. Miss Wormeley's translations have been accepted so long that they no longer need the praise of reviewers. She gives not only the meaning, but the atmosphere of the books she translates.

LITTLE DORRIT. By Charles Dickens. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.—The introduction to this new edition of "Little Dorrit" is by Charles Dickens, the younger, and shows the place which the book held in its writer's life. Novelists come and novelists go: contestants for realism and for idealism wage their eternal conflict, sometimes approaching each other, and again separating violently; but still the novels of Dickens sell in the stores, and still men and women quote his sayings and laugh gently over his exaggerations.

PAUL AND VIRGINIA. By Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. Translated with a biographical and critical introduction by Melville B. Anderson. Chicago: A. C. McClurg. This convenient edition of the dear old French tale appears in the series of Laurel-crowned Tales. The new translation is admirable, and may well lay claim to a literary merit not generally found. Prof. Anderson's introduction comprises a sketch of the author's life and critical accounts of his principal works, as well as a summary of the best things said about him by others.

THE PARABLES BY THE LAKES. By W. H. Thomson. New York: Harper & Brothers.—These studies of the parables are written in the light of an intimate knowledge of the land in which they were first delivered. They are frequently related to those scenes and surroundings, and the relation affords striking commentaries on their meaning. The writer treats them as special revelations of Christ himself, foretelling the kingdom not of this world. Their interest is not dependent on any one view of Jesus, however.

LA POUDRE AUX YEUX. Comédie. Par MM. Eugène Labiche et Édouard Martin. Edited by Arthur H. Solial. HAROLD. Von Ernst von Wildenburgh.—The French comedy and the German tragedy are issued in the brown linen covers of the Maynard series. They are designed for school use, and are well provided with notes and vocabularies. They are attractive in form and content, and supply admirable supplementary reading as well as opportunity for class work.

Miscellaneous.

No. 4 of the "Little Journeys to the Homes of Good Men and Great," by Elbert Hubbard, is an extremely pleasant sketch of William E. Gladstone and his beautiful home at Hawarden. It will probably be translated into Armenian, for the Armenians are anxious to know more about one in whom they trust as the friend of their country.

The second series of Unitarian leaflets published by Philip Green, London, is called "Think for Yourself." Eleven short papers, by nearly as many writers, are printed in a little volume that easily slips into the pocket. The writers are mostly English, but two extracts from Channing and Whittier's "Eternal Goodness" make worthy American contributions.

The Magazines.

The Manifesto, the periodical published by the Shakers, contains an interesting instalment on the "History of South Union, Ky.," including a letter written to Lincoln in 1863 by the Shakers of that place. There are also communications from the various settlements as well as short articles of more general interest.

The two principal articles in the Pansy for April are both serials,—the one by Mrs. Alden herself, and the other by Margaret Sidney. It is a pity that in so small a magazine serial stories are admitted at all, much less made the chief feature. There is an instructive article on "The Eagle," by L. H. M. Palmer; and another number of the Roman literature papers is given.

The fourth number of the Hesperian contains brief articles of "Samuel Johnson," "On Johnson's Style," and "On Life in Stageland"; "A Literary Chapter" chats about various topics of interest; and "Late Literature" comments with considerable vigor on William Henry Thorne, the Globe Review, Mrs. Burton Harrison,—who, by the way, is here most severely criticised,—and Brook Farm.

In the Rosary for April may be found a sketch of Marshal Bosquet, "one of the truest of lovers," whose lifelong devotion was given to his mother. "St. Joseph's Working Boys' Home," "The Shrine of St. Ursula," and "A Page of Church History in New York" are all illustrated articles. Perhaps the article most interesting to general readers is "Joan of Arc before the Bar of the Church," by Rev. Reuben Parsons, D.D.

The Sunday Magazine starts off each month with a fresh instalment of its serial story, "The Tender Mercies of the Good," by Christabel R. Coleridge. The concluding papers of "Salisbury Palace" and "The Angel of St. Jude's" are in the March number, and a series of articles on "Women in the Mission Field" is begun by Rev. A. R. Buckland. "The Gospel of New Boots," by Rev. Joseph Woodhouse, is a touching story of helpful service done. Other articles are "Labor and Laborers," by Rev. Prebendary Harry Jones; "On Pulpits," by S. Baring-Gould; and "The

* THE STORY OF THE CIVIL WAR. By John Codman Ropes. Part I. To the Opening of the Campaigns of 1862. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

New Heaven for Men," by the Lord Bishop of Ripon.

After the group of Easter pictures in Scribner's Magazine for April comes an interesting article on "Prince Charles Stuart," that "most comparative, rascallest, sweet young prince," by Andrew Lang. W. D. Howells concludes "A Circle in the Water," while the serials by President Andrews and George Meredith are continued. Robert Grant, in "Education," discusses public and private schools, willing to see all sides of the question. There is a good story of girls' college life by Abbe Carter Goodloe, entitled "La Belle Hélène," and three or four poems, besides "The Point of View," which touches on several interesting topics.

Lend a Hand for March contains its usual number of short, effective articles. "The Salvation Army" claims attention first; and it is shown that this organization is not a sect, and that it cannot be measured by statistics of its enrolled members. Hon. Hoke Smith's speech before the Indian Commissioners urges permanence in the service and the elimination of politics. "The Character and Characteristics of Francis Wayland, President of Brown University"; "Educational Work in Alaska"; "The Co-operation of Catholics and Protestants in Education"; and the Harvard College report,—receive attention in turn; while the longest article in the magazine is by G. W. Lee, and discusses the report of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, entitled "Unemployment."

Donahoe's Magazine for April contains two articles that are especially rich in photographs,—"Senators of the Catholic Faith, Past and Present," written by A. J. Faust; and "Two Montana Cities, Butte and Anaconda," by J. M. Kennedy. The latter of these contains nearly forty pictures of prominent men and women of those towns. There are two or three articles of political or social interest, as many stories, and some good poetry, from which we take the following little poem by Father Tabb. It is called "Recognition":—

"At twilight, on the open sea,
We passed, with breath of melody,—
A song to each familiar sung
In accents of an alien tongue.

"We could not see each other's face,
Nor through the growing darkness trace
Our destinies; but brimming eyes
Betrayed unworded sympathies."

The International Journal of Ethics contains articles from Wales, Russia, Italy, Germany, and America. J. S. MacKenzie, writing of "Self-assertion and Self-denial," shows that the following of our true vocation demands a continual process both of surrender and development; and, the further we advance, the more likely are we to regard the words as synonymous. Mr. W. M. Salter discusses "Moral Forces in Dealing with the Labor Question," believing that the moral solution must come first, and be the precursor of all external changes. W. Lutoslawski, the Russian, contributes an article on "The Ethical Consequences of the Doctrine of Immortality"; Henry Charles Lea, one on "Philosophical Sin"; and Luigi Ferri of the University of Rome presents a valuable estimate of "National Character and Classicism in Italian Ethics." There is also a discussion of "Rational Hedonism," in which four writers share; and there are the usual book reviews.

In an article entitled "Moral Standards of To-day," in the Free Thought Magazine for March, Rev. John E. Roberts asserts his belief in the higher law that says "Thou shalt" rather than "Thou shalt not," and says that the ideal life is that which will come when moral standards are outgrown and there is perfect freedom. William Hale describes briefly the life of Stendhal, claiming him as the first writer of the modern realistic school. "Young Thompson's Curious Case," by Hudor Genone, explains the unwillingness of the free thinker to disturb the faith of others. It is because no eternal harm can come from his silence, while much temporary harm may result from his speech, and because the moral and the motive are supreme. Mary Proctor gives an interesting report of free lectures that have been given in twelve grammar schools of New York during the winter season. There are the usual short contributions to the literary department.

The first thing of note in the Harper's Magazine for April is the frontispiece, in which an angel, who has apparently come straight from Paris, sleeves and all, relieves by contrast the pathetic, drooping figure below her. The most notable article of the number is the first instalment of "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc," which will evidently give, when completed, a remarkable study of the life and character of the French heroine. Josiah Flynt writes of "Club Life among Outcasts," which forms an admirable companion to the articles Mr. Sanborn has been writing lately about his experiences in cheap lodgings. Richard Harding Davis's "Paris in Mourning" describes the French capital as it was in the days of Carnot's death and burial. Julian Ralph is represented by two articles,—"Our National Capital," fully illustrated; and "People We Pass," a story which touches the lives of common people with curious comprehension. There are other articles and stories of interest.

The Forum for April contains several articles of interest, the first of which is "The Real Quintessence of Socialism," by W. H. Mallock. He finds this quintessence not in the proposal to substitute the State for the private employer or capitalist, but in the proposal to extinguish the existing motives to the exercise of exceptional powers which would be as essential as now, and yet to keep their exercise in the present intensity. Edward Atkinson writes of "The Battle of Standards and the Fall of Prices." J. B. McMaster answers the question, "Is Sound Finance Possible under Popular Government?" by showing that in this country all great, important questions are finally settled by the hard common sense of the people, who, in their own way and time, have heretofore settled things wisely. Henry Holt presents more remedies for social discontent. Henry J. Fletcher writes of "The Doom of the Small Town," and Helen Zimmern gives much information concerning the status of "Women in European Universities." Of especial interest is Alvan F. Sanborn's "A Study of Beggars and their Lodgings," written from actual knowledge and experience.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.

Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.

The third volume in the cloth-bound series of "Life" books,—"A Child of Nature," by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter,—is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its content, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. "The graceful little volume," as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-teaching, "the message" of Mother Nature "that is ready for the human heart."

Five Services for Public Worship

WITH

SERVICES FOR SPECIAL OCCASIONS.

As stated in its Preface, "The preparation of this book was undertaken in response to a demand for some new book of worship less costly than the book entitled 'Prayer and Praise' and of somewhat different character. The 'Five Services,' here republished, have been arranged in such order that the Te Deum may be sung on the second and fourth Sundays of the month instead of the first and second; and various other changes have been made corresponding to suggestions received from ministers who desire to use them. Especially, an attempt has been made to introduce into the 'rubric' the utmost possible degree of flexibility."

The book is a 16mo, of 226 pages, is bound in cloth, and sold, at retail, for 50 cents, and 40 cents to societies introducing it and to ministers.

PEACE.

BY ELINOR HISCOCK.

The rays of light fall clear and bright,
So full of joy as they come dancing.
On tree and flower in every bower
Are sent the merry sunbeams glancing.
Peace comes we know not whence

So pure and white, so soft and light,
The snowflakes come in countless measure.
They, too, are bent on good intent;
For they contain for earth a treasure.
Peace comes we know not whence.

The raindrops fall, clouds like a pall
Hang o'er my heart so sad and cheerless.
But God is good, these are but food
For those who grow through sorrow fearless.
Peace comes we know not why.

The gentle rain, as well as pain,
All comes to make the world the fairer.
For thus we learn that souls then turn,
With hope and faith, to something rarer.
Peace comes we know not why.

The sun will shine, light will enshrine
All those who lean with face uplifted,
To catch the glow which falls below
From Love divine, through shadows rifted.
Peace comes we know not how.

The sweetest joy, without alloy,
Is that which comes from freely giving.
To give is life, to love is life:
These blend in one in all true living.
Peace comes we know not how.

And Love is all, in hut or hall,
In winter's blast or springtime vernal.
In God we trust, in Him we must Find life and strength and joy eternal.
Peace comes, it comes from Love.

So Love divine, on every line
That fills the page of our life's story,
Flows full and free; and we shall see
In Light and Life the whole of glory.
Peace comes, it comes from Love.

THAT DAWSON BOY.

BY MARY C. BARTLETT.

Miss Amanda Goldsmith had sprained her ankle. It was a bad sprain, the doctor said. So for weary weeks she sat at the window in an easy-chair, the injured member carefully bandaged.

Miss Amanda was not naturally a patient person, and it was hard for her to forego the housework in which her soul delighted for the sewing which she detested.

"I'm as tired of that foot as if it was a baby," she exclaimed impatiently to her niece one day.

"It's been a pretty good foot to you, after all, auntie," answered Maria, who was carefully swathing the lame ankle.

"So it has. I've always made it go, but it's got the better of me now. O-h!"

"Too tight?" asked Maria, with sympathy. "I'll ease it a little."

She did so, and then left her patient to her meditations. Judging by Miss Amanda's face, these were not pleasant. She sewed a little, but her thread broke and her spool rolled away into a corner. This state of things did not greatly grieve her. She folded her work, and turned her attention to the passers-by. Of these, first and foremost came the Dawson boy.

"I knew it!" cried Miss Amanda to herself. "I knew that boy'd be round to the store again before two o'clock. That's three times this morning. I wonder if his mother ever keeps two cents' worth of anything in the house. What's that hanging out of his bundle? A piece of meat, as sure as I live. And he's tantalizing that little dog with it. Here! Stop that! I can't stand it."

She was about to rap on the window-pane, when she saw the boy stoop and stroke the dog caressingly. Then, opening another bundle, he took out a roll, and held it up before the hungry animal.

Miss Amanda's quick sympathies veered about, like an inconsistent weather-vane.

"Don't you do that!" she called impatiently. "A whole roll to that dumb beast! I don't believe your mother has any bread to spare, either. Stop it now! Stop it this minute!"

This time she did rap loudly with her thimble finger; but, alas! the roll had disappeared.

Hearing the summons, the boy ran quickly to the window, a look of surprise on his rosy face. Passing the house many times daily, his bright eyes had by no means overlooked the slight figure, as it sat so persistently day after day in the same sunny corner.

"Seems to me she keeps awful still nowadays," he would say to himself. "Used to see her dustin' round and cleanin' up things. Wonder what ails her."

"You're sick, ain't you?" he remarked, as he reached the window.

Miss Goldsmith's reply was hardly to the point.

"What are you giving that good roll to that dog, for?"

"Ma'am?"

"Oh, dear!" cried Miss Amanda. "He can't hear a word." She made a vigorous effort to open the window, but the only result was a twinge of pain from the remorseless ankle.

"Don't stand there looking at me!" she exclaimed petulantly. "It's of no use. Your mother wants you."

She waved her hand impatiently. Still the boy lingered.

"Was there ever such a dunce? He doesn't even know enough to go home. Maria, tell that boy, if he stands gaping at me any longer, I'll take my cane to him."

Maria opened the door. The boy ran to her with an eager inquiry.

"What does she want?"

"She wants you to go home."

"But I was goin' home when she called me over."

"She thought you were giving too much of your good bread to that dog."

"Oh!"

"She wants you to go home now," repeated Maria.

"But she pointed this way,"—illustrating,—"and I live that way."

"Never mind. Take the shortest way. Good-by!"

But the Dawson boy didn't stir. "She's pretty sick, ain't she?"

"She has sprained her ankle. It pains her badly."

"I thought somethin' pained her. She kep' so still. It's too bad, ain't it?"

"Yes, it is too bad. Good-by!"

"My father's aunt broke her hip, an' never stepped a step after it."

"I'm very sorry. Good-by!"

The boy turned to go, but called back, in a would-be solemn tone, "She's dead."

"That's very sad," responded Maria. "Good-by!" and she shut the door.

"So he's gone at last," said Miss Amanda, wearily. "That boy aggravates me to death. I believe I'll tell him to take another street."

But she didn't tell him, and the Dawson boy came and went daily. He watched Miss Amanda with keenly sympathetic eyes, heedless of the disapproval which hers expressed so keenly; and, when one morning he found the chair empty, and saw its late occupant moving slowly about the room, he perched himself up on the opposite fence, that he might watch his patient more at his ease.

"She has to go it slow," was his mental comment; "but I guess she'll get about again." And down he jumped and off he went, to do the errand which he had forgotten.

It was more than a fortnight after this that a small figure, slightly bent and leaning upon a cane, stepped out from the doorway of the corner house. Unexpected business called Miss Goldsmith to the city. To take a carriage would have seemed reckless extravagance to the thrifty little woman, so she limped painfully to the corner.

"Hope I've allowed time enough to catch that car," she thought anxiously. But, alas! just as she was within a few steps of the white post, the "electric" swept noisily and spitefully by.

"What am I to do now?" she asked herself, much disturbed. And, indeed, there was cause for anxiety. The next car was not due for fifteen minutes. To go back was not to be thought of. The poor ankle, so long unused to active work, was throbbing painfully. She looked around. There was absolutely nothing upon which to rest, and to stand longer seemed impossible.

She leaned heavily upon her cane. A feeling of helplessness came over her. It was a feeling altogether new and strange, and she didn't like it.

Suddenly she heard a sound of whistling, which seemed familiar; and the Dawson boy appeared upon the scene. This time he carried in his arms three bundles of kindling-wood, which he had just purchased.

"It's too bad you lost that car," he remarked with sympathy.

"Yes," replied Miss Amanda, grimly.

"If I'd been up here, I'd 'a' made him stop."

"You'd have done great things," sarcastically.

"Ankle pain you much?" asked the boy, with unabashed good-nature.

"Some."

"Hurts you to stand up, don't it?"

"Yes, it does," as a fresh twinge of pain made Miss Amanda scowl.

The boy scowled also. He was thinking deeply. Suddenly his face brightened.

"I can fix you up a seat, if you'll sit on it," he said eagerly.

"You! How?"

"Why, so!" And down went the three bundles of wood upon the pavement. Carefully he placed them one over the other, fitting them perfectly.

"There!" he ejaculated with great satisfaction. "Seems's if they was made for it, don't it?" Small and perilous as seemed the resting-place, it was, nevertheless, very inviting to poor Miss Amanda.

"Are you sure they'll hold together?" she asked anxiously.

"I'll try 'em." And the Dawson boy sat down very hard, trying his weight with a recklessness which argued well for the improvised seat. He turned, he twisted, he bounced up and down. Finally, he stood upon it, waving his hands, like a professional acrobat.

"It's all right," patronizingly. "Just you try it! You ain't very heavy, are you? How much do you weigh, now?"

Miss Amanda didn't seem to notice this important question. The Dawson boy thought she was laughing.

At all events, she deliberately seated herself upon the kindling-wood, the boy holding the bundles together until it was perfectly safe to let go.

"There she is!" he exclaimed in a jubilant tone. "Ain't that enough sight better'n standin' up on a lame ankle, now?"

"Indeed it is!" was the grateful reply. "It was a bright idea of yours, and I'm very much obliged to you. But isn't your mother in a hurry for the kindling?" she asked, after a pause.

"Oh, she can wait. She'd just as lives."

"But you ought always to do your errands as quickly as you can."

"Lucky for you I didn't this time, ain't it?"

Miss Amanda was silent. Was she laughing again? If she was, she recovered herself quickly, and looked at the boy before her with a genuine interest.

"He is really a very good-looking little fellow," she said to herself.

They were in the midst of an animated conversation, when they heard the distant sound of the autocratic electric. Miss Amanda rose quickly, while the Dawson boy seized his bundles with a "Whoop-la! Come on! We've got to go to that other corner," and ran nimbly across the street, leaving his companion to follow.

"You needn't hurry," he cried complacently: "they'll have to stop." And, surely, the haughtiest electric in the land could hardly have ignored the vociferous shouting, the brandishing of arms, and the frantic waving of kindling-wood which announced to the amused conductor that a lady was comin'.

"Good-by!" screamed the boy.

"Good-by!" called Miss Amanda. And she was off.

Every one looked at her as she entered the car, flushed, half with annoyance, half with amusement, and feeling, as she afterward expressed it, "like somebody in particular."

The elderly gentleman beside whom she took a seat looked benignly down upon her.

"Your son is an attentive little fellow," he remarked pleasantly.

Miss Amanda could only nod politely. "He must be a great comfort to you."

She tried in vain to reply. The gentleman looked at her more curiously.

"A queer couple," he thought to himself. Then he unfolded his newspaper, and forgot them both.

Miss Goldsmith accomplished her errand and returned home, very tired, it is true, but with that sense of relief which always accompanies a duty done. As she and Maria were sitting together over their desert that noon, they heard a vigorous knocking at the back door.

"That must be the Dawson boy," exclaimed Miss Amanda. "Bring him in here, please: I want to see him."

"The Dawson boy!" cried Maria, with surprise.

"Yes. He's coming every day. I've engaged him to do my errands."

"Coming every day!—to do errands! That Dawson boy!" Maria could say no more.

"I knew 'twould surprise you," said Miss Amanda, with an apologetic little laugh. "But—well—you see, Maria, we all have our streaks of good and bad, every one of us; and there's a very broad streak of good in that Dawson boy. I found it out this morning. When I get fairly rested, I'll tell you all about it."

AN OLD FRIEND.

His real name was Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum; but this was such a mouthful, and took so long to say, that it became shortened into first Dum-Dum, and lastly Dummy. As little Margot Woodhouse said, Dummy was a nice, comfortable name for a donkey, and seemed to suit this one's good-tempered, sleepy old face. Besides, he would answer to it in the leisurely fashion peculiar to donkeys, especially if a fine red carrot were flourished invitingly.

Then you might see Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum prick his long ears, and advance toward the gate at a very slow trot. He would eat everything that was offered him, and in the most amiable way let you play with his ears while he munched.

Margot and Colin Woodhouse were two small members of a very large family. To begin with, they possessed more aunts than most children, and some great-aunts besides. Of all these, they liked Aunt Fanny the least, because she always remembered their bedtime to the minute, which was most unnecessary; and they liked Aunt Scribble the best. The real name of this aunt was Sybil; and it was Colin who altered it into Scribble, because she wrote stories that got printed, and used such a lot of ink, some of it on her fingers. Aunt Scribble was better than any book, because books have a way of coming to an end very quickly, if you gallop through them, whereas Aunt Scribble could go on telling tales one after the other, 'all out of her own head.

Colin had his own ideas about stories. "Nothing instructive, ma'am, if you please," he would say,—"nothing about stones or mummies."

Nor, being a spoilt young pickle, did he hesitate to thump Aunt Scribble on the back if she disobeyed his orders. Sometimes the story-teller retaliated, Margot joined in, and a regular good romp was the result.

"You spoil those children, Sybil," said the other aunts; but she only laughed, and said that spoiling was good for people, and would Colin please pick up the cushions off the floor, and not be a raging, roaring, little wild Indian any more.

It was Aunt Scribble who gave the donkey his remarkable name. She and the two children were sitting on a heap of hay in the field one hot afternoon; and it happened that in the course of a most exciting story about a goblin king and a gold mine and a wicked magician that Aunt Scribble had to cry in a solemn tone:—

"If you call me, I shall come: Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum!"

At that very moment a large head with long ears was thrust over the hedge quite close to the party, and a loud hee-haw sent Aunt Sybil into a fit of laughter. She repeated:—

"If you call me, I shall come: Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum. Here, children, you see Abracadabra is come to answer in person."

How Margot and Colin laughed! And then nothing would do but that they must get over the gate and make friends with the new-comer. Aunt Sybil managed to lift her niece on his back; but no sooner was Margot up one side than she slipped off the other.

"O aunty dear, put me on!" pleaded Colin. "I'm a boy: I shall stick on better."

And so he did, until by kicking his boots against Dummy's shaggy sides he induced that sober animal to trot, upon which Master Colin promptly tumbled off with a shriek. He did not hurt himself, however, and kissed the donkey in the middle of his nose by way of farewell.

"Good-by, you dear Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum," said Margot. "You are the very sweetest donkey that ever lived."

This was the beginning of their friendship; and, when the children came to stay at "Ye Olde Gabled House," as it was called, the first thing they did, after dutifully kissing everybody all round, was to rush out and kiss the donkey. Sometimes it took a little while to find him, because he belonged to Farmer Huggins, and had to work for his living. But Margot and Colin were quite convinced that Dummy knew them when he saw them. It is certain that he ate with pleasant promptness whatever they might have brought him, which shows that he was a donkey of sense.

Time passed by. Margot and Colin did not see their Aunt Sybil so often, because she was gone to live in London. It was said that she had written a book which everybody wanted to read. Margot peeped into one of the three blue volumes, and said it didn't look a bit interesting.

"It's too grown-up for us," she remarked to Colin; "and there are no pictures."

There came a time when the donkey was not to be found. Farmer Huggins had died, and the farm stock been sold off. It was a dreadful blow to the children that they could not find out what had become of their darling Dummy. One day, however, when driving in the wagonette with two of their aunts, they passed a rickety little cart in which sat a man and woman, both stout and heavy. The man was driving a poor half-starved donkey, which he thumped unmercifully with a thick stick.

Colin gave a shout.

"There he is! That's Dummy!" he cried, jumping up and down.

"Yes, I'm sure it is," shrieked Margot. "O Aunt Joan, do tell the man not to hit him!"

"Sit down, children, and don't be so absurd," said Aunt Fanny.

"Oh, I wonder if they'd take one and ninepence halfpenny for him," said Colin, almost in tears; for the wagonette had passed the little cart by this time. He was sitting in front by Wilson, the driver; and the latter smiled.

"You couldn't get but a wooden donkey for that, sir," he said. "I know the man that was driving that one yonder. He lives at Hampton-Poyle."

"Oh, does he?" cried Colin, rather cheered; and presently an idea came into his head that cheered him still more.

The next morning Miss Sybil Carr received this letter:—

Dear Aunt Scribble,—Do come hear, for we're so miserable. A horrid man has got Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum, and he beats him. He is so thin, and me and Margot have only got two and tenpence together. The man that has Dummy lives at Hampton-something, Wilson says. Do come, dere Aunty. With love from COLIN.

Aunt Sybil smiled, as she read the inky little note. Then, because she was rather a rich lady now, she sat down and wrote three letters,—one to Colin, one to Wilson, and one to another of the aunts. The result was that in a few days a certain woe-begone donkey appeared in the paddock belonging to the gabled house,—a donkey who soon began to "cheer up." He was Aunt Scribble's present to Colin and Margot,—their old friend, Abracadabra-Dum-Dum-Dum.—Little Folks.

"HE'S A LITTLE FELLER."

Walking down the street the other day, I saw a newsboy seated on a grating in the sidewalk, up through which came a little warmth from the basement below. He had something beside him covered up with a dirty, ragged old handkerchief; and, as I sat down alongside, he cautioned,—

"Look out now, don't hurt him."

"What is it?"

He lifted the handkerchief with the greatest care, and there, on one of the iron bars, huddled up and half frozen, was a little brown sparrow just able to fly.

"Where did you get him?"

"In the street out there. Got so cold he was tuckered."

"What will you do with him?"

"Get him good and warm, and let him go. He is such a little feller, and so he orter have a fair show."

"And he shall," said I.

I added my efforts to Jack's, and after a few minutes the bird began moving about in a lively manner and giving vent to his satisfaction in a series of chirps. Jack lifted him, gave him a toss in the air, and away he sailed for his nest under a cornice.

"He's all right now, Jack."

"Yes, 'cause he's had a boost. Boys can get along 'most anyhow," said Jack, as he shivered in the cold blast sweeping up from the river; "but birds is such little fellers that we've got to sort o' h'ist and tote 'em round now and then. He's all right, and good-by to you."

"Good-by, Jackie," I said involuntarily, raising my hat, as the tattered, kind-hearted chappie flew round the corner.—Our Dumb Animals.

A SQUIRREL STORY.

A pleasing story is told by a boy who lives at West Troy in New York: "I recently caught a squirrel," he says; "but the animal was shy, and seemed decidedly averse to being tamed. In the cage was a wheel such as one may see in most cages for squirrels, but my squirrel would not go near it while any person was looking. The other day a friend came to see me, and began to play on his flute near the cage. The squirrel at once lost its shyness, and appeared in the wheel. After listening a moment the little animal began to jump around in the liveliest manner. It made the wheel fairly spin, and was delighted. As soon as the music ceased the squirrel rested. When my friend began to play again, the squirrel repeated its antics. Since that incident it has become quite tame."—Exchange.

Leathered Luxury.

A single glance at this Easy Chair ought to put a voice in every one of your tired bones. The comfort isn't crystallized and dropped about here and there in single nuggets: it is all "held in solution," as the chemists say.

The chair is overstuffed; that is, completely encased in leather, with no sign of wood above the feet. The upholstery is good for a dozen years of the hardest service. We use long-fibre No. 1 curled hair, not the short ends of hair which quickly "bunch up," and ruin the whole appearance of the chair.

The covering is a heavy Tan Leather, thick, but pliable. It is fastened by what Gail Hamilton calls "palpable nails." These are in reality small spikes, with the heads covered in leather; and they are very ornamental.

In these "Great Comfort" chairs we increase the depth of the seat and the width of the arms. The result is that they rest the whole body almost as much as if you were lying upon a sofa. This is a feature of our own.

BIRDS FOR WOMEN'S HATS.

It is said to require the lives of five million song-birds annually to keep the hats of American women in proper feather. The swamps and marshes of Florida have already been depopulated of their aigrets and herons to supply the demands of fashion. As for the English women, they have been sending hunters to scour the wilds of Africa for feathered ornaments. Our own section of the country is made to pay tribute to this whim of Vanity Fair abroad as well as at home. In a single season forty thousand tern have been killed on Cape Cod for exportation.—Boston Globe.

A MIGRATORY INVALID.

A curious instance of sagacity on the part of a pigeon has come to my knowledge, writes a contributor to a London paper. Some time ago one of the blue rocks which frequent the square in front of the Guild Hall had the misfortune to damage its leg. The bird was promptly taken care of by one of the policemen on duty there, and so well did the injured limb prosper that in a week or two it was able to join its friends, but not, however, until the constable had tied about its leg a piece of red ribbon, so that he might identify the patient and see how it was getting along. A few days ago a gentleman who has also been much interested in the sick bird saw, to his astonishment, among the pigeons contentedly feeding before St. Mark's in Venice, a blue rock which wore a red ribbon around its leg. He wired to the constable, whom he knew, "Have you missed pigeon with red ribbon?" The answer was returned, "Yes, three or four days since it has been seen." The bird must have known that bad weather was due in London, and taken a health excursion to Italy.—Evening Wisconsin.

HE PAYS HIS WAY.

Everybody has heard of the great St. Bernard dogs who in the Alps have saved so many travellers who have fallen exhausted in the snow, and of the great Newfoundland dogs who save people from drowning; of dogs who bark when they have discovered a fire until they alarm the people in the house, of dogs that have killed poisonous snakes to save some one they love, of dogs who will carry baskets in their mouths, and of dogs who will go on errands. But I do not believe you have ever heard of a dog who would carry his mistress's dress in his mouth over muddy places in the street. There is such a little dog in London. He goes shopping and calling with his mistress, and she pays no attention to her dress. The little dog trots behind her with the hem in his mouth. He never lets it touch the ground.—Exchange.

Here and There.

Every grower of beets has noticed the small buds that appear near the top of the root. These are indeed miniature plants, and, if cut out and planted, just as potato eyes are, each will next season produce a perfect beet plant.

The use of the telephone on Australian sheep ranches is becoming common. The sheep and shepherds are watched and handled telephonically, by means of six stations all communicating with a central point, from which come weather signals, orders, etc.

An International Exhibition is to be held during the summer at Amsterdam. One of the novelties will be an electric restaurant, where no waiter will be seen, and where, by simply touching a button, the dish required by the guest will rise and descend as desired.

It is a custom very ancient and very common in China for any one who has a grievance against any one to get upon some elevated place and bawl it out to the neighborhood. I have seen women on the roofs of the houses thus yelling forth their domestic grievances. This is called "telling the street."

At the recent annual meeting of the French Academy the Monthyon prize for 2,500 francs for virtue was awarded to the Abbé Theury, who in 1870, at Loigny, under a heavy fire, saved more than five hundred wounded French and German soldiers, and tended them in his church, and later collected 240,000 francs to erect a memorial church over the place where the French dead are buried.

It appears that in Japan one factor entering into the problem of the choice of a daughter-in-law is her skill in raising silkworms. The thread spun by the silkworm is said to be regular and even in proportion as the worm has been regularly and carefully fed. The prospective mother-in-law carefully and minutely examines the evenness of the silk thread in the material of the garments worn by the young lady before giving her assent to the betrothal.

Personals.

A monument has been erected at Budapest in memory of Semmelweis, who in 1847 made the first suggestion in reference to antiseptic methods of surgery.

The widow of Herr Reis, who, Germans say, was the inventor of the telephone, died in Friedrichsdorf, near Homburg, not long ago. She drew a pension from the government, owing to the services of her husband.

Signorina Teresina Labriola, who has just been graduated from the Law School of the University of Rome, is the first woman in modern Italy to receive a doctor's degree in law. In past times, however, women professors as well as students added to the renown of the University of Bologna. Maria d'Agnesi was the last of her sex to hold a chair there. She was Professor of Mathematics.

Queen Marguerite of Italy is not only the best-looking, but the best educated queen in Europe. She knows English, French, German, Spanish, and Latin thoroughly; and she speaks them as fluently as she does her own Italian. She is a good Greek scholar, and is not only familiar with the masterpieces of European literature, and quotes Petrarch, Dante, and Goethe, but is so fond of Shakspeare that she has written for her own amusement a little work on his heroines.

The queen has decorated Mr. William Dodd, under-manager of the Diglake Colliery, with the Albert medal for having, by his prompt action and courage on Jan. 14, 1895, been the means of saving the lives of more than thirty miners, who were in great peril of perishing from the flooding of the mine, he being upward of six hours in the water in face of the gravest danger, and, although having to be brought to the pit's mouth through becoming unconscious from exhaustion, as soon as he recovered, insisted on continuing his life-saving efforts.—Sunday School Chronicle.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest. Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.
I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.
I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

Spirit of the Press.

The Springfield Republican, commenting on the color line as represented in the Massachusetts legislative committee that went South, says:—

But there was one spot in the junket that was illumined with the sunlight of the new day, a concession which distinguishes this journey of our legislators in a way that will not soon be forgotten. Gov. O'Ferrall of Virginia extended hospitality worthy of his office, and rose to the full stature of the occasion. He gave a dinner in Richmond to this committee of the Massachusetts legislature, and the colored member of it was made equally welcome to the executive table with all the rest. Good for the present governor of the ancient commonwealth which was the mother of Presidents! The Governor of Virginia did his duty like a gentleman, and shows himself to be a true citizen of this reconstructed and reunited country.

The New York Tribune, discussing the proposed site for the Tilden library, says:

Now, the fact is that there are not enough open spaces in the compactly built portions of this city. These spaces are needed more to-day than they ever were; and the need for them will be more urgent as population grows, and as the city is filled up with overtopping structures. A great library would be a valuable possession for the city, but it would be a shame to have another equally valuable possession destroyed to make room for it. These open spaces are quite as useful to the bodily well-being of the community as hospitals, a pure water supply, or a good sewage system. They are just as essential to the moral and intellectual health of the community as are museums, art galleries, libraries, colleges, or churches. It needs no argument to demonstrate this; and it is strange that public-spirited men often take extremely narrow views, and consider the matters in which they have a personal interest of such importance that everything must get out of the way. Thoughtful men and women who have made a study of the matter are asking for more parks in thickly built districts of the city. The legislature has authorized the use of a million dollars a year to pull down buildings in order to get more open spaces; and yet, in the face of this, men are always to be found—and men of average intelligence, too—who do not scruple to advocate the covering over with brick and mortar of the few green spaces still left to the people of the city.

Temperance.

The annual report of the Scottish Baptist Total Abstinence Society states that more than 90 per cent. of the Baptist ministers in Scotland are total abstainers; the theological students are, without exception, abstainers; and the churches using unfermented wine at the communion are 80 per cent. of the whole.

Education.

A movement has been started in Ceylon for the establishment of a college for the higher education of girls.

The number of science schools in England has nearly doubled in the past ten years. The number of classes and the number of pupils have also more than doubled, and the payments to science schools on the results of the examinations have increased by more than £6,000 since last year.

The Convention of the City and Borough School Superintendents of Pennsylvania held recently at Harrisburg adopted, by a decided majority, the following resolution: "Resolved, That it is the sense of this Convention of Superintendents that military instruction should not be introduced into the public schools of Pennsylvania."

As a direct result of the distribution of the annual reports of the Golden Gate Kindergarten Association during the past fifteen years, over two hundred free kindergartens have been organized in this and other countries. There may be many others. They are located all over this country, from the extreme northern part of Washington to New Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast.

The United Labor League of Philadelphia recently adopted a resolution declaring that they "viewed with alarm the growth of the spirit of militarism evinced by the urgent appeals of prominent army officers to increase the size of the regular army, the stress laid upon the necessity of increasing the efficacy of the militia, the erection of armories in the hearts of great cities, the movement known as the 'Boys' Brigade,' and the efforts to incorporate military training in the public-school system." The resolution declared that all this fostered a spirit of strife.

Charities and Reforms.

New Hampshire has passed a bill raising the age of protection to eighteen years, the law to apply to boys as well as girls. This is the first State in which the law is made to apply to both sexes.

Dr. Norman Kerr, an eminent specialist, gave his opinion recently that the drinking of intoxicating beverages was on the increase among the women of Great Britain. This is in perfect agreement with the observations of others who have studied the subject.

The Birmingham Coffee-house Company, Limited, is the name of one of the most successful examples of the coffee-tavern movement in England. It operates twenty houses in Birmingham, two of which have hotel accommodations. Good substantial meals may be had, and they are open in the evening until eleven o'clock.

Washington legislature has passed a bill prohibiting vivisection in any school of the State except medical schools, and providing for systematic teaching in the schools of kindness to animals. The bill was introduced through the efforts of Miss Emma Page, Woman's Christian Temperance Union State Superintendent of Mercy Department.

Prof. William James of Harvard, in his text-book on psychology, says: "Could the young but realize how soon they will become mere walking bundles of habits, they would give more heed to their conduct while in the plastic state. The drunken Rip van Winkle in Jefferson's play excuses himself for every fresh dereliction by saying, 'I won't count this time.' Well, he may not count it, and a kind Heaven may not count it; but it is being counted none the less. Down among the nerve cells and fibres the molecules are counting it, registering and storing it up to be used against him when the next temptation comes."

DID YOU EVER

hear tell of a purchaser wanting to buy an imitation? Why do men who try to sell such articles speak of the act as "working them off?" Simply because people want the best, and it takes work and likewise deception to sell them the worst. This unpleasant experience may befall the housekeeper who determines to the new vegetable shortening. The healthfulness, flavor, and economy of this wonderful cooking product has won for it the widest popularity, which in turn has attracted the attention of business parasites who are "working off" imitations and counterfeits. Forewarned is forearmed. Be sure you get the only genuine vegetable shortening—COTTOLENE.

Sold in 3 and 5 pound pails.

You Must be Mistaken

if you think you've used Pearlina, and have any fault to find with it. It must have been something else. That sometimes happens. Because Pearlina is so well known and so popular, it has become a household name. People say "Pearlina" when they mean anything that may claim to help in washing. Perhaps you haven't noticed—and that's just where the trouble is. If you've been using the worthless or dangerous imitations, no wonder you're out of patience. But don't make Pearlina suffer for it. Don't give up the good, because your disgusted with the poor.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearlina, be honest—send it back. 358 JAMES PYLE, New York

Pleasantries.

Tommy: "I wouldn't be as stuck up as girls is for anything." Jimmy: "Me, neither. They think they are just as good as boys."—Indianapolis Journal.

"How do you like that little French girl next door, Polly?" "Don't like her at all," said Polly. "She calls me names. She called me a ma'mselle yesterday, and I ain't."

"Why, mamma!" said Willie, as he went out into the cold and could see his own breath. "Give me a glass of water quick! I must be on fire inside."—Harper's Young People.

There are but two classes of people in the world,—those who have done something and want their names kept out of the paper and those who haven't done anything worth printing and want their names put in.—Atchison (Kan.) Globe.

Jack had been to the barber-shop with his father. On the way back he asked, "Was that charlotte russe he put on your face?" "No, my son," was the reply. "That was lather." "Oh!" said Jack. "I wondered why you let him whittle it off without tasting it."

The husband of a new apostle of Malapropism had betaken unto himself a costume for a fancy ball. And his wife thus describes him to the people who drink her wine and eat her dinners: "Then he came in in the garb of a monk; and all I could say was, 'Exit homo!'"—Budget.

A Utilitarian.—The Vicar: "And how do you like the new chimes, Mrs. Weaver?" You must be glad to hear those beautiful hymn-tunes at night. They must remind you of"—Mrs. Weaver: "Yes: that be so, sir. I've took my medicine quite regular ever since they was begun."—Punch.

Miss Marie Devoe (at the cooking school): "Do you mean to say, chef, that we must put our bare hands into the dough?" Prof. Tartopomness: "Sairtainly, m'mselle." Miss Marie Devoe: "Perhaps that is why I failed with my bread the last time. My gloves seemed rather in the way."—Tid-Bits.

The late Dr. Jowett, master of Balliol, once asked of a young man who had been talking rather gushingly of his love for the poets, "Do you ever write poetry, Mr. M.?" "Yes—well, I do something in that way," was the answer. "Never mind," said the master, "how much you write, so long as you burn it all."

Mr. Greathead, who keeps a corner store in a New Jersey village, greeted his rival across the street the other day with much courtesy, and said, "Won't you loan me your spiritual level a moment?" Quick as a flash the rival called to the boy in his store, "John, take Mr. Greathead that old copy of the Bible under the counter."—Harper's Magazine.

Mark Lemon once wrote a book in which he told of a chubby-faced little urchin who passed his instructor upon the street without bowing. The schoolmaster stopped and frowned. "What has become of your manners, sir?" he roared. "It seems to me that you are better fed than taught." "Yes, sir," replied the little boy. "I feeds myself, sir."

Artist George G. Rockwood of New York contributes this story of the Cary sisters: "It is well known that the gifted writers, Alice and Phoebe Cary, declined matrimony, yet were always letting off their wit at their spinster condition. One Sunday evening Horace Greeley, Frank Carpenter, and other friends were dining with them, when Phoebe had so stirred up Mr. Greeley with her fun that he said, 'Phoebe, we'll have to put a curb on you.' 'Not a bit,' she said. 'I would rather have a bridal.'"

"GET YER OWN KEROSENE."

Mrs. G. was much interested in a mission Sunday-school in one of our large cities, and spent an hour or two every Sunday afternoon with a class of little girls, poor street waifs that had been gathered in. Upon one occasion, when the last lesson had been about the ten virgins, five of whom were wise and five foolish, the teacher asked, as was her custom, who in the class could tell anything about the lesson of the previous Sunday. One little girl, who had never been in a Sunday-school in her life until the week before, was on her feet in an instant, and said: "Please ma'am, I ken. It was a weddin', and there was ten on 'em." And then the child stood, a touching little picture, with her pinched figure and poverty-stricken dress, telling in her street dialect the whole story, no point of which she lost. Pathetic as it was, it was irresistibly funny when she closed by saying: "And them as hasn't got no oil in their lamps says to them as has to give 'em some; and them as has got oil in their lamps says to them as hasn't, 'Be off wid yez, and go to the grocery and get yer own kerosene!'"—The Evangelist.

Editorial.

THE order has been cabled by the government to our European squadron despatching the "San Francisco" and the "Marblehead" to Asia Minor to protect American interests in Armenia. It is known that the lives of American missionaries have been endangered by their sympathy with the stricken Armenians. This possibility wholly changes the attitude and responsibility of the government. As between the Turks and the Armenians, the United States government can exercise only a moral power in behalf of humanity and justice; and we wish that this moral power had been more promptly and directly exerted. But, when it comes to the protection of American life and interests in Turkey, the moral power represented by two iron-clads may be much more efficient than diluted diplomatic ink.

THE Christian Church is not the only trustee of religion, nor is it the only administrator of Christianity. It has sometimes acted as if it had a patent on both, and as if nobody else could use either without infringing on its right. Therefore, the kind of Christianity the Church has stood for has often been exclusive. It has excluded from its conception some of the best elements of Christianity. It has stood at times for the salvation of the few instead of the many. It has excluded from its pale those whose message, influence, and leadership it most needed. It has claimed to be a depository of truth instead of a light-seeker and a light-bearer. The divisions which exist in the Church, while they sometimes show the influence of great principles, also show the trivial and non-essential matters which are constantly receiving emphasis. At the last National Conference of Unitarians all agreed on placing the emphasis upon the religion of Jesus as love to God and love to man. Is the Christian Church, as a whole, ready to take the emphasis from sacraments, creeds, rituals, sacerdotal authority, and place it there where Jesus himself put it?

THE London Christian World, in a stirring editorial entitled "Hell in Armenia," utters the righteous sentiment which has been aroused on two continents against the terrible injustice and cruelty of Turkish rule in Armenia. It says: "But, in one way or another, Christianity must cease to be a capital crime in Armenia. Non-intervention has its limits as well as non-resistance. If the cannibalism of savage Negroes, who never knew any better, is a justification for civilized interference, surely the deliberate and contemptuous disregard of treaty rights given to Turkey's Christian subjects under the guarantee of Europe calls for an immediate and unanimous protest from all the Powers concerned. If necessary, an international conference should be held, to consider how those treaty rights are to be enforced. At all events, we do not believe that any government could long hold power in this country if it were to be convicted of failing in any legitimate use of its high position in the world to stop the intolerable crimes now reported to us."

THE Boston Daily Standard makes haste to assure the Christian Register that it is not the organ of the American Protective Association. We are not surprised that it wishes to disavow any connection with that un-American society. For some reason the impression went abroad that the Standard was established in the interest of that organization, though it is hard to see why a newspaper which is seeking a permanent support should try to find it in a society which started in an hysterical and bigoted scare, and is destined to wither like the gourd of Jonah. Now that it has disavowed connection with the American Protective Association, we hope the Standard will disavow also the spirit and methods of that secret organization. It can do no better work for patriotism, at present, than to show how utterly un-American it is, and how false is the protection it assumes to furnish. The Standard copied from the Christian Register—forgetting, however, to give it proper credit—a portion of Dr. William Everett's sermon in our issue of March 28, and thus discovered, though it failed to confess it, that it was not the only patriotic paper in Boston. Let it now copy the excellent addresses of two patriotic American Catholics, Rev. Father Conaty and Mr. Stephen O'Meara, in the Christian Register of February 21, and it will help to quench this absurd revival of Know-Nothingism and the unpatriotic, unchristian persecution it engenders.

MR. RICHARD HALLOWELL of Boston spending with his family some weeks at Camden, S.C., where he has business interests, received a threatening letter from an anonymous writer, warning him to leave the town, and couched in most abusive language. Mr. Hallowell's offence is that he has associated too freely with the Negroes. This matter of social relations in the South is one that cannot be regulated by statute; and it is one which may be safely left to itself, when the interests of all classes and races are protected alike by the law. To adopt any other rule is to destroy the very foundation of civil and social liberty. It is not surprising that Mr. Hallowell should prefer the society of colored people to that of a white man who could write such a letter as he received, and in the exercise of this right he should be protected by law as well as by social sentiment. Any other position will be utterly disastrous to the business interest in the South. If a man living in a Southern city is to be threatened because he prefers to choose his associates without respect to color, we should soon have a reign of anarchy. Other citizens of Camden were prompt to repudiate the action and spirit of the rowdy element. For many years white teachers from the North to the colored people have been ostracized in Southern society, and still are in many places. But some of the Southern States have taken hold of the subject of Negro education with great earnestness; and white teachers and missionaries, some of them of Southern birth, are teaching Negroes without losing caste.

AND now, in the New York Presbytery, Dr. Parkhurst has been charged by a returned missionary with Pantheism. This new charge against him, made by one of his own household, will fill the friends of Tammany with delight. They have been thirsting for some adequate revenge for their overwhelming defeat. They could not call him a thief, because he does not belong to their crowd; they could not call him a backbiter or a false witness, because he has been able to prove his charges. So they have been at a loss to know how to denominate this disturber of their peace. But this returned missionary has at last solved the difficulty. They may call him a Pantheist. It is a horrible word. It means that God is everywhere; and this is a wicked doctrine to the Tammanyites, who have enlisted in the service of the devil. Of course, we are by no means sure that this fearful charge against Dr. Parkhurst can be proved in a philosophic sense; but the Tammanyites will be sure to believe it on the authority of this returned missionary, who discovered it in an article which Dr. Parkhurst wrote on women. The Presbytery may or may not prosecute him for his belief; but the Tammanyites, who believe in a system of rewards and punishment hereafter, will have the satisfaction of feeling that the man who has dislodged them from office and made them so uncomfortable will be committed to some purgatory for believing that God is everywhere, and that the devil will eventually be nowhere.

THE Boston Transcript utters an earnest protest against pulpit sensationalism. "How is it," it asks, "that many thoughtful persons, and by no means hostile to religion and its institutions, are averse to public worship? The answer is not far to seek. When they are religiously disposed at all, they prefer some form of Christianity; and, when they desire food for the higher nature, they do not care to waste their time and vitiate their tastes by listening on Sunday to themes which have been exhaustively thrashed out every other day of the week in the columns of the daily press. They object to the secularization of worship. Having spent six days in perplexing cares and anxieties as to mundane affairs, they protest, and no one can blame them, against any disturbance of the restfulness of Sunday by the intrusion of weekday thoughts and themes upon its hallowed quiet. It cannot be helpful to a jaded and weary mind, and it certainly is not morally quickening and inspiring, to have some appalling crime retold with all its harrowing details, and condemned for the hundredth time, from the pulpit; to be compelled to listen to a homily on millionaire weddings or yacht races; to receive instruction on the physical and moral value of the bicycle or the æsthetic worth of the opera; to hear rebukes of some hoary old sinner of national note, or tirades against Robert Ingersoll, who gets more than his share of free advertising from the clergy. All this betrays the intellectual poverty and spiritual destitution of those who indulge in it, and also a grave misapprehension of what the average man and woman care to hear on Sunday, or what they need for their moral elevation." But, as the Transcript points out, such sensationalism soon defeats itself. People cannot live on a religious diet of pepper and vinegar or ground nutmeg. They must have more substantial nutriment; and the ministers who have the longest pastorates and who maintain, on the average, the best congregations, are those who break the bread of life and give the sincere milk of the word.

THE RISEN JESUS.

Jesus has suffered a new resurrection. Bound hand and foot, and shut up in the tomb of dogma, he could not be a spiritual, living influence; but the old tomb of ecclesiasticism has been rent, the stone of tradition has been rolled away, the bands of creed and formalism have been sundered, and Jesus comes forth to us in the light and charm of his own humanity. He is not a supernatural being, half man and half God, isolated from the race: he is our elder brother, the captain of our salvation, the Jesus of Nazareth who lived and wrought and suffered and died.

The new resurrection of Jesus is a resurrection to a new glory,—the glory of that humanity which Messianic theories and theological speculations did much to denaturalize and to dim. The new conception of Jesus which is revealed not only in a reformed theology, but in new inspiration to ethical and social life, is one of the fresh impulses, revelations, and satisfactions of our own age. We have rediscovered Jesus, and find that we have something more precious than the Messianic royalty which he has lost.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF WORLDS.

It is not uncommon to hear the expression, "One world at a time." It has arisen partly as a reaction against an interpretation of religion which concerned itself too much with a future world to the exclusion of interests, problems, and duties which meet us now and here.

Undoubtedly, there were elements in this reaction that were healthful and necessary. The primitive Christian Church had at first an earnest conception of the possibility of establishing a kingdom of God upon earth. The teachings of Jesus set forth this ideal, and urged men to its realization. But by and by the dream of the kingdom to be realized in another world became the predominating ideal; and this earth and much that pertained to it came to be looked upon as a poor, worthless possession, which was eventually to be burned to ashes. Christianity is again summoned to-day to recover the power and freshness of its early ideals, and to seek to realize now and here the republic of God. So the cry of "One world at a time" is not confined to agnostics and unbelievers, but is uttered by many who, while believing in a life to come, recognize the duties of the present as paramount, and are content to restrain their curiosity until it shall be gratified through the enfranchisement of death.

But the admonition of this phrase must not be pushed too far. The relations of every individual, as well as of the whole race, to the past, the present, and the future, are deep, wide, and varied. There is no one who lives to-day who does not live in remote and uncounted ages which have preceded him. Our relations to the world of the past are registered in our physical structure. There are rudimentary organs which are simply the record of our previous existence,—aquatic, amphibious, aerial, or terrestrial. We cannot cut ourselves off from our ancient relatives. We must not be too proud to own our humble descent. The purpose of the primeval world was not fulfilled wholly in itself. Man was prophesied in the ages that preceded him.

Likewise our present physical existence has relations which are not limited to the narrow zone in which we live. Before the discovery of this continent the inhabitants of the other were content with one world at a time; but Columbus longed to discover another, and then the Old World was enriched through the discovery of the New. But, even before Columbus made his discovery, the climatic conditions of the Old World were affected by influences from the New. The people of France and of England breathed a softer air and ate products of the earth which they could not have enjoyed if the warmth of the Gulf Stream had not tempered the atmosphere. Or take this globe as a whole. Its inhabitants would perish utterly, were it not for the warmth and light it derives from a world of fire millions of miles away. The mariner who consults his almanac to know the movements of the tide may think only of the ebb and flux of the ocean on which his vessel glides; but the astronomer reminds him that there is a fellowship between the earth and the moon, and that the satellite not only reflects the light of the sun at night, but lifts the tidal wave. Let the sun be overcast and the stars shut out from view, and the mariner may find it very inconvenient to get on with one world at a time. Though he cannot leave this planet to sail through realms of planetary space, yet sun and stars may help him to guide his course here and to reach a wished-for harbor. Likewise there are relations of force, of gravitation, and perhaps of other forces not measurable by any dynameter, which hold the worlds in fellowship, which keep the planets in their appointed pathways, in orderly rhythm, around a central sun. We cannot thus, in a physical sense, overlook the fellowship of worlds.

Still less can we in a spiritual sense be content with the dictum, "One world at a time." If every human being has relations of need, not only to the ground on which he stands, but to the sun, the moon, the stars; if, as a part of the mass of the globe, he is included in the reciprocity of gravitation, so that other planets must take account of his weight and he must take account of theirs, it is as true that in that which pertains to his moral and intellectual existence here he cannot be content with one world at a time. Other worlds of thought, affection, life, being, are needed to fill this world with sunlight and warmth, to life the tides of his spirit as the moon lifts the ocean, to guide him as the stars guide the mariner on his way. The philosophy of materialism, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die," Paul set aside, as all must set it aside who believe in a higher range of existence here and elsewhere. To live the best life in this world, we must live in more than one world at a time. We may not physically occupy two places at once. This sovereignty is granted to every individual, however humble, that no one else can occupy the space which he fills. This sovereignty forbids him ubiquity: he cannot go to another space without leaving that which he has. But he is something more than an adverb of time and space: he is not a mere interjection standing alone. He is subject, verb, object. He is linked to God and immortality in the grammar of existence. God is needed to explain the existence of man here, and man's existence here is only fully explained by a hereafter. There is a fellowship between the life that now is and the life hereafter. It is not merely a fellowship of sequence, though our life here is undoubtedly affected for good or ill by the faith and hope which we cherish now of a life that is to come. But, when we think of the world of affection, we seem to be bound at once, now and here, by experience as well as by hope and prophecy, to a life that exists contemporaneously with ours. A great host of those whom we love have passed before us across the stream. Their lives are not cut off from ours. They live in us, and we live in them. Whether or not we may hold physical communication with them is a question of vastly less import than that we may hold a communication which is spiritual with them. Our treasures are laid up in heaven, but we draw rich dividends of fellowship and affection on earth. It is possible that our lives are affected even more than we know by the mysterious influences from another world.

The universe is not built on a plan simply of one world at a time. There are myriads of worlds standing in relation to each other, and our souls as well as our bodies move in orbits of life and thought and affection which are not solitary. It is well that on Easter we should be reminded of this fellowship of worlds.

IMMORTALITY.

No other longing of the mind can, on the whole, compare in strength with its desire for continuance of life. Self-preservation is said to be the first impulse of our own, as of all lower natures; and in our case that is inseparable from the desire for immortality. Knowing what is the sentence of the Lord upon all flesh, the whole power of the mighty impulse for self-preservation inclines us to look toward and seek for an existence after death. Perhaps there is not a day in any life during which it fails to think of that possible hereafter, whether with eager expectation, in quiet hope, or with a wild longing for certainty that is half despair. Probably the subject is never for long entirely absent from any sane mind; and there is good reason to think, "whatever crazy sorrow saith," that there is in every heart a hope which cannot be wholly quenched.

The very strength of this desire must be held responsible for much uncertainty with regard to its fulfilment. It is sometimes assumed in discussions of this subject that the wish is father to the faith. To some extent this may be true; but it is quite as likely that in the minds of those who prize life most highly the wish is itself a prolific source of doubt, and that belief in such minds is by no means the simple voice of their self-interest.

Where our hope is most ardent, it is most easily turned to fear. If we have no particular reason to care what the weather is to be on a certain day in the future, it is not difficult to believe that it will turn out fair. If that day is to mark some great event,—is, for example, to be one's wedding-day,—one is tempted to be almost sure that it will storm. We have so much at stake upon the question of the hereafter that our very anxiety begets timidity, and it is difficult to estimate without underrating the hope that is given us.

This, of course, is most likely to be true in minds which have been best trained to appreciate the delights of existence; and it is there, in fact, that we do find most scepticism. But, if we can in some measure free ourselves from the personal feeling involved,—if we can look at the problem as it concerns other people, without thinking of ourselves,—then the argument for immortality is one that far overweighs all doubts and objections. The certainty that our essential being is not material, but mental or spiritual,—a certainty which practically all enlightened thought now grants, whatever disagreement there may be as to the significance of these terms,—and the fact that without the idea of immortality we are unable to make anything like a reasonable scheme of existence, are vastly more than all difficulties which stand in our way.

Not to rehearse arguments that have been ably and abundantly set forth in recent times, it may still be worth while to note how the main trend of modern investigations is winning fresh ground for hope and confidence. For we are now learning almost every day that there is a great deal more of mind, so to speak, than has been commonly known; that it has wonderful hidden capacities, scarcely dreamed of before; that ordinary self-consciousness is but the surface of a mighty deep, of which our plummets do not yet find the bottom.

By as much as the wonder and power of mental life are increased in our sight, through closer study, is the miracle of its existence apart from the body lessened. The more hidden and latent faculties, of little use on earth, are brought to light, the greater the probability that these are germs of something to be fully developed elsewhere. We learn but little which enables us to imagine what this life elsewhere may be like, and perhaps this is now the greatest stumbling-block in the way of faith. But it is an obstruction which every trusting heart, at least, will easily surmount; for, if we can be assured of life beyond the grave, we can patiently wait for the knowledge which sight alone will bring.

CHILD LIFE INSURANCE.

The subject of the insurance of the lives of little children has been attracting much attention in Massachusetts for the past three weeks on account of a bill which has been presented to prohibit insuring the lives of children under the age of ten. Those who have interested themselves in the passage of such a law are the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and members of many other philanthropic institutions. No one can for a moment assert that they have any interested motive in their desire to prevent the insurance of mere babies. The lives of these people, devoted to work among the poor and needy, are in themselves a guarantee of their good faith. The worst that can be urged against them is that they may be sentimental, impractical, or lacking in what may be called pecuniary judgment. But standing with them are men whose cool business heads are quite strong enough to balance any softness of heart on the part of the promoters of the bill. It is a subject that has divided the community. Men of all professions and occupations have ranged themselves on one side or the other, according as their sympathies and interests carried them. One thing, however, has been noticeable, that few disinterested persons have opposed the bill. It would seem as though in the discussion of a great principle like that its merits should have been considered without so much reference to the money involved on either side, whether it be the pittance of fourteen dollars that the year and a half baby brings in at its death, or the "million dollars in dimes and nickels" that one insurance company draws every month from this source. If it be expedient, wise, and right for the babies to be insured, then let the impoverished parents draw the pittance, and let the great companies make the profits.

But from the start there seems to have been, on the part of those opposing it, a misunderstanding of the reason for the bill. It is not claimed that child-insurance results in child-murder. The danger is not of immediate death or of intentional cruelty; but it is believed that the hardship of meeting an enforced weekly payment of dues robs these little children, in many cases, of food and clothing, so that their lives are stunted as they go on. It is by far the most costly kind of insurance, while at the same time, though it passes under the head of industrial insurance, the lives insured have no industrial value. It is never claimed that a child under ten years of age is of commercial or industrial importance. It resolves itself, then, into a sort of lottery.

One thing is certain: no good can possibly come to the child through this insurance. The money, if paid, is paid only at its death. But right here is one of the greatest hardships of the system,—the number of lapsed policies. Some of the figures given in this respect were telling. The number of policies that ceased to exist in one company alone at the end of 1894 was 10,154 by death; by lapse, 184,638, representing a money value of $20,878,319. In another company death closed 57,653 policies, and lapses 1,637,030, representing on the lapses $208,295,068. Making all due allowance for anything to be said in favor of the companies, it would still appear that tremendous hardships must have been borne by the people for which they will get no return.

If it were not for the money received from lapsed policies, these insurance companies could not exist. A glance at the statistics in the office of the Insurance Commissioners will show the enormous expenses involved, which are met by these lapsed policies:—

Claims paid.
Metropolitan Company of New York, . .	$5,535,120.09
Prudential Company of New Jersey, . .	2,893,708.33
John Hancock Company of Boston, . .	1,116,124.26
	$9,544,952.68
Expenses.
Metropolitan Company of New York, . .	$6,636,380.62
Prudential Company of New Jersey, . .	4,534,887.96
John Hancock Company of Boston, . .	1,749,857.31
	$12,921,125.89
Total,	$22,466,078.57
Of an annual premium of $5.20 at 10 cents per week, the companies get $3 for expenses, and the insured may get $2.20 in case of the child's death, with more in proportion as the child dies young. Of every 10 cents paid by the insurer, 6 cents goes inevitably to the companies for expenses. Of nearly $1,900,000 received monthly by the three companies in 5 and 10 cent pieces from the indigent, nearly $1,100,000 monthly is absorbed by the former for the cost of the business.

Insurance companies do not claim to do their work on a missionary basis. "Business is business" with them; but, when one learns intimately of the methods employed to persuade these working people to invest their weekly dimes in this form of insurance, it reminds one of the methods of the locusts that sweep over a Kansas prairie, finding out every leaf that has a drop of sap or a grain of chlorophyll on which they can prey. It is undoubtedly legitimate, but it is not benevolent. Thousands upon thousands of agents are employed, each one excited to do his best by prizes in gold, by having his name placed highest on the wall, by set meetings among themselves, where with special songs and speeches they are whetted to do their utmost to sweep all classes and conditions of people into this great net. It is no wonder that the number of insured infants runs up into the millions. All the better if that be the best way of treating the babies. But, as has been seen, the children themselves get no atom of profit. If but a hundredth part of the effort were expended in persuading the parents to exercise thrift in some other way,—in the matter of temperance, of diet, of clothes, of laying by every penny that can possibly be spared after the children are clothed and fed,—then indeed there might be cause for gratitude. As it is, the dribble that comes in, if the policy has not lapsed, goes for funeral expenses alone,—an average amount of about $28, judging from the testimony. If the question rises whether it is well to incur a debt of $28 for a child's funeral, and to make the remaining members of the family suffer more or less hardship till that debt be met, it would seem to many better to do that rather than to run the risk of so stinting the children to meet the weekly payment that possibly the very death may have resulted from lack of food. If there must be stinting after the death, at least there is one less hungry mouth to fill. Besides, there would be less temptation to extravagance in funerals, were people compelled to confine themselves to what they can actually afford. There are few self-respecting families who, in ordinary times, cannot give their dead a decent burial at their own expense. The families that in life never hesitate to accept any amount of charity are usually the first to object to what they call a pauper funeral.

It is a natural and proper thing for persons of mature years to lay away in the bank enough to bury themselves. It seems unnatural to begin to make provision for burying a baby a few months after it is born. Yet, if this provision is wise and necessary, how much better to encourage those who can afford it to put away the nickels and dimes on deposit, where the actual amount deposited can be reclaimed and the accumulated millions in time returned to the pockets of those who have deposited them, rather than be forfeited to the advantage of child-insurance companies.

There is a wide difference between insuring the life of the bread-winner and insuring the lives of these little ones, which may be so jeopardized by this very insurance that it becomes death assurance instead of life insurance.

Perhaps no one put this more strongly than Mr. Edward Atkinson, who at the hearing referred to the importance of the moral risk involved, and said in respect to prudential life insurance that he did not look upon it as a good form of investment, but as a prudent step to take. In regard to child insurance, he said he had given the subject careful, almost prayerful consideration. If the tendency is the same as in regard to property insurance, where many believe that they can realize only by the destruction of the property, it is the duty of the committee to regard the possible harm that may come to the child if insurance is placed on its life.

"It seems to me," he said, "that it is proved in some cases that harm has come to children from insurance. If there is a doubt, give it for a life, not for death. If there is a doubt in your mind that by licensing child-insurance you may promote death, notwithstanding the incidental benefit, the gain is not worth the price of the death of one single infant. Do not give warrant for neglect of the feeble or the helpless. From an economical standpoint, it seems to be a costly way of saving. There are organizations for deposits, which are carried on without the element of personal profit, which can be utilized for savings for burial expenses. If it costs $1.50 for conducting the business for every $1 that is paid out, will it not be wise to waive the benefit, and choose the less expensive method? The prohibition is not wanted for the ninety-nine in every hundred, but for the hundredth man who might neglect his child."

In reply to questions, Mr. Atkinson said that he did not believe in child insurance, and went on to give his conception of a plan whereby people of small means could club together for the maintenance of the health of children, employing the best physicians, and obtaining the best advice upon the science of nutrition. This he designated as the opposite of the system of child insurance that pays a profit on death.

THE BASIS OF EASTER.

Easter is the feast of immortality. The feast has a Christian history as well as a pagan one. In Christian history its observance is closely associated with the resurrection of Jesus. Undoubtedly, the majority of Christians keep it for that reason. But, when we seek for a still firmer basis for our belief in immortality, we find it, not in the belief of the resurrection of the body, but in the resurrection of the soul.

The doctrine of the resurrection of the body introduces material elements which offer obstacles to faith instead of helping it. Thus, if we believe in the bodily resurrection of Jesus, we may believe that it was an exceptional fact in human history, whose manifestation was confined to him, in which case the resurrection of Jesus furnishes no proof of the immortality of the race. Or we may be told that all humanity shall eventually, at some general judgment, be raised, and reoccupy some one of the bodies that, as individuals, they inhabited on earth. But this assumption, instead of being a help to belief, is clearly an obstacle to its exercise; for we are obliged to make enormous demands on credulity to accept a hypothesis which science declares impossible of realization.

If we take, on the other hand, the assurance of some modern Spiritualists that spirits may become materialized before us, we may answer that nine-tenths of all such materializations have proved to be frauds, and that the other tenth has not been sufficiently attested to secure general acceptance.

The real ground of our Easter hope and faith is not found, then, in a material resurrection, whether that of Jesus or of some hero of the old mythologies or in any visible and tangible manifestation of deceased friends. These beliefs did not establish the conviction of immortality: they result from it. Belief in the bodily resurrection of Jesus is therefore an incident, not an essential element in our Easter joy. Unitarians have sometimes been asked why, not accepting the bodily resurrection of Jesus, they can keep Easter. But the answer is because they have a firmer basis of their belief in immortality than that which the stories of the resurrection offer. The doctrine of immortality must not be founded on any single incident, however dramatic, in the death of any single individual. It must be founded in the hopes, prophecies, implications, faith, asseverations, and constitution of the human soul in its highest development.

Easter is, therefore, a feast which, spiritually as well as historically, does not belong to Christians alone. The roots of this belief may be found expressed feebly in the oldest literature. Christianity did not create it, for Homer and Plato wrote long before the New Testament. Christianity did not plant the seed, but it sunned and watered it. Jesus did not reveal immortality, but brought it into new life and light. A soul like that of Jesus seems to have in it a deathless quality, and that which gives it immortality is found in the elements which the greatest souls have in common with it. Our immortality must be an attribute of our humanity.

Musings.

THE other day I passed a man on the street who, I thought, had been dead at least ten years. He was not an intimate acquaintance, simply a familiar figure on the street, in the cars, and elsewhere,—a part of the furniture of the city; but he had dropped from my sight. I had forgotten his existence until his presence reminded me that he was still alive. His sudden reappearance had the effect of a resurrection. It seemed to me very much as if he must have come forth from the grave and put on his suit of clothes and started for his familiar haunts, just as some departed spirit might do if he could be summoned from the grave and find clothing ready for his use. This man seemed to have a ghostlike appearance, which aided in the impression that he was a reanimated corpse. He had been practically dead to me all this time. And now for a moment he has crossed my path, and disappeared again. I will not say forever, because I cannot be sure what fresh resurrection he may experience. But it impressed me with the fact that death and resurrection are not simply physical events. This man, whose life had never been very close to mine, had apparently passed off the stage of existence, and been hypothetically dead to me for a dozen years. Physically speaking, when he appeared, I was certain that he was no more of a ghost than most of those which appear in Spiritualistic cabinets. But, dead or alive, we belonged practically to different worlds of thought, interest, activity, though no one could tell when we might be thrown into relations which would reveal that bond which is the deepest of all bonds,—the bond of our common humanity. I thought, too, how many friendships there are which die in this life, which are broken because of removal, change, or circumstance, or loss of interest. One of the most delightful experiences we may enjoy is the resurrection of an old friendship which has seemed dead and buried, but which is suddenly brought to life and power by the reappearance of some old friend, who has come back not only to our eyes, but to our hearts. The separations produced by death are not more absolute than the separations produced by life. I am thinking now of school-boys that I knew, and who have passed for many years away from sight and knowledge. Some of them I know are on this planet, in distant zones: others have passed completely out of sight and knowledge. The boy has developed into a man; and this very development has carried him into some new world of activity, which does not communicate with mine. Of the two billions of people on the globe, a large part of them are, for us, indeed ciphers. We are not conscious of their existence, nor they of ours.

IN the shifting phases of human life which are so manifest in the rapid growth of a country like ours, in an era of migration, invention, and social evolution, it is delightful to have some element of permanence revealed in human relationships. I received the other day a beautiful picture of an elderly couple sitting by their fireside in the comfortable enjoyment of leisure which in this restless age is too often banished even from the home. The old spinning-wheel by the fireplace, the candlesticks on the mantel, the pots and kettles hanging on the crane, the bellows at one corner of the mantel, the old chairs in which they sat,—all spoke the language of fifty years ago. With the picture came an invitation, folded up like an old-fashioned letter, as follows:

"On the third day of April, in the forty-fifth year of this century, Samuel Ellis, son of John and Mary his wife, and Martha Ellis, daughter of Jesse and Elizabeth his wife, in the Medfield church laid their hands each within the other, to walk together within the holy bonds of marriage through the years then to come. For fifty years, amid sunshine and shadow, they have journeyed together, blessed in the fragrant and hallowed associations of ancestry and offspring, kinsfolk and friends.

"On the third day of April, in the ninety-fifth year of this century, Samuel and Martha, still in sweet company, ask you to meet with them in the companionship of those who by kin and kindness stand nearest their hearts, [at the old Ellis farm in Medfield, which has sheltered and nurtured their race for nearly two hundred and fifty years, when, from two to six o'clock, during the going down of the sun, they will, with gratitude for the last half-century, start upon the new half-century in continued faith and happiness."

And so on the third day of April, in the afternoon, I found myself in the old farmhouse at Medfield, with a host of others who had made the same pilgrimage to this domestic shrine. The groom and the bride stood up in the parlor, and received congratulations with as much pleasure and, apparently, no more fatigue than they might have had fifty years ago. The husband wore the same vest that he had worn at his wedding. The wife might have found it difficult to wear her wedding gown without enlarging it; but the gown was gracefully and charmingly displayed on the person of a granddaughter, who brought back to us the fashion and spirit of fifty years ago. During this half-century the wedded pair have lived the whole time in this same house in which the bridegroom was born. When one thinks of the cities that have been built, the States that have been received into the Union, and the wonderful development of this country, in that time such an example of continuity of habitation is unusual, even in rural New England. The old house showed signs of modern improvements, and I have no doubt that the bridegroom could have pointed out many changes in the old town; yet the quietude and restfulness of this rural retreat had not been disturbed for me. But the most delightful experience of the hour was this beautiful testimony to the sanctity and happiness of the marriage bond. They sang "America" that day in Music Hall, and in many places the country over, as a tribute to its author; and it seemed to me that the spirit of the hymn easily blended with the golden wedding, for it was on a foundation of such homes and such character that New England was built and the golden age of America made possible.

Brevities.

Jesus is not only the light of the world by what he reveals in himself, but by what he reveals in us. He kindles the torch of our faith. His life becomes a part of our experience.

"No living soul," says Rev. John Cuckson in the Easter sermon we publish this week, "can be the son of God in any true and dividing sense, and not share the divine everlastingness."

We have received, too late for insertion this week, a notice of the late Rev. F. W. Holland, written by one who knew him long and well, Rev. A. P. Putnam. We shall print it next week.

The Religious Herald declares that "superiority is the disease of our times. The saints far outnumber the niches." But would it rather cultivate inferiority, and have more devils than saints?

Some of the old beliefs were crude and materialistic enough, but now they are so refined and attenuated that we can hardly distinguish them in the atmosphere: they are immaterial ghosts of their former selves.

Any one having second-hand copies of the "Hymn, Tune, and Service Book," revised edition, to give or sell, will confer a favor by sending them to the American Unitarian Association. Twenty-five copies are wanted.

"Are you going to church to-day?" "What a question! I go to church as regularly as I go to business." It may not be well to make church-going a matter of business, but it is well to make it a matter of habit.

In her beautiful article on "The New Easter" Miss Augusta Larned shows how "Easter has passed from the gross physical phase to the region of spiritual symbolism, where all is love and light and sweet consolation."

Rev. John Cuckson, in his earnest and inspiring sermon, presents the subject of immortality on rational, ethical, and spiritual grounds. If any one asks why Unitarians keep Easter, we may refer them to this sermon.

Dr. William Everett does not confine his missionary work to speeches in Congress against jingoism and the spoils system. He preached on Palm Sunday at Hyde Park, Mass., and will preach to-morrow, Good Friday, at King's Chapel, Boston.

Dr. J. F. Cannon of St. Louis, in a lecture on "Young People's Societies" before the students of the Louisville Theological Seminary, pleaded that it might be guarded against abuses, one of which, he said, was "the undue prominence of women!" It is too bad to have a Cannon go off this way.

Every one interested in India should hear Mrs. J. W. Andrews's paper before the South Friendly Society, South Congregational Church, next Monday evening. Mrs. Andrews, in her long trip through Hindustan, not only travelled with an eye for all that was curious and new, but with a sympathetic spirit that saw good where it was to be found, and busied itself with ways to make things better where there was need.

The valuable book on the Armenian question which has recently been published by the Putnams, "The Armenian Crisis in Turkey," is on sale at 141 Franklin Street and 25 Beacon Street, at 40 cents in paper, postpaid. It is hoped there will be many orders, as this is not only the most authentic account of the last massacre, but is the best brief history of the Armenian people and the Armenian Church, the oldest Christian church in existence.

The Cumberland Presbyterian says to ministers who are pining for a new field: "Instead of pining and planning for a new field, get new energy, new thoughts, new earnestness. Make yourself and your sermons new; and your people, who are perhaps as tired of you as you are of them, will also wake up, and, finding that their old pastor has become new, they themselves will follow your example, and become the new congregation you have been longing for."

A letter from Rev. L. P. Ludden, Lincoln, Neb., secretary of the Nebraska Relief Committee, acknowledges to Mr. Richard C. Humphreys of Boston the receipt of $100 for the Nebraska sufferers collected through the Christian Register, and says: "The same has been properly credited on our State relief books, and will be used in purchasing seed grain for our drouth sufferers. On behalf of those to whom it will bring blessings in this direction, we desire to thank you most sincerely."

A host of our readers will join us in extending warm congratulations to Rev. Samuel May of Leicester, Mass., on his eighty-fifth birthday, which he has reached this eleventh day of April. Mr. May's long life has been consecrated to the worship of God and the service of man. He has joined the army of the Lord in the battle for truth and righteousness, and his clarion call has often been heard in the Christian Register. Thus the world has shared his life, and may be grateful for what it has received.

Rev. Albert Lazenby, who is coming over for a short visit to America, is our leading Unitarian minister in Scotland, having been for ten years pastor of St. Vincent Street Church, Glasgow. Scotland is stony ground for liberal Christianity, except for that kind which keeps the good old orthodox Presbyterian label; but Mr. Lazenby has helped to make Unitarianism better known and respected, and at his occasional course of Sunday evening lectures in Glasgow he has had the great city hall crowded with twenty-five hundred eager hearers. We understand that Mr. Lazenby is to preach at King's Chapel April 21 and 28, and is delegated by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to represent our English brethren at our anniversary meetings in May, at which he is sure of a cordial welcome.

Pro and Con.

MR. PULSFORD'S LESSONS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I wish to echo the regret of "G. H. H." in your last number that more of our Sunday-school teachers do not attend Mr. Pulsford's exposition of the lessons at Channing Hall on Saturday afternoons. The attendance has increased over last year, and will doubtless increase yet farther; but no teacher who uses these lessons can afford to lose Mr. Pulsford's broad scholarship, moral enthusiasm, vivid portraiture, and mingling of eloquence with wit. The hour is one of great interest and enjoyment as well as profit, all my teachers agree with me in saying.

AN EASTER SONG.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRUNTON.

How beautiful the world that comes from gloom,
From snows of winter and the barren field!
Rich nature rises from her silent tomb,
To show surprises resurrection yield;
And though it be but flower and leafy tree,
Or growing of the grass we loved of yore,
Still in it all God's parable we see,
And with a tender thankfulness adore!

Fair trooping like the stars are golden flowers,
Which grow in sheltered ways to please our sight;
O'er lonely graves are whispering budding bowers,
And after darkness all appears so bright.
What though it be the earth that knows the change,
The spirit reads it of the life before,
And, thinking of its meaning sweet and strange,
Our souls are glad, and silently adore!

THE NEW EASTER.

BY AUGUSTA LARNED.

The rebirth of nature is but a symbol of the rebirth of the soul of man, even here in this ever-changeable and progressive mortal life. If evolution were to complete itself, the race would stand still for a moment, then begin to retrograde in the inverse ratio toward extinction. It is the essential law of our being to pass from form to form, from state to state, from order to order.

Jesus was to pass through death to universal power; and Christianity has had its unending progression, even in its retrograde phases making a detour of progress, manifesting new phases of spiritual adaptability and force. The old idea of death transmutes itself; and, as it is colored with the iridescence of hope, the Easter takes on a new, a brighter significance. There was a time, and not so far away, when the worm and the death's head, the charnel-house, the ghastly, fleshless skeleton, abject terror, and low superstition absorbed the realm of death; and the resurrection promise and symbol were overborne by the horror of physical decay. Art lent itself to the popular conception, and revelled in these nightmares. Art, ever sensitive to public sentiment, would not now dare to exhibit these facts in their repulsive baldness. The new Easter has touched the new art with hope and tenderness.

In those old days the Christian Easter stood upon the calendar, but had little comfort or consolation for the mourner. Physical loathsomeness, Satanic revels, and dreadful imaginings filled the popular mind. The Easter we know, where death is overborne by life, where the blossom has taken the place of the worm, is therefore an evolution slowly and painfully come to birth,—one of the most important in the whole history of religious thought; for it plants the flower of hope on graves, and turns the universe into a symbol of promise. The Easter helps us to bring to bear our profoundest convictions, lying deep in consciousness beyond the realm of proof or ordered reason, on this solemn subject, the background and shadow of all our lives.

The veil and the mystery are ever with us. We sit down alone with our grief and our conjectures and our unanswered questions. We cry into the silence, and bruise our hearts against the black wall that divides us from those we love; but the more cheerful attitude of the world toward death at last helps us to calm, soothes the restless and moaning soul. And we perceive that a sun of promise, the Easter sun, has risen on the race. The general conception of death has lightened. We could no more go back now to the Middle Age idea than we could revert to human sacrifice. The new thought and feeling has come with development, an enlarged view, a better grasp of probabilities. It is in the air, something fluid and pervasive, not to be put into syllogisms.

If we have no more positive knowledge of the ever present mystery, we have the brighter intuition; and, because it is with us now a familiar guest, we forget to be grateful for the unspeakable blessing it brings. We know not whence it comes; and we say to ourselves, Why not from the spirit of God? Why is it not a part of that great inspirational current ever flowing through the human soul? We will not dogmatize about what the Infinite has deemed it wise to hide from us: we will accept the fact, and place it alongside of birth, as inscrutable to our ken as its twin brother, death. This is what the new Easter has done for us. For ages the resurrection of Christ, the accepted fact on which the great festival was based, did not succeed in thinning the edges of the heavy pall of despair that hung over death and made it grisly with horror. Now that belief in the literal resurrection is allowed to fall more and more into the background of men's minds, as a question non-essential, neither to be rashly affirmed or denied, Easter has passed from the gross physical phase to the region of spiritual symbolism, where all is love and light and sweet consolation.

The hope of a bodily resurrection could not work this change. Always in the subconsciousness of man lay doubt as to the renewal of the old decayed shell for which the soul had no further need. God could as easily create a new spiritual body as bring together by act of miracle the scattered elements of this imperfect receptacle. Science has played its part in showing us the remorseless thrift of nature that works up in her looms every particle of rejected matter into new forms, until resurrection has changed not to one re-creation, but millions. The spiritual body proclaimed by Paul has gradually been gaining acceptance and strength,—the thought that the soul cannot exist without some envelope of that we call matter, which is, in fact, as great a mystery as that we call soul, its eternal spouse, from which we know not how divorce can be decreed. Could we take a census of the religious community on this point, we should find how deeply the thought of the spiritual body has gone into human consciousness, and what a world of comfort and hope it has shed upon life.

We know that without the hope of immortality there could be no human progress. Life must have its foreground as well as its background. The race emerges from savagery when it begins to remember and get a past. A future is no less essential. It must have before it the hope of infinite expansion. The belief in perfection becomes the strongest of those divine impossibilities by which we live. This foreground of being widens as we ascend. It is the spiritual ether ever expanding to infinitude. Nothing less will satisfy the craving, out-reaching nature that is in us. We perish before a barrier. Thus God has built the universe without walls. If the immortal hope is a cheat and a delusion, we feel that the universe itself must be a lie, a deceptive trick of our senses. Thus we stand on a narrow neck of land between gulfs of black despair and illimitable hopes of immortality.

Jesus gave a new meaning to the gross doctrine of the resurrection of the body held by the Sadducees. He rose embodied truth, a new principle of progress, a new conception of man's relation to God and to his brother. The physical fact for long ages was thrust forward to obscure the inner, esoteric sense of the legend. For long he was buried under dogmas deep and dense. The great stone of a burdensome theology was at last rolled from the mouth of his sepulchre. He was swathed and bound with the cerements of dogmatic definitions and formulas which men must accept or be condemned. But the immense vitality of his truth has burst at last these bonds. Men are no longer under ban forced to affirm or deny mysteries forever hidden from human ken. Deed has come to reign over creed. In place of dogma we dwell on love and service. It is this that makes the new Easter vital, that brings expectancy and promise on every wind that blows, that reveals hope in every spring blossom. The new Christ has indeed risen for the human soul to love and reverence without bonds. We come gladly to our spiritual comforter, who will not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax. The airs of spiritual freedom blow round the world, and wake the sentiment of praise and thanksgiving, and touch all consecrated memories to a renewed and deepened tenderness. Nature revived, stirring in sap and bird-warble, and the push of root and stem and bud, is the sublime Easter symbol. The sealed life of the world has waited long for the reviving touch, and has not been betrayed. So the trusting heart, waiting like the plant germ in darkness and silence, shall not be betrayed. Love is poured out unstinted for us. Where we cannot now see the end, it shall bring us one day to the place of the unsealing of eyes. The loving, protecting Christ rises for us on Easter Day,—the Christ of the poor, the lowly, the trustful,—those little ones who followed him long ago like a band of children in the fields of Galilee; the Christ who taught us to say "Our Father," and showed us the vision of the kingdom of God, who taught us to discard formal, soulless, outward worship, and to worship in spirit and in truth. The new Easter restores him to us, as he shines in the sweetest pages of the gospel. Passions are quelled, sorrow and sighing fade away before that vision. All is light, beauty, peace, humility. Deep and genuine things, the love that transforms and makes all things new, blossom out of this consecrated time. Our graves grow verdant in view of the soft splendor of this angelic vision, where love knits earth to heaven, and time is an undivided portion of eternity. We pluck from them the heavenly asphodel. Our heavy hearts are rested, our tears are dried. We must refresh ourselves at these wells of faith if we would not fossilize in materialism. This life has infinite extensions of spirit force. This visible world is an infinitesimal point compared with the spheres on which we impinge. How we reconcile the little we know with all we believe or dimly conceive, who can say? The most thorough-going agnostic cannot confine himself to the knowable, do what he may. The soul spurns such limitations. The unknown is its challenge and defiance. It will not let it alone. Life and death are the Siamese twins of thought. Where one goes, the other must follow. Who can say whether God is a fact or a simulacrum of the mind; and yet we know we live by him alone, draw from him the riches of our inexhaustible resources, find in him our retreat, our asylum, our society, our help when all else fails. The invisible realms are opened for us on Easter Day. The dead are not dead: they are still ours. We no longer say with tears, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." We see that he is indeed risen, and is smiling upon us in the fervor and purity of a new faith. He comes in all the beauty that thrills the earth, and sets the song astir in the thrush's breast. He looks upon us in the eye of the wood violet and the affectionate smile of every human countenance. Immense sources of power, love, happiness, seem to open about this little isle of life. We are not poor little ants tugging at straws on a mole-hill. We are immortal beings, with the grandest prospects and opportunities. All the source of promise and life are open to us. It remains only for us to rise to the occasion. We may drink freely of the living water, we may hope infinitely, we may love and reverence without stint. We may put our hands to service for our kind, whether small or great, with competent faith in the progress and the aspiration of our race. But we must always remember that we are creatures of vision, fed from ideal sources, and that the sky is but a semi-transparent veil drawn between us and perfect fruition.

EASTER IN RUSSIA.

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

The Russians, as is well known, are members of the Greek Church; but no Roman Catholic can be more devout than a true Muscovite. His religion is part of his life, and the ordinances of his Church are kept with conscientious fidelity. The Slav is fond of amusement, too, and loses no opportunity to indulge this propensity. Thus a natural tendency and religious fanaticism alike unite to render Easter in Russia a festival of unprecedented joy and pageantry, which is in striking contrast to the dismal season that precedes it.

All through Lent and Passion Week the greatest gloom and solemnity prevail. The theatres are closed, and dancing and all games are prohibited. In Moscow and St. Petersburg, as well as in the little rural hamlets on the Volga and Dnieper, the same fasting and religious ceremonies are observed. Neither flesh, fowl, milk, or eggs are eaten during the Lenten season, and butter and fish only the first four weeks. Some of the most scrupulous will not use sugar in their tea, because it has been clarified with blood. A funereal gloom characterizes Passion Week. The people spend the time in going to church, and every place of worship is crowded with devotees. No amusements of any kind are indulged in, and during the last three days before Easter the people abstain wholly from food of any kind. It is no wonder that Easter Eve is greeted with expectation and a sensation of relief.

Every Russian prepares for Easter by taking his weekly vapor bath. In these baths they sustain a heat that to all but Russians would be nearly insupportable; and then they rush suddenly out to plunge themselves in cold water or to roll stark naked in the snow. Such is the force of habit that what would be death to natives of other climes is luxurious indulgence to the Muscovite. He also buys and puts on a new suit of clothes, this being considered absolutely necessary for the Easter festival. The houses have all been scrubbed and made clean during the previous week; and the Easter gifts are all collected, and a lamp is lighted to watch over them.

If one were in Moscow on Easter Eve, he would find the people gathering in great crowds at the Kremlin, which is palace and church and fortress combined. There is very little noise or disturbance, and but few lights are seen; but the cathedral itself is one blaze of splendor. No priests are in attendance; but in the centre of the church stands a desk with an open Bible upon it, and any Slav who can read has the privilege of reading aloud from it.

With reverent faces the fair-haired, blue-eyed Russians are continually entering for their devotions. The scene is sometimes impressive, as often an aged Russian peasant, in his warm sheepskin robe, taper in hand, takes his stand beside the Bible; while little children devoutly listen, with clasped hands, as he reads aloud; or perhaps a Cossack soldier, fierce and long-bearded, will spell out with slow patience and affectionate devotion the sufferings of the Saviour of the world.

As midnight approaches, the crowd in creases. All classes and all ages are represented,—the rich nobles and their wives, dressed after the French fashion; well-to-do merchants and land-owners, wearing the pelisse or big fur cloak, fur boots or shoes, and the velvet or fur cap large enough to pull down over the head; the ubiquitous boy; young girls with their gay ribbons, heavy plaited tresses decorated with pearls, and their robes glittering the whole length with bright buttons; white-haired old pilgrims from the provinces; officers in showy uniforms; and the university professors in their clerical robes. These all stand,—for there are no seats in Russian churches,—and quietly await the hour of demonstration. Presently the golden doors are thrown open from the Holy of Holies; and the archbishop appears on the highest steps of the altar, and with uplifted hand blesses the people. When the invocation is finished, a line of priests, dressed in their sombre Lenten robes and bearing crosses, symbols, and pictures in the life of Christ, file out of the church like a solemn procession of mourners.

It is now twelve o'clock,—midnight. Boom! boom! boom! tolls the bell on the tower of Ivan the Great. Instantly it is answered, peal upon peal, from the four hundred church bells of Moscow, till there is a great midnight chorus of musical symphony. Bang! goes a cannon, and another and another; and, while the bells ring and the cannons roar, every worshipper becomes a torch-bearer. A taper carried by each one is lighted, and prince and peasant and blooming youth and bearded age are enveloped in a strange and almost unearthly radiance. They form in two lines at the doorway and in the church; and between re-enters the procession of priests, who are now clothed in rich, variegated robes of satin and cloth of gold, and wear high, jewelled caps upon their heads. Once more the archbishop appears upon the high steps of the altar; but this time he announces, "Christ is risen." Incense is scattered among the congregation, and the united voices of the singers burst out in a wondrous melody.

Nothing can be more striking than this pageant. There is the Kremlin, with its high walls of white stone, with battlements cut in the form of Tartar arrowheads, its eighteen green towers and its fine rose-colored gates, its cathedrals, churches, and palaces. And there are the crowds of people with waving torches, the cathedrals blazing with radiance, the splendid costume of the priests, the wonderful choral music, the pealing bells, and the intonations of ordinance,—all telling of the universal joy of Easter.

After the church service comes the blessing of the Easter cakes set in long rows; and each cake carries its lighted taper. The crowd exchange congratulations: every where one hears the greeting, "Christ is risen," and the response, "He is risen indeed." A certain kind of exhilaration prevails among the half-barbarous peasants; and some of the more excitable devotees have been known to discharge their pistols in church, even singeing the beards of the priests.

The Easter joy has hardly begun, however. The people gradually disperse and go home to an Easter breakfast, at which is usually served a lamb in butter, frizzled and curled, with currant eyes; shchi, cabbage soup; pashka, rich curd covered with sweetened paste; eggs and kulitsch, bread made of long rolls of dough twisted together. Other Easter dishes are bot vinya, vegetable soup; taurki, bread crumbs soaked in kvas, sour fermented drink. Ham is a universal Easter article of diet; and plenty of vodka, brandy, is drunk. The lower classes, as a general thing, carry their food previously to the church, where the priests sprinkle it with holy water.

After breakfast there is a grand mass in the cathedral, when the Metropolitan officiates, and the gospel is read in four languages,—Russian, Slavonic, Greek, and Hebrew. Everywhere there are joy and gladness and exchanging of gifts and the making of congratulatory visits. The usual hour for Easter calling is at ten o'clock; and at that time you can see the gay equipages of the nobility and the gentry flying about in all directions, and kissing is general among friends and acquaintances in all classes of life. Even the czar is obliged to receive calls; and for an hour and a half in the chapel of the Winter Palace he is busy in the bestowing of these affectionate salutes on clergy and council, senators and generals, on his household and navy officers.

The customary gifts are the inevitable Easter eggs. Hundreds of thousands of these eggs change hands every Easter season in St. Petersburg alone. Some of these "eggs" are most costly, being nothing less than gold cases, egg-shaped, containing beautiful jewelry. The real eggs are colored, usually red. Hence the application of the name to a gift, "a little red egg."

It is one long holiday through the Easter season. Every subject of the czar gives himself up to the gayety of the occasion. The beautiful-sounding bells of Moscow are rung almost constantly. In all the public places there are swings, flying horses, merry-go-rounds, and Punch and Judy shows, for the delectation of the crowd. The streets are full of peasants, kissing each other and exchanging eggs, many of them in an intoxicated condition; for the Russian makes the most of his privilege of getting tipsy on Easter. But, whether drunk or sober, at sunrise and at sunset, he never tires of uttering the beautiful greeting, "The Lord is risen," to which his neighbor ever responds, "He is risen indeed." And then the Easter kiss is given and received.

The festival concludes by a mass on the Sunday after Easter. In the provincial churches each peasant receives a piece of a red loaf, with the words, "Christ is risen," which he keeps sacredly with his Palm Sunday branch on the table devoted to his Domovoi, or household spirit. And so ends Easter in Russia.

CHRIST.

BY REV. F. B. MOTT.

Whether we regard its extraordinary history or the extent of its influence at the present moment, Christianity compels the attention of every thoughtful person.

The man of to-day brought up in a Christian country may well ask with quickened surprise, when he first comes seriously to consider those religious questions which during his youth he has taken for granted, "What is the power within this system of Christian belief which through all the forms and phrases, creeds and rituals, of passing centuries holds so firmly the religious hopes of many nations?"

It is evident that within Christianity itself there must lie somewhere a tremendously powerful energy worthy of consideration. Yet who can interpret the network of doctrines, theories, orders, arguments, explanations, creeds, and counter-creeds which have grown together into Christianity? Have the brilliant succession of cardinals' councils formulated the truth, or the Westminster conclaves? Fortunately, the simple seeker after the true faith instinctively feels that it is not from the mountainous accumulations of theory, nor from strings of doctrine, that religion draws her breath of life. He remembers what King Arthur said to those knights thirsting for fame who would go off to seek for it in strange and distant lands:—

"How often, O my knights,
The chance of noble deeds will come and go Unchallenged, while ye follow wandering fires,
Lost in the quagmire!"

He recalls how the noblest saints in the Christian world have found their inspiration without any such search,—men like Francis of Assisi, Savonarola, Bunyan, Theophilus Lindsay, Livingstone, Gordon, Father Damien, Phillips Brooks. He sees that the power of Christianity lies in the pure human character that is in it, and which has come down from its source.

Below Kansas City runs the sweeping mud stream of the Missouri River. But it is the sparkling source far up above that gives the river its life; and far below in the Gulf of Mexico the mud will settle to the earth again, and the crystal river run into the sea. So Christianity back at its source was pure, and in that purity is its power. From the mountain side the words of Jesus spread through the spellbound multitudes, kindling sparks of the divine ideal already alive in himself, passing from reverent heart to heart glowing as it passed, handed on from friend to friend, learned by distant lisping Western tongues, renewing hope, dispelling fear, increasing love. That deathless power could not die. It rode upon the winds of heaven. Under the silent stars the mighty impulse of this one full life began to lift the burdens of the heavy-hearted throughout the world. Niagara does not change a single law of nature's plan. It is but the flowing of a natural stream, full, compressed. Such was Christ. A great, full, human life, revealing God-like life.

For, as God's sweetness is in the rose, his peace upon the sea, his majesty and order in the stars, his music in the voice of nature, so his truth and joy and love take shape within the heart of man. The kingdom of heaven is men and women. "There is God," said Jesus, "heeding that sparrow's fall, painting that lily, crossing the road to lift that beggar. This sea of Galilee is his. He blooms in that garden of roses, in the love-looks of these children." So in his heart of hearts, as in a sacred cup, Christ held the precious drops distilled from God's own life. Yet he took the cup and shattered it, that the sacred draught might flow out to the healing of the world. All of the Father that there was in him, that he gave unto the world. So the seeking human soul to-day finds its best teacher, leader, inspirer, and Master, when it finds the life of Christ.

NEW YORK LETTER.

In spite of some recent cold days, the city is beginning to wear a certain jaunty freshness and suggestiveness of "ethereal mildness." The approach of the more genial season is felt even in the heart of the crowded business streets, where there is not a spot for grass to grow on, nor a single tree with swelling buds to show what nature is bent upon. Whether this is because the shop-windows are gay with Easter bonnets and brilliant with Easter flowers, or because the passers-by themselves are lighter-hearted, less intent and winterish in their aspect, who can tell?

We are having here an illustration of what a large amount of curiosity the average mortal possesses. Hourly, the little triangular park in front of the New York Herald Building, at the junction of Broadway and Sixth Avenue at Thirty-fifth Street, is filled with a fresh crowd of men, women, and children waiting to watch the striking of the Herald bell. This is a new combined mechanical device and work of art, consisting of a large bronze figure of Minerva placed on top of the Herald Building, and having below it a huge bell, which, as the hour arrives, is struck the requisite number of times by hammers held and swung by two stalwart men of bronze. The device, the gaping crowd, and the sweet-toned bell bring to mind a similar scene that tourists in Switzerland seem never tired of watching in Berne before the old clock tower there, with its crowing cock, procession of bears, bronze man, and massive bell.

With the change in the season there has come a change in the municipal situation here. The mayor, patient beyond what he should have been, many think, has at last begun police reorganization without waiting for the legislative obstructionists in Albany to enact the much needed reform legislation. Commissioners Murray and Kerwin are the two men on the board who have obstinately opposed all the reform measures of Mr. Andrews, the one new non-partisan commissioner. They have been told that they must go. Their resignations have not been directly requested, but have been asked for through a third person, a friend of Mr. Murray. The warning of the mayor to these two commissioners that official decapitation awaited them if they did not voluntarily make way with themselves calls to mind the story told in one of his addresses by Mr. Curtis of the orthodox pastor who endeavored to lead his flock to salvation by the terrible exhortation: "Suppose, brethren, you should wake up to-morrow morning and find yourselves dead. What would you say then?" It is reported that the mayor is about to appoint to these commissions two of our public men of the highest character and ability, and who are among the foremost advocates of a non-partisan administration of municipal affairs. So many difficulties have been encountered, so much time and money have been spent in freeing the city government from the grasp of the Tammany octopus, that one wonders if, at last, the lesson has not been really learned that, in order to prevent the city from again falling into the power of corruptionists and plunderers, men of education, morality, and social standing must interest themselves continuously in local affairs,—must assume and discharge the obligations of citizenship.

It is pleasant to turn from the murky atmosphere of politics to the record of some pure, healthy religious and sociological work which has been done within the last year in Brooklyn by the pastor and parish of the First Unitarian Church. Mr. Eliot's society has just held its annual meeting; and, as usual, reports were made upon what had been accomplished during the past twelve months at the Willow Place Chapel. It has long been a matter of debate among many sociological workers whether it were wise, practicable, or possible to combine the spiritual with the material, religion with philanthropy, preaching with practice. There are some missions of a sociological character in connection with our own liberal churches, and there are many able workers in charitable associations who feel that the religious impulse ought not to be openly placed behind the ethical endeavor. The mission work of the First Unitarian Church has always been frankly and avowedly religious. There is a preaching service every Sunday in the Willow Place Chapel, with music by a chorus choir; and there is a Sunday-school held every Sunday. The latter has twenty-seven officers, two hundred and fifty children, and, in addition, an infant department with two teachers and forty-five children. This is conducted on kindergarten principles.

But, while supplying this spiritual uplift to the working men and women and their children, the Willow Place Chapel is apparently not a step behind in the generous opportunities it offers for the mental improvement and the sane amusement of its constituency. In fact, the good works at the chapel are so many that only a brief enumeration of them can be given. As one reads the record over, one must not fail to see in each activity the heart and soul which fill it with quickening life and inspiration, and make it an unspeakable blessing both to the helped and to the helpers.

Considering the Sunday service and Sunday-school as the basis of all the work, and as numbers 1 and 2 in the enumeration, we have: (3) A free kindergarten, daily, with three teachers and fifty-four children. (4) The Men's Club, with sixty active members, an evening reading, debating, and amusement society for workingmen, officered and conducted by the men themselves. This club maintains a Sick and Death Benefit Fund; a co-operative store for the sale of staple groceries, coal, and wood, etc.; and a number of benevolent activities. It is a club of married men, and all are laborers or small tradesmen or mechanics. (5) The Women's Club, sixty mothers, who meet weekly with a number of the ladies of the church for sewing and amusement. This also has a Sick Benefit Fund. (6) The Working-girls' Club, which maintains club rooms for social purposes, and has classes in Cooking, in Hygiene, in Home Nursing, and in English Literature, conducted by young ladies from the church. (7) The Young Men's Club, which maintains its own club rooms and meets for social purposes three times weekly. (8) The Cadets, a young men's drill corps, fully equipped, drilled by young men from the church. (9) The Boys' Brigade, a company of the younger boys, drilled by the junior officers of the Cadets. (10) Boys' Study Class, an evening school in elementary branches, current events, and practice in conducting meetings. (11) A Sewing School and Calisthenic Class, sixty children, girls, taught by fourteen young ladies from the church. (12) The Employment Bureau. Sixty-one women made eight hundred and forty garments last winter, the work being conducted by a committee of ladies from the church. (13) A Summer Home for children. Forty-eight children and sixteen mothers were cared for at a country place rented by the church for the purpose. (14) A large number of children and mothers sent to the country in summer in co-operation with the "Country Week." (15) A Loan Library of one thousand volumes, conducted by three young men from the church. (16) Five Lend a Hand Clubs among the older children, doing little charities.

The success which has attended this work would seem to demonstrate the fact that character-building by means of religious instruction is an entirely compatible accompaniment of all other efforts to improve and elevate the individual.

Rev. Alfred Lazenby of Glasgow, Scotland, who is coming over to preach for a few Sundays at King's Chapel in Boston, will arrive here on April 13. On the following Monday the Unitarian ministers of New York and vicinity will hold a special meeting, and give a lunch to Mr. Lazenby at the Reform Club, their usual gathering-place. It is expected that Mr. Lazenby will give a talk on "Unitarianism and the Theological Situation in Scotland." The ministers, on their part, may be able to interest Mr. Lazenby by telling him what the Reform Club has done within a year in the interest of sound money. The circular of the committee having this in charge, the chairman of which is ex-Secretary Charles F. Fairchild, has just been issued. It is an earnest protest against all phases of fiat money and depreciated silver, and is so unpartisan in spirit it ought to commend itself to all candid thinkers. Seven tracts on sound money have been prepared, and two hundred thousand copies issued by the club during the year.

It is a pleasure to report that the work of Mrs. James H. Morse among the colored people on the west side of the city, which has before been referred to, has resulted in the organization of a kindergarten, sewing school, and library for colored children.

Mrs. Morse has been elected president, Mrs. Edward Curtis treasurer; and two of the colored women who have helped in starting the charity are respectively secretary and superintendent. An entertainment for the benefit of the undertaking was held last week in one of the chapter rooms of Carnegie's Hall, and over $200 was netted from it. The colored children gave the larger part of the programme.

On Friday, April 5, the regular meeting of the New York League of Unitarian Women was held at Unity Church, Brooklyn. Papers on "Three Famous Women,—Lucretia Mott, Lydia Maria Child, and Dorothea Dix,"—were read by Mrs. James H. Morse, Mrs. John W. Chadwick, and Miss F. G. Davenport. M. A. M.

Spiritual Life.

IMMORTALITY.

When by nobler culture, by purer experience, by breathing the air of a higher duty, vitality at length creeps into the soul, the instincts of immortality will wake within us.—James Martineau.

My body must descend to the place ordained, but my soul will not descend. Being a thing immortal, it will ascend on high, where it will enter a heavenly abode. Death does not differ at all from life.—Plato.

Just as Thy Easter sun to-day
 Warm into life each tiny spray
 And all the blossoms start,
 We know thy light of Love divine
 Shall give at last all souls of thine
 The Easter of the heart.

The life of the spirit is the evidence of immortality. Heaven begun is the living proof that makes the heaven to come credible. He alone can believe in immortality who feels the resurrection in him already. F. W. Robertson.

Through making us hope for immortality, God has made us a promise of it. If faith is the evidence of things not seen, hope is the certainty of them. The morrow of the world is a purpose in the mind of God, and so is the great to-morrow of my soul.—William Mountford.

Day and night show unto us the resurrection. The night falleth asleep, and the day riseth: the day departeth, and night cometh on. The sower casteth into the earth each of the seeds, and these decay. Then out of their decay the might of the Master's providence raiseth them up, and they bear fruit. Clement of Rome.

I see the autumn prefigured in the spring. As the bud now lying cold and close upon the bark of every tree throughout our northern clime is a silent prophecy of yet another spring and other summers, and harvests, too, so this instinctive love of justice, scantily budding here and nipped by adverse fate, silently, but clearly tells of the kingdom of heaven.—Theodore Parker.

We talk of immortality; but there is a better phrase than that,—the word of Jesus, "eternal life." That implies not mere duration, but quality. It blends the present and the future into one. It sets before us a state into which we are called to enter now, and into which, as we enter, we find ourselves at home in our Father's house, beyond the power of doubt and fear. George S. Merriam.

Our being is not quite buried in torpor and darkness. Already it is bursting out into light and expansion. Full it is of epochs and heroic crises. It feels itself called upon to act and to advance. And to this earth-strife that presses upon us every day, to this solemn, to this dim bordering upon the realm of boundless light, is there not a voice that says: "Onward! Onward forever!"—Orville Dewey.

CHANNING CONFERENCE.

The fifty-ninth session of Channing Conference was held in the First Congregational Church in New Bedford, Mass., on the evening of April 2 and the following day. The conference sermon was preached by Rev. M. J. Savage before a large audience, many of whom were not Unitarians, who were drawn thither by the fame of the preacher. The aim of the sermon was to show that the gospel of Paul, "Be ye reconciled to God," was essentially the same as the word of science, "Be ye adjusted to your environment." The various religions of the globe are the result of the effort of man, through thought, feeling, and action, to get into better relations with his environment. As this will ever continue, religion in some form must ever exist. The Church is the noblest institution of man; and it is our highest duty to support that which comes nearest to the expression of our ideal of truth, righteousness, and love. The sermon was strong and clear, and gave great satisfaction.

The devotional services the next morning were conducted by Rev. Herbert Mott of Providence, who took for his lesson the parable of the talents. Business meeting, ten o'clock, President Job C. Tripp in the chair. He expressed the delight of the conference to meet for the first time in a church to which so many honored and saintly men—Dewey and Weiss and Potter among them—had ministered. The treasurer's report showed over $1,200 in the treasury. $800 had already been pledged toward the building of a chapel in Vineyard Haven; and $200 more was voted at this meeting, which, together with some $525 promised from another source, is nearly enough to construct such a building as was desired. Work on it will likely be begun immediately, so as to have it ready for this summer's use. Unfortunately, our conference meeting came this year on Rhode Island's election day, as has happened before; and so, in order to avoid such conflicts of patriotic duties in the future, a motion was made by Rev. Mr. Cutter of Newport of a purpose to amend the constitution of the conference at its next meeting.

Mrs. Robert H. Davis of New York, corresponding secretary of the Women's National Alliance, then addressed the conference on "The Work of Women in our Churches," and described the beginning and growth of the Women's Auxiliary Conference and the National Alliance, with its present effective methods. She urged every church to form a Branch of the Alliance, and the ministers to seek this means of strengthening them in their work. As a result of the enthusiasm aroused, at the close of the conference a meeting was called; and it was voted to form a Branch of the Alliance in New Bedford, and initiatory steps were taken for that purpose. Mrs. Davis is a very bright, earnest, persuasive speaker, and made a most favorable impression on her audience. As she possesses first-rate organizing ability, she is an ideal person for the work in hand.

Rev. Thomas Van Ness of Boston next gave us a vivid and picturesque illustration of "The Dramatic Power of the Unitarian Gospel." The old story of creation and Paradise, the fall of man, and the redemption through the sacrifice on Calvary, and the last judgment, parting souls to the right hand and the left,—all this has indeed great possibilities of dramatic presentation; but so has the new view of religion, the new idea of the eternities and immensities, of creation, of the rise and fall of man, of Jesus as an elder brother and moral guide, and of God as the Friend and Saviour of all his children. Especially vivid and impressive was the picture drawn of the hell which sin makes for the sinner and his offspring,—hells which burn as with never-dying flame. Indeed, they seemed almost too hot and unmerciful for God's love to temper or have any part in. Rev. Mr. Lord wanted to know how the saving power of God could be pictured as clearly and well. Rev. Arthur Knapp, Rev. C. A. Young, Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer, and Mrs. Robert Davis took part in the lively discussion which followed.

Members reconvened at 2 P.M. The Committee on Nominations renominated the old list of officers, adding thereto the name of Hon. W. R. Warner of Fall River to the Committee for Christian Work. Rev. Mr. Cutter of Newport and Miss Sarah E. Doyle of Providence read reports of the Women's Alliance of those respective places. On motion of Rev. Mr. Lord the following resolution was passed:—

"Resolved, That the Channing Conference extends to the Rev. Dr. James Martineau of England its hearty congratulations on the occasion of his ninetieth birthday, and wishes to express its appreciation of the services which his broad scholarship and deep spiritual insight have rendered in determining the religious thought and inspiring the religious life of the nineteenth century."

"Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to Rev. James Martineau."

Rev. C. F. Dole of Jamaica Plain then addressed the conference on the subject, "The Problem of the Prosperous." The speaker said that the law of pressure operates in the world of man as in the world of matter. It is necessary in order to develop elasticity, vitality, strength, and service; but, if there is too much of it in the human world, it crushes; if too little, it produces other evils. People try to get rid of the action of this law, and too many succeed. Too many of the rich in intellectual gifts, in social power, as well as money, withdraw themselves from useful service, who ought to feel their social responsibilities and work for their brother man. It is only by living our faith that we can prove this to be a divine universe.

The discourse was a strong, noble, eloquent, and most impressive appeal for loving, consecrated service of the needy classes in society. Rev. George Batchelor was called out, and responded with a like appeal for the religion that means life. An interesting discussion followed, participated in by Rev. Messrs. Knapp and Young and Rev. Mrs. Spencer.

Notwithstanding the unpropitious weather and the conjunction of election day, a large audience was present at every meeting. If Mr. Potter's name was not often mentioned, it was not because he was not often in our thoughts. His memory was like a sacred presence to some of us. Altogether, I think it was the general feeling that the first Channing Conference ever held in New Bedford was a very gratifying success. We hope in the years to come we may have the pleasure of meeting many times in this fine old city by the sea. After voting thanks to the society for their gracious hospitality and abundant collation, and to the preacher and the other speakers for their able and inspiring addresses, the meeting adjourned. W. H. SPENCER, Secretary.

The Sunday School.

A pamphlet service, not incorporated in the New Song and Service Book, has been issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, containing everything needful, including selections from the Psalms. This service can be used in church or in Sunday-school. Price 60 cents per dozen.

The first copies of the New Song and Service Book were speedily taken. The volume appeared last week; and already the Sunday-schools of Quincy, Malden, Barnardston, All Souls' Church, Boston, and Rockland (Mass.), have introduced the book. The advertisement in another column describes it.

The regular Channing Hall "talks" by Miss Dockham and Rev. Mr. Pulsford will be omitted this week on account of Easter Sunday. Most of our Sunday-schools in this vicinity will be occupied with special Easter exercises or in rehearsing. The subject which would fall on Saturday, April 13, will be considered a week from that time.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The seventh regular meeting, twelfth season, 1894-95, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, April 15. Subject, "Aids to Sunday-school Work in Other Fields." Twenty-minute addresses will be given by Mr. S. F. Hubbard, North End Mission; Mr. A. A. Wordell, Parker Memorial; Rev. Reuben Kidner, St. Andrew House; Mr. Parker B. Field, Barnard Memorial.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

THE Worcester Association will meet with Rev. W. F. Greenman at Fitchburg, Tuesday, April 16, at ten o'clock A.M. Essay by Rev. N. Seaver. Subject, "The Unwritten Gospel." Sermon by Rev. A. F. Bailey. G. F. Pratt, Scribe.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE BRANCH ALLIANCE.—The Branch of the Women's Alliance connected with the First Unitarian Church, Lawrence, Mass. (Rev. George H. Young, minister), extends a cordial invitation to all the New England Branches to meet with them on Thursday, April 18. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells will preside. Exercises will begin at 10.30 A.M. At the morning session Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows of Boston will speak upon "The Faith and Heroism of the Women of Armenia," to be followed by Miss Mary F. Eastman of Tewksbury, Mass. Box lunch at 12.30 P.M. In the afternoon Mrs. Edward C. Jordan of Portland, Me., will speak on "The Scope and Extent of Alliance Work"; and Rev. George H. Young, on "The Value of the Alliance as a Factor in Church Work." Trains leave the Union Station in Boston for Lawrence at 8.30 and 9.25 A.M.

REV. E. J. HELMS will take charge of Morgan Chapel (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches) for the coming year in place of Rev. Mr. Schreckengast, who is to be pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church in Webster City, Ia. A correspondent writes of him:—

"Mr. Helms is a graduate from Grinnell College, Iowa, and from the theological department of Boston University. With three other students he established the University Settlement at the North End. Here he has shown himself a man of rare executive ability, carrying on the work under most adverse circumstances, and building up an institution whose influence, both along philanthropic and religious lines, must be far-reaching. He is first of all a Christian student of sociology, having investigated the subject practically in several large cities. He is at present taking post-graduate work in that department at Harvard under Prof. Peabody. Last fall he organized a class, consisting of theological students, who met once a week to listen to lectures from specialists in sociology. Each member was required to write a thesis upon some phase of the social question, his data to be obtained by personal investigations in the North End. Mr. Helms is the sympathetic friend of each one of his people; and in all his work he has in Mrs. Helms a helpmeet indeed, and one of thorough training for mission work."

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Edward C. Guild will preach April 14. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

Ministers' Monday Club: April 15, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Henry Powers will preside. Rev. J. T. G. Nichols, D.D., will give the essay, on "Jesus."

Parker Memorial, corner Berkeley and Appleton Streets (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): The last service in the present course, which has been running since October, 1894, will be next Sunday evening, April 14, at 7.30. Speaker, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore. Subject, "Life: Its Conflict and Victory." Special music by the Marion Osgood's Orchestra, six pieces. Soloists: Miss Lillian Carlsmith, contralto; Mr. Joseph L. White, baritone. All seats free. The attendance has been very large throughout the winter, and there is every evidence that the results have been beneficial to the community. This is the second year of the popular religious services. They will be resumed for a third course in the autumn.

The South Friendly Entertainments: The South Friendly Society of Dr. Hale's church have arranged for several entertainments for the benefit of their charities, to be given in the vestry of the South Congregational Church, corner of Newbury and Exeter Streets. On Monday, April 8, the programme was: Dr. E. E. Hale, "A Man without a Country"; Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic"; Mrs. Julia Houston West, songs. On Monday, April 15, Mrs. J. W. Andrews will give a paper called "A Trip to India." There will also be a Hindu song. Monday, April 22: Dr. E. E. Hale, Reminiscences, with his First and Last Battle; Mrs. L. B. Fenderson, "The Star-spangled Banner," etc.; recitations. An informal reception will be held each evening from seven until eight o'clock. Readings begin at eight o'clock. Season tickets, $2; single admission, $1.

BERKELEY, CAL.—Rev. Edward B. Payne preached recently a sermon on Leviticus, in which he said: "We are writing out our Genesis, our Exodus, and our Leviticus,—our religious belief,—just as the Jews did. None of us are what we were five years ago: the horizon is made new for us and for nature. The change in denominations, though seemingly inconsistent with the former religious beliefs, is not really so. My radicalism means that we are unmistakably in an age which demands and will have a restatement of religious belief,—fresh and pure, so that it shall feed our souls. We find materials for every new age to restate its own religion in truths gathered from the whole field of human vision. I believe that the essentials of God's religion are already in the world, but that no age ought to fancy it has attained the limit of discovery in God and these essentials. The old saints have always lived in the glory of them, have walked in the light of them; and it is our privilege, through duty and discipline, to see them and follow after."

BRIDGEWATER, MASS.—The Unitarian church printed a card giving the subjects of the Lenten and Easter services. Rev. W. H. Lyon and Rev. E. C. Butler of Quincy have preached there in the evening recently, and last Sunday Rev. J. P. Forbes of Taunton spoke on "Personal Faithfulness."

BRIGHTON, MASS.—The new Unitarian church, Rev. Albert Walkley, pastor, was dedicated Sunday, March 31. We have already published a cut and a description of this new and beautiful church, which was crowded to standing room on the dedication day. The services were opened by C. O. Beck, with an organ voluntary. Rev. Howard N. Brown invoked the divine blessing, and the church quartette rendered Calkins's "I will magnify Thee." Rev. Josiah L. Seward read from the Scripture lesson; and the congregation sang the hymn, "Come, kingdom of our God." Mr. Arthur G. Everett, the architect of the new structure, who is also a member of the society, formally delivered the keys, with a few appropriate remarks. Mr. Cyrus E. Marshall, the chairman of the Parish Committee, accepted them in the same manner. Another selection by the quartette followed; and the service of dedication was read by the minister, Rev. Albert Walkley, and the congregation. Rev. Francis Hornbrooke led in the dedication prayer; and Rev. E. A. Horton preached the dedication sermon, saying in part: "There is only one test of Christianity, which is this, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' This is a beautiful edifice, but the community will test it by the fruits on the vine of its existence. The Church of the living God is pledged to impart a fuller and deeper comprehension of God. If the Church cannot do that it fails of its purpose and stands indicated before the face of God." The sermon was thoughtful and inspiring.

The reception given by the Ladies' Society in the parlors of the new church on Wednesday evening was a marked success. From six to seven the friends were received by the president of the Ladies' Association and Mrs. Walkley in the small parlor. At seven the door of the larger room was thrown open; and, as the guests entered, the tables and lights presented a very striking and brilliant picture. After prayer by Rev. S. W. Bush and the supper, the president of the Ladies' Society greeted the guests in a very fit and graceful speech, and then called on Rev. James De Normandie, who gave many apt recollections of Rev. Mr. Austen, one of the former ministers. He was followed by a very impressive address from Rev. M. J. Savage, who urged with great force and point the duty of sustaining the church. Rev. Mr. Hornbrooke added his wise and bright word, and Rev. Mr. Bush joined in his congratulations. Mr. William H. Baldwin closed with the expression of his interest in this parish, which, as the home of his boyhood, was dear to him; and, after referring to his joy at the present prosperity and bright prospects for the future of the parish, he urged the people to be loyal and faithful to the church and the religion of Jesus which it represents. The gathering was in every way a success, and the spirit very inspiring.

CHARLESTON, S.C.—The following is an extract from a private letter from a gentleman travelling in the South to a friend in Brooklyn, N.Y. :—

“We stopped over at Charleston (S.C.) on Sunday, the 17th. At the Charleston Hotel we met Mr. Alva Gage of the Unitarian church, who has boarded there for thirty years past. Mr. Gage is prominent in the Unitarian church, and made us welcome to his pew; and we heard an excellent sermon from the pastor, Rev. Mr. Whitman.

“The next day, the 18th, was Mr. Gage’s seventy-fifth birthday; and, being let into the secret of a surprise that was being prepared for him and his wife, we stayed over another day to witness and enjoy it, and were well repaid. The congregation had been waiting for a suitable opportunity to testify to Mr. Gage their appreciation of his recent munificent gift to the society of a parish house. On land adjoining the churchyard Mr. Gage has erected for the uses of the church a commodious building, of which the lower floor is for the purposes of a Sunday-school, vestry, and church meetings and entertainments; and the upper part is laid off in apartments for the pastor’s dwelling, and is far more commodious than many of our first-class flats.

“Mr. Gage’s birthday furnishing the coveted opportunity, the congregation, with secrecy worthy of the highest diplomatic skill, arranged for a reception in the evening at the parish house, where an entertainment was spread, and an oil painting of Mr. Gage, to be hung in the hall, and which had been secretly painted, was to be unveiled. Mr. and Mrs. Gage were invited to spend the evening with the pastor, and, when they arrived, to their great surprise, found the hall lighted and a house full of friends to greet them. The picture was unveiled with a presentation address from the chairman of the committee and an acceptance by the pastor. A reception and handshaking, and a collation, with a few impromptu speeches, followed. It was most pleasant and suggestive to meet granddaughters of Dr. Gilman in the congregation.

“The church is in vigorous health. Thanks to itself and some liberal men in the congregation, it keeps out of debt. Pastor and people are mutually pleased and helpful with and to each other. Mr. Whitman is a Georgian by birth, and well fitted by knowledge of the people and by general culture to minister to a Southern congregation. He took a Master’s degree at Cambridge in 1885. He has the devotion and the honorable ambition which cannot but succeed. If our friends from the North knew how kind and hospitable a welcome awaits them, and how such a visit from them is appreciated, they would try to stop over at Charleston as we did on their Southern pilgrimages, and would find a warm and inspiring welcome.”

CHELSEA, MASS.—The Sunday-school of the First Unitarian Church held a temperance service in honor of Mrs. Mary A. Livermore on Sunday, March 31. The exercises consisted of music and responsive reading, an interesting talk on the life of Mrs. Livermore by Rev. Mr. Eliot, together with a supplementary paper, by Miss Marshall. Miss Winslow, a young and indefatigable worker in the Methodist church, addressed the school. The Lord’s Prayer repeated by the children of the kindergarten was an impressive feature of the service.

DORCHESTER, MASS.—Christ Church installed its new minister, Benjamin A. Goodridge, on the evening of Wednesday, April 3. The bright and pleasant audience-room was well filled, and deep interest was manifested in the various exercises of the installation. After introductory music Rev. F. B. Mott offered an earnest prayer, and Rev. George H. Hosmer read Scripture selections of unusual appropriateness. Rev. Charles G. Ames read a telegram from Mr. and Mrs. Lord of St. Paul, conveying their heartfelt greetings to the church. The address of Mr. Ames which followed was characteristically wise and inspiring. He outlined the true relation which should exist between the consecrated church and its consecrated minister. He showed how impossible it is for a new minister to fill exactly the place left vacant by his predecessor. The new man must make and fill a new place. Rev. Walter F. Greenman of Fitchburg presented the greetings of the Worcester County Conference, and then spoke effectively upon vital themes for preaching. He urged that ministers should apply the same common-sense methods to answering the spiritual need of the times that wise business men employ in supplying its material needs. They should study the actual conditions which surround them, and make their preaching a real help to the daily lives of their people. Rev. Eugene R. Shippen of the First Parish in Dorchester gave a cordial greeting to Mr. Goodridge, in behalf of his own church and of the community; and Rev. Walter E. C. Smith of St. Mary’s Episcopal Church, Ashmont, in a felicitous speech, welcomed the new minister as a helper in the practical Christian work to which our churches should be devoted. Mr. Edwin T. Horne then gave the minister-elect a hearty hand-clasp, and in behalf of the church made an appropriate installation address. There were a few words of response by Mr. Goodridge. Then came the singing of a hymn, and after that the benediction closed this interesting event in the history of Christ Church.

HYDE PARK, MASS.—Dr. William Everett preached last Sunday.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.—Rev. Mr. Thomson is addressing his usual large audiences. An amusing story is told to the effect that recently a leading orthodox church of the city appointed a committee to attend his Sunday service and ascertain what there was in the preacher or his methods that so attracted the public and so won away their own church members. The committee went as directed, but never ventured to report. They are still attending Mr. Thomson’s services. On March 17 a collection of $4,000 was taken up to clear off the existing church debt. A committee is at work to raise $6,000 additional for this purpose. Then the auditorium will be enlarged so as to hold fifteen hundred people.

MILFORD, N.H.—The beautiful pipe organ made for our equally beautiful stone church, and presented by Hon. Albert E. Pillsbury of Boston, as a memorial to his parents, was dedicated on March 29 by an organ concert made free to the public. It was an occasion of great interest and of joy to the Unitarian people, and, seemingly, to the whole community. The mother of the donor has been critically ill for many weeks, and is likely to recover. The father, Mr. J. W. Pillsbury, passed away last year. The new organ, with the new choir, will do much to forward the interests of the church, whose courage and whose prospects, in spite of great and repeated losses by deaths, were never brighter.

NORTHBORO, MASS.—The First Congregational (Unitarian) Society of Northboro have extended an invitation to Rev. J. P. Sheafe to become their pastor; and he has the invitation under consideration.

NEEDHAM, MASS.—The First Church celebrated its one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary on Sunday, April 7. The floral decorations were beautiful, there was special music, and the congregation was large. The sermon by the pastor, Rev. Philip S. Thacher, upon “Spiritual Worship,” was inspiring. Rev. S. W. Bush, formerly a beloved pastor of this church for eighteen years, took part in the services. In the evening, after an anthem by the choir and prayer by the pastor, there was an account of the “Establishment of Public Worship in Needham in 1711, and of the Different Meeting-houses,” given by the chairman of the Parish Committee; of “The Organization of the Church” and “Sketch of the Different Ministers,” by the church secretary; “First Covenant, Original Signers, and Extracts from the Early Records,” by one of the members; “Music in our Church” (interspersed with the singing of several ancient tunes), by one of the choir; and “Church Officers, Communion, and Present Covenant,” by one of the Pastoral Committee. These were followed by an excellent address by Rev. S. W. Bush. He spoke of the debt due the forefathers, contrasted the old and the new, and urged the necessity of greater personal consecration to the church and to holy living. His earnest words made a fitting close to the day’s services, which were not only exceedingly interesting, but impressive.

OAKLAND, CAL.—Rev. C. W. Wendte’s course of Sunday evening lectures on Italy have attracted crowded congregations, and close next Sunday with “Pompeii, the City of the Dead.” Rev. Mrs. E. T. Wilkes has conducted pleasant vesper services on the alternate evenings, with appropriate musical selections by the chorus choir, male quartette, and a string quartette. The average number present at both services, morning and evening, was not less than one thousand souls. We greatly enjoyed Jenkin Lloyd Jones, who gave us an excellent sermon, read a fine lecture on Browning to our Ladies’ Society, and lectured on a rainy night to a most appreciative audience. We hope he will find his health improved by the trip, but fear his friends have been cruel in making so many appointments for him. Twenty-three addresses in ten days is more than any one man—even a Jones—ought to give. If, for various reasons, the audiences were not as large as we could have wished for him, doubtless a second visit would increase them. The Unitarian Club held its third dinner this year in our Oakland church building. The ample social rooms never proved more admirably adapted to their purpose. One hundred and five guests sat down at meat. Rev. C. W. Wendte presided; and addresses, wise and witty, were made by Profs. Joseph Le Conte, George H. Howison, Dr. Stebbins, United States Senator George C. Perkins, Rev. Messrs. E. B. Payne and George R. Dodson, Rev. Mr. Roder of the Congregational orthodox church, Hon. John P. Irish, and last and among the best Rev. Mrs. E. T. Wilkes, for her sisters present. It was one of the most brilliant meetings the club has yet held. Mr. Wendte is president of the Humane Society, a most efficient organization, with a remarkable woman, Mrs. Sarah Sanford, wife of our county treasurer, as its consecrated agent in the field. Mr. Wendte has also been elected president of the Oakland Oratorio Society, which will give “Elijah” next month, with two hundred in the chorus and an orchestra of thirty pieces. Altogether, our society is quite a power in the community; and its annual meeting, held two weeks since, showed that much good work had been done, and about $11,500 raised during the year.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.—Rev. C. W. Wendte, Pacific Coast Superintendent, has recently visited several towns in Southern California, preaching, lecturing, and conferring with the pastors and church officers. He writes:—

“The main object of my journey was to confer with the members of our society at San Diego, which has so recently suffered the loss of its beautiful structure by fire. This calamity has in no wise discouraged the earnest and united little company which upholds our cause in the city by the Silver Gate. Indeed, some were of the opinion that it might turn out to be a blessing in disguise, since it would enable them, out of the insurance money, to pay off nearly all of the heavy indebtedness which rested upon the church. To meet the interest on this has not only sapped the energies of the congregation, but compelled them, greatly against their inclination, to make urgent appeals for assistance to the denomination at large. Still, it is saddening to look at the mass of charred timbers that was once the pretty Unitarian church in this city, and then at the poor shell of a structure, unsightly and unchurchly, that for some time to come must be their religious home.

“Since the fire the society has met in the opera house, a large, splendid structure, in whose vastness an audience of two or three hundred was swallowed up. The Lewis Opera House, a variety theatre opposite, has now been rented for six months at a very low rate. The trustees will expend $200 in cleaning and brightening it. They will have entire control of it, week-days as well as Sundays. The location is admirable.

“I found Rev. Mr. Johnston busily directing a workman who was engaged in sifting the debris, in hopes to recover something of the pastor’s personal effects and literary memoranda. He bears his loss with surprising fortitude, and abates not a jot of heart or hope, preaching twice a Sunday and lecturing week-days.

“Our brethren in the ministry, and others who are minded to send me one or more books to add to the store I am collecting to replace his library, will be doing a fraternal act, or money can be sent for the same purpose.

“I preached Sunday morning to two hundred and twenty-five people. In the evening a sudden rainstorm reduced the audience to fifty. Yet we had a good time in the great auditorium, and I talked off-hand for an hour on our Unitarian aim and mission. Between the services a trustees’ meeting was held, and we canvassed the whole situation thoroughly. The society is very desirous to rebuild as soon as possible. $1,600 has already been subscribed to this end. A $4,000-dollar chapel on the old site was planned. But after full conference it was decided with great unanimity to first clear the society of all existing indebtedness, so far as this could be done with the insurance money. The Loan Fund indebtedness of $3,500 will be paid at once, and $2,500 on the $3,600 owed the Hinckley Fund in San Francisco. The balance due the latter is covered by the church lot, valued at from $1,200 to $1,500. This leaves only Rev. B. F. McDaniel’s claim of $1,400 unpaid. This debt is unsecured, but there is no disposition on the part of the trustees to ignore it. It is felt to be a debt of honor, and some hopes were expressed at the meeting to pay off a portion of it during the present year. $700 has already been paid to Mr. McDaniel on this claim. The superintendent promised to use every effort to induce the American Unitarian Association and Loan Fund trustees to aid the society in the future in any favorable scheme for rebuilding. San Diego also shows signs of recovery from its long depression. New houses are going up; and evidences are not wanting that this beautifully situated city, with its superb harbor and its exceptionally mild climate, may become once more a bustling, thriving place, the seaport of Arizona and a vast district yet to be developed.”

WILMINGTON, DEL.—At a meeting of the First Unitarian Society called for the purpose at the close of the morning service Sunday, April 7, the enclosed resolutions were passed unanimously, after a thorough and general discussion of the plans and objects of the association, to which reference is made.

“Whereas the ladies interested in the formation of a Young Women’s Christian Association in the city of Wilmington have invited us, as a Unitarian church, to co-operate with them in this good work; and whereas we have learned that, although this work is to be unsectarian and interdenominational in its purpose, yet there is a clause in the constitution of the Association which limits the executive officers to members of the so-called evangelical churches, thus not only excluding us from that function of the Association (which would be a small matter), but also giving the direct inference that Unitarians are not regarded as gospel Christians in their belief and practice,— “Therefore, be it Resolved, That, while individuals among us are perfectly free to help in this movement, nevertheless we, as a Unitarian society, must protest that, where any creedal test exists as the basis of action in religious work, we can only co-operate with other Christian denominations when they are willing to recognize us as fellow-disciples of Jesus in the fullest and highest sense. Otherwise such co-operation on our part would imply disloyalty to the conviction of our hearts that Unitarianism is the religion of Jesus.

“And be it further Resolved, That this protest shall be entered in the records of our church, and a copy of it sent to the president of the Young Women’s Christian Association.”

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.—Our Unitarian society here is the fortunate legatee of a bequest of $5,000, left it by Hon. H. K. Winchester, a former resident and member of the church. This good man also left $5,000 more to the Cottage Hospital in Santa Barbara, and $1,000 to the Free Kindergarten. This bequest will enable the society to pay off its loan from the trustees of the Unitarian Church Building Fund and all other indebtedness, and place it at once on an independent, self-supporting basis. The present pastor, Rev. E. R. Dinsmore, reports $50 raised for the San Diego society, and that on Easter Sunday the collection will go to the American Unitarian Association.

A Slight Cold, if Neglected, often Attacks the Lungs. “Brown’s Bronchial Troches” give immediate and effectual relief.

A Curious Word.—Hallstand is a curious word. It explains the fact that a visitor has usually to stand in a hall, and it itself suggests a remedy,—a Hallstand or Settle. It is hard to account for the meagre furnishing of so many Boston halls, when it is remembered that there is in Boston headquarters where may be found some of the finest hall furniture in this country, at the lowest prices at which it is ever obtainable. The house of Paine Furniture Company, 48 Canal Street, has for years made the department of Hall Furniture its great specialty.

EASTER HYMN.

BY SARAH E. BURTON.

A burst of sunlight's gentle mirth,
A mystic thrill through all the air,
Young leaf and flower awaiting birth,—
An Easter glory everywhere;
The waking earth, the conscious skies,
The tuneful sea, from shore to shore,
Tell man that every voice should rise
And hymns to glorious Life outpour.

O Life, thy highest mark is man,
Beauty and strength, courage and power,
Whose thought the universe doth scan,
Whose love is thy transcendent flower!
O endless Life! with every breath
We joy that doubts no more enthral.
As long ago One rose from death
To Life and Love, so may we all!

THE RESURRECTION AND THE LIFE.

BY REV. JOHN CUCKSON.

"I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die."—JOHN xi. 25, 26.

The simple and pathetic story of sorrow in the home at Bethany, taken from a gospel in which incident is all too rare, forms a picturesque setting for the sublime truth with which Jesus illuminates it. Mary and Martha were in the depths of grief. The light of their home had been quenched, the faithful brother of their love had been taken from them, and they were sitting in a solitude which could be felt. Mary seems to have accepted the affliction with an expressive silence which was none the less sorrowful because it was mute. She made no sign, but sat still in the house. But Martha possessed a different temperament. The events of life disturbed her more sensitive nature, and raised questions which did not seem to occur to her sister. The bereavement stung her to the quick, and she promptly sought for explanation and comfort. And, hearing that Jesus was coming, she was impatient, and could not wait his arrival, but must needs go out to meet him. She told the story of her loss; and, lamenting the misfortune of his absence when her brother was sick, she looked to him for consolation.

Jesus promptly assured her that Lazarus would rise again. But there was some ambiguity in his words which confused her. She thought he spoke of the resurrection at the last day, and the vision was too remote for comfort. But in the mind of Jesus there was no such distant dream. He sought to set over against her hopeless sense of death the present reality of eternal life, the victorious conviction of the survival of the spirit, and of his power to deepen this faith in all who believed on him.

The chief interest of the story centres in the sublime words of hope and comfort which for so many centuries have echoed over open graves, and have been the chief solace of the afflicted. Standing on a lofty and serene height of spiritual attainment, and seeing life here and hereafter as only one can see it who is so exalted, Jesus was privileged to say, with the authority of a revelation from God: "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die."

And so, while men of poetic temperament celebrate at Easter the return of spring, the uprising of perennial life in leaf and grass and flower, the resurrection of nature from the grave of winter, the devout Christian adds to the pagan festival a richer and fuller meaning, of which Paganism did not and could not know anything. He sees in Christ the vanquisher of death and the revealer of life's full dimensions. Easter is to him something vastly more than the return of spring, an event upon which he looks with delight, but in which he sees no solution of the problem of his own destiny. It is to him a spiritual festival of hope and joy, and stands associated with the sunrise and dawn of his own endless life. On this day the great primary instincts and affections, which civilization does not outgrow and barbarism cannot eclipse, hold high festival; and their voice is that which mankind most loves to hear when all other voices have lost their charm.

It was of these that Jesus spoke, and of these his transcendent nature entitled him to speak. He was the Son of man, born of earthly parents, and reared amid temporal surroundings, subject to the same laws of life and death as other men, but unlike them in the greatness of his powers and the perfection of his spiritual being. On that side of human nature where greatness is so rare and achievement so difficult, in the region where man most resembles God, he was supreme, and to this day stands far above all rivalry. He is justly recognized as the Lord of this higher life. It is this which entitles him to be called in an exceptional sense the Son of God, and which justifies the authority that mankind attaches to his character and teaching. In his person, in his life and death and resurrection, the fact was revealed, as never before, that the mind of man is forever rising, perpetually ascending, always breaking through hard circumstances, casting aside grave-clothes, refining conditions, modifying environments, and thus proving a right to live and make progress forever. Man's nature is prophetic of its destiny, and is an enigma without immortality. No living soul can be the son of God in any true and abiding sense, and not share the divine everlastingness. He who inherits in any measure the attributes of God—intelligence, volition, personality, and an undefined capacity of being—is heir of the Eternal, and cannot forfeit his heritage. As the poet Browning says,—

"They miss the truth who meditate that death,
Or that which follows after death, can change
Our native idealities. There is naught
In the unloosing of the mortal tent
To alter or transform immortal minds:
The gentle still are gentle, and the strong are ever strong."

This conviction, in one dim form or another, has found expression in the religious experience of mankind from the earliest dawn of history. It has grown with man's growth, and strengthened with his strength, and blossomed with the expansion and increase of his affectional instincts. It glimmers through the dark ages of heathenism, and shines with refulgent light through the clouds and shadows of to-day. It is not a revelation of the senses, but a truth of the soul. It springs, not from what is lowest, but from what is highest in human nature; not from what is least trustworthy, but from what is loveliest and most authoritative and reliable, and is either the surest and holiest of certainties or the most universal and horrible of illusions.

My purpose just now is to speak of this conviction of immortality in the light of Christian revelation,—to view it, not as it appeared to the world before Christ, nor as it seems to the speculative theologian of our own day, but as it looks to one who regards it as a distinctive verity of the Christian religion. It is not ours to dream of a future life as a possibility or to hope for it against hope. We do not hold the belief tentatively, timidly, as if some day we might lose it: we do not philosophize and argue as to its probability, as did Plato and Socrates and Cicero; but, as we stand beside the death-bed of dying humanity, we speak of it as the solemn faith of one who saw deeper into the meaning of life here and the mystery of life hereafter than any other teacher sent from God, and who urged it upon the suffering and the dying as the most vital of all human convictions. It is enough for us that Jesus Christ, who saw with "larger, other eyes than ours," and held closer commerce with eternal things, spoke of it with no uncertainty, but with the most emphatic assurance. He put the perpetuity of our spiritual life beyond the region of doubt or fear; and we feel that he meant what he said when he uttered those memorable words, "Because I live, ye shall live also."

But this beatific vision into which Jesus looked with such calm serenity can only be fully realized on certain express conditions. The soul lives forever; but the quantity and quality of its life, here and hereafter, depends upon the extent to which it conforms to the conditions of spiritual blessedness. Immortality is a revelation of man's ethical and spiritual being; and, while it seems impossible for him to forfeit his inalienable right, he may live much or little in the things which are imperishable. It is his privilege to appropriate and assimilate the eternal life, and so share the nature of the substance upon which he habitually feeds. He weaves his own destiny from day to day, and sonship in the future is largely what he makes it in the present. He holds his better or his worse, his blessedness or his misery, in his own hands; and no earthly circumstance, not even death itself, can avail to make the reaping other than the sowing. What the eternal life meant to the masses in Jerusalem when Jesus lived, or to the crowds in Ephesus in Saint John's day, or to the throng in Corinth when Saint Paul wrote his Epistles, that it means to the hungry and thirsty, the weary and comfortless men and women in our own day. It is indissolubly bound up with character, and there is no limit to its upward growth and no boundary to its expansion. The lofty spirit grasps it most firmly and clings to it most tenaciously. It opens advancing horizons to the growing mind, and discloses its fullest and rarest beauty only to persons of spiritual experience and culture. It is when we associate life with its physical organism and environment, and live in and for these, that the sense of decay and collapse of being weighs most heavily upon us. So that our views of the dimensions of human life will necessarily vary according to the power and extent of that part of our life in which we have most largely lived. If the spiritual in us be neglected and undeveloped; if the trusts and affections which crave immortality as their right and privilege be crushed and swamped by a mass of greeds and the grossness of material appetites and passions,—then an evangel of mud will satisfy us and this little earthly round will meet our needs; and it will seldom occur to us to think of happier regions and a heavenlier lot. Buried and absorbed in things temporal and perishable, the foregleams and intuitions which come to prophet and hero, and martyr and saint, seldom, if ever, will visit us. We are of the earth, earthy; and spiritual things are spiritually discerned. By indifference or coldness or worldliness it is possible for us to deaden, if we do not wholly forfeit, the desire for life's higher realities. Give up all commerce with religious faith; let its ideas be strangers to your minds and its principles alien to the purpose of your lives; and enthroned in your heart some prosy, sordid interest or care; wed yourself exclusively to earth's poor ambitions and fading glories; chase the fleeting shadows of outward seeming success, and never turn a reproachful look upon the leanness and poverty of your diviner being,—and you must not be surprised if, sooner or later, you lose concern for truths seen not from life's base, but only from its summit. When

"All essence, all design, is shut from mortal ken,
We bow to Nature's fate, and drop the style of men.
The summer's dust the wind wafts hither
Is not more dead to whence or whither."

Think of life as rounded by birth and the grave; conceive of it as being made up of faculties half-developed or undeveloped, of possibilities unrealized, of prophecies unfulfilled, of hopes that are shining illusions, of affections fraudulent and delusive, of moral enigmas unsolved and insoluble, of wounds unhealed and griefs unblessed,—and then it is hard to believe in immortality, and, for that matter, no less hard to believe in God.

But Jesus Christ and the world stand upon different levels, and judge of man's nature and destiny from contrasted heights. He sees them from exalted peaks, bathed all day in glowing light, and suffused even in the darkest night with an expanding rose of dawn. The worldling, never seeing very high or very far in any direction, looks at them through fog and mist and fleeting shadow, enveloped as he is by circling hills which put a narrow limit to both earth and sky. The flesh and the spirit measure life by different standards. The one says: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years. Take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." Jesus says: "Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat; neither for the body, what ye shall put on. The life is more than meat, and the body than raiment." "What is life worth," says the man of the world, "without money or rank or fame? I may be pure and good and forgiving, but without material prosperity my life is a failure." "What advantageth it," says Christ, "if a man gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Martha, fretful and troubled about many things, thinking only of her immediate loss, and touched with trembling fear, said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." Jesus answered her from heights she could not pierce, and from the serene depths of his calmer consciousness, "Thy brother shall rise again." Here are two utterly irreconcilable views. It is clear that the pilgrim of time cannot be the heir of eternity. The man whose whole life is absorbed in business, in the search and pursuit of material things, who is eaten up with sordid cares and anxieties or occupied to the exclusion of all else with a giddy and ceaseless round of self-indulgence, to whom there is nothing of solid value except wealth or ease or art or luxury, sits down contented with his small horizon. Contented, did I say,—nay, the Paganism which lives for an earthly self and deifies mere happiness has never had but one ending, either in the life of ancient Greece or modern Europe and America. The end is disillusion, disappointment, and desire for death. Its mournful chant, its confession of failure, is still heard in the song of the modern pessimist,—

"From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank, with brief thanksgiving,
Whatever gods there be
That no life lives forever,
That dead men rise up never,
That even the weariest river
Winds somewhere to the sea."

That is the end of every quest for mere earthly satisfaction, that is the goal of every restless search for the temporal,—the desire to possess outliving the desire to be, the effort of a soul to gratify its imperious needs with the husks which the swine did eat. If man be nothing but a local incident in an endless and aimless series of cosmical changes, then all our visions of the life to come are the merest air-castles. There is no hope of resurrection for decaying senses and worn-out appetites and fruitless desires. The hope of immortality is rooted in another and a more essential part of our nature. It is the flower of the affections, and springs from the need of loving and being loved. "If," says an eminent thinker, not much given to religious belief of any kind, "man stood alone, he might deem himself mortal. Why not? On account of his loneliness his moral and religious nature would be undeveloped; and it is mainly, if not solely, from the affections that we learn the doctrine of immortality." It is when we lose by death those whom life has made dear to us that our affections come to the rescue, and save us from despair. It is when the earthly about us falls away and leaves us desolate that what is heavenly supports us. The mind, thrown back upon itself, is comforted with a forecast of another and a higher state. And what is to hinder us from trusting these premonitions which cast their radiance across the gloom of life? They are either our dearest consolers or loveless conspirators. We cannot close our minds to their testimony, coming, as it does, from so many quarters,—and that not from what is most uncertain, but from the most trustworthy and reliable instincts and affections. And it is because Jesus lived so completely in the affections that he knew what was in man, and foresaw his destiny with clearness and precision. And to what a world above and beyond ourselves does he invite us on this Easter Day! He presents himself as the way, the truth, and the life. He asks us to share with him—not at some distant time and in some other place, but here and now—the life that has eternity in it. He lifts us into deathless realms, into the orbit of God, and gives to us an unbounded outlook. Life is still veiled in mystery; death is still a pain and sorrow; we walk under the cloud and through the storm, not always knowing either why they were sent or what their effect will be upon our lives; we resign our sweetest good with hearts which sometimes mock our resignation; but we never lose our hold upon the life which is life indeed. He to whom we look for counsel and comfort in extremity of need opens a vista of blessedness to every faithful suffering soul. He peoples the future with happy spirits redeemed from sin and shame and clothed in radiant light; he opens wide the door of the house with many mansions, and fortifies the bereaved and lonely soul with hopes and promises which rob death of its sting and the grave of its victory. And all this blessedness grows out of living and believing in him. Death will take many veils from our minds and hearts, it will reveal to us many things we have long wanted to know; but there is one thing it will not do and cannot do: it will work no change whatever in our moral and spiritual condition, add nothing to us and take nothing from us, but present us as we are to those we have loved and lost, and to Him who knows us, and, knowing us, loves us with a changeless love. Then

“So live that, when the mighty caravan
Which halts one night-time in the vale of death
Shall strike its white tents for the morning march,
Thou shalt mount onward to the eternal hills,
Thy foot unwearied and thy strength renewed
Like the strong eagle’s for the upward flight.”

A SONG OF LIFE.

BY CAROL NORTON.

O waking earth, thy story tell!
O bear to men thy song of joy!
Let thy full life be death's sure knell;
Spread trust and peace without alloy,
To all, who sit within the gloom,
To all, who linger by the tomb,
Shed thou upon them Life's full bloom;
Shout immortality.

O singing birds thy message bear!
O sing to all thy story sweet!
Let thy glad flights from regions fair,
Be harbingers of Love's swift feet
To all, who silent, suffer wrong;
To all, who know no Easter dawn;
Sing thou to them of endless morn;
Chant immortality.

O shining stars, shed glory bright!
O send to earth a fuller praise!
Let thy infinitude of light
Be as the notes that seraphs raise,
To hearts that bend beneath life's cross,
To hopes that suffer daily loss,
Shed thy pure rays, that know no dross,
Chant immortality.

O earth that blooms and birds that sing!
O stars that shine when all is dark!
In type and symbol thou dost bring
The Life Divine, and bid us hark,
That we may catch the chant sublime
And rising pass the bounds of time;
So shall we win the goal divine,
Our immortality.

IMMORTALITY AND ETHICS.

ETHICAL CONSEQUENCES OF THE DOCTRINE OF IMMORTALITY.

Everything that I feel to be my personality—all my thoughts, my feelings—have to remain with me, and can be altered after death only in the same gradual way as in this life. This is the strong conclusion from the knowledge of myself as a truly existing being, and of real existence as permanent. This conclusion is quite as sound and logically as strong as any other knowledge; but it is not equally obtainable by all living men, for the same reasons that many other scientific truths, well proven, are accessible only to a few. The knowledge of immortality is perhaps more difficult to obtain than the knowledge of the highest mathematics. Just as many persons are unable to realize certain mathematical ideas, so we see a great many educated persons unable to realize that they are,—that they are true beings, or, at least, that they know nothing that is more truly existent than themselves. This weakness of self-consciousness, hesitating to recognize itself as truly existing, is by no means a peculiarity of untrained minds: it can claim for itself the highest authorities in the history of philosophy. All the pantheistic and idealistic philosophers have recognized something else as more truly existing than themselves, and themselves only as an appearance of this something truly existing; and they have usually given to the one truly existing thing the name of God. We find, even to-day, especially in England and America,, many highly estimable thinkers of this class. Nevertheless, the consciousness of the true existence of human personality has grown in modern times, not only in pure philosophy, but also in legislation, politics, and religion. It would be an interesting historical investigation to show this development of human self-consciousness from the “Discours de la Méthode” of Descartes to the “Mikrokosmos” of Lotze; but I intend here merely to show what influence this knowledge of our own real existence, or of our immortality, has on conduct. Having acquired such a knowledge, and looking at it as not less certain than any other part of scientific knowledge, I may regard calmly not only the death of myself, but also the death of my nearest friends, because I know that they continue to exist, probably under better conditions than at present. This hope of better conditions is well founded on the experience that most of the present evils are caused by the imperfections and wants of our body. The greatest crimes are done for the sake of material advantages. If, now, material independence or wealth frequently appears as a condition of intellectual and moral activity, this will change at the moment of death, because we then become independent of our bodies.

Looking at death as a kind of progress, we cannot be afraid to die; and we look at this life chiefly as at a field of exercise for our intellectual and moral faculties. The differences of rank and fortune disappear or change in our eyes because we understand that these differences have only a relative importance in the short time of our life on earth, and that at any moment they may be modified by means of death. The poorest man, if he is a philosopher, may, after death, be more independent than the richest millionaire. This difference between the apparent and the real rank of men has been described by Plato in a masterly manner in many of his dialogues (e.g., Gorgias, Republic); and it is always present to the eye of the philosopher who knows that neither he nor other men cease to exist. It has a considerable influence over the attitude toward the powerful and the rich. He looks at them as at other men, and will do nothing to flatter them; nor will he keep silent if he sees that they abuse their power or their riches. The knowledge of immortality leaves us no other fear than the fear of our own injustice; and, if we are always certain that death cannot bereave us of our intellectual and moral wealth, we do not mind the danger of death in the war with oppression, injustice, and crime. It gives us a victorious self-consciousness, and we do not lose our courage if we see a momentary and apparent triumph of evil. If we know that we have eternity before us, we have no necessity to be in a hurry, and to run, regardless of others, for the attainment of our personal aims in this life. We learn to understand that it is better to do a little work to perfection than to do apparently much, but nothing soundly. The sorrows as well as the joys of this life appear less; and we take a deeper interest in the sorrows and joys of others, helping them not merely for temporal ends, but so as to promote their moral and intellectual progress.

Those who do not recognize their own eternal existence may object that, if we think always about our future life, we lose gradually every interest in this life. But for the philosopher there is no such contrast between this life and the future life. The one is the continuation of the other, and he expects to remain the same person in both parts of his existence. A careful study of the relations between himself and his body shows that the popular belief exaggerates the importance of the body in this life, and that most of the activity ascribed to the body belongs to the mind. If my mind is able, for instance, to see and hear everything without the use of the senses, then the loss of the sense organs may, after all, not be so unfortunate. The only great change occurring at the moment of death will be the interruption of our influence on our friends who remain here. Numerous witnesses deny this interruption, and claim to have communications from the dead; but, so long as they are unable to give clear indications as to the conditions under which such communications might be obtained by everybody, their claims remain trustworthy only to themselves. Still, it is important to observe that there is no scientific reason whatever to deny the possibility of such communications. That something does not occur in everybody's experience is by no means a sufficient reason for declaring it to be impossible. If we are certain of our own and other persons continuous and conscious existence after death, we cannot deny the possibility of communication with them, though we are not obliged to admit the reality of such communication if we have not satisfactory evidence as to its occurrence. The question of the possibility of our communication with the dead, if it could get a satisfactory solution, would of course show an increased influence of the doctrine of immortality on men's conduct, especially because it would give to the majority a more accessible proof of immortality than metaphysical proof. But it is not necessary to establish continuous relations between dead and living to show the full influence of theoretical knowledge about immortality on the practical conduct of men. This theoretical knowledge is much stronger than any evidence gathered from spiritualistic séances, because it does not require darkness as a condition of its production. A detailed consideration of the influence of such a knowledge on conduct would show us that, while the motives taken from ordinary experience do not always agree with the motives created by the knowledge of immortality, these latter always show a remarkable coincidence with the line of conduct that brings to us the best enjoyment in this life as well as the best training for the life to come. Every action that prepares humanity for a better state in the future secures at the same time a better life for the present. The moral law of this and the future life is the same law of love taught by the highest knowledge in the universe.—W. Lutoslawski, in International Journal of Ethics for April.

Sermon Gleanings.

A GLIMPSE OF ETERNITY.

FROM A SERMON BY IAN MACLAREN (REV. JOHN WATSON, M.A.).

If you wish to discover the source of a man's strength, you must trace his life, with its environment of words and works, beyond busy cities and mountainous plains to some secluded and unpretending spot amid the everlasting hills. The strength which comes from the secret place of God will be the inspiration of everything which he thinks and does, and everything which he hopes and suffers. No doubt, as years come and go, his life will re-enforce itself from every quarter, and will cut its channel through many rocky obstacles; but every great life is at the beginning a jet from the heart of things, and on to the eternal sea will carry the flavor of that first freshness. Some felicitous phrase in a sermon has revealed the person of the living Christ, as when an unknown monk lets the curtain drop from an ascension. The word of God is spoken to the agonized heart while wrestling through the darkness unto the breaking of the day, as if God still walked with us in a garden. Suddenly one stands in the presence of the Eternal, as if you had come out of a lighted supper-room into that awful silence under the dome of the blue sky. Or some sorrow filled the heart with tears, and made the clear atmosphere through which we saw the distant horizon where earth and heaven met. No man will ever tell you what he has seen, no man is able to explain what happened to his soul; but the vision remains in all the after years,—sometimes brighter and sometimes dimmer,—and shall not pass away till the last shadow departs, and the man knows even as he is known. . . .

We are living at the close of the century, and the last years of the century are suffering from the decrepitude and from the failings of old age. The blood of the century is running thin and cold, and the hopes of the century are few and dark. There is no great poet left us; there is no great novelist left us; there is no man now for the coming of whose new book we hunger and thirst, or which would cause us to make preparations that we might sit up all night to read it to the breaking of the day. These men are gone, and smaller men are in their places. Science herself, which had a career of such singular success and glory, is not making great advances now, but is rather gathering up the fruit of earlier discoveries. No wonder there are men who are cynical; no wonder literature is pessimistic; no wonder an able writer, who published his book and died, declared that there are no more conquests for science and literature, no more achievements for the human race. There is only one institution on the face of the earth to-day that carries the dew of her youth, and that is Christianity. I do not mean the Christianity which is engaged simply in criticism, however useful these exercises may be: there is no heart for a man there. I do not mean, either, the Christianity which is peddling away with questions as to how long a man is to work and how much he is to get; for men with spirit want to work every moment, and ask only the reward of having done their duty: there is no inspiration there. I mean the old Christianity and the first Christianity, the Christianity that centres around the person of the Son of God, the Christianity with the lifted head and the eternal sunshine upon her face. There are old men here to whom it is no matter how the century ends, for they have to do with the land where the centuries have passed away. There are some here who are past middle age, but I speak to you young men before whom life is stretching far. If you despair of the life of the race, of yourselves and the future that is stretching before you, you had better die at once. It is that which enfeebles a man, that which makes a man yield to fleshly sins. There is no future for him. Climb the mast, climb the mast, till you are out of the mists and sea fog that lie on the surface of the water: climb to the top, and you will see that marvellous spectacle of the spiritual world stretching far into the distant blue of the sea, and near at hand the sunshine on the vessel of sweet content.

I do not say that any man can remain at the top of the mast: you will have to come down again. But how differently will you come down after a glimpse of eternity! You will come down to work in the vessel that passes through many shoals, assured that the shadows may disappear; and you will see the kingdom of God in its glorious brightness where the sun is shining upon us evermore.

Literature.

These are two immensely interesting volumes, and yet one cannot help wondering if they would not have been twice as interesting if there had been half as much. That the bias of friendship should operate with the editor to make a liberal inclusion rather than a rigid exclusion her principle of selection was to be expected, and will not be sternly judged. But a more exclusive habit would have improved the book. The early letters, especially, could have been much condensed without injury, and even with clear gain. They are generally diffuse, and, although bright, not brighter than are written by many girls of the school-going age. They are mainly interesting as indicating the change that came over the spirit of Miss Dickinson's life. Like the two fabled clocks, her handwriting and her style ticked into unison. At first both were continuous. Then both became staccato, the letters of the writing at last written separately, and the thoughts coming in more explosive and eccentric spurts as time went on.

These volumes, in their best parts, are not essentially different from the two volumes of verses by which Miss Dickinson is already so well and favorably known. Reading them, we do not know her better: we only know her more. The intellectual quality is the same in either case, but in the books of poems it is more subtle and refined. There, upon the average, we have the best wool of the sheep. But there are fleeces here as long and white as any parts of her previous volumes. Some of them are in prose, and others are in verse. The criticism has been made upon her poems that they are not poetry, but prose cut up into lines of arbitrary length. The criticism is not well made. To rhyme she was evidently indifferent, but not to rhythm; and something of this—and often it is very fine—is hardly ever wanting. It is much truer that her prose ran into verse than that her verse ran into prose. There are many passages in these letters that are printed as stanzas of poetry. Some of those so printed are better than the least remarkable in the volumes of verse, some of them well up toward the best. But we have also many passages that are printed as prose which are as much verse as any of the parts printed as such. The intellectual and moral and religious characteristics are the same as those which we already knew,—the same brilliancy of phrase; the same daring criticism and approval of the highest powers; the same vivid apprehension of the wonder, beauty, mystery of nature, love, and death.

While there is nothing here to enhance the literary reputation of Miss Dickinson, there is much that helps us to a better knowledge of her personality. It is evident that she was only physically a recluse, that her affections and her sympathies were contracted to no narrow span. She had many friends, and she was always reaching out for more. Col. Higginson was the best conquest that she made, and her letters to him are among the very best. Another thing is plain: that her literary forms, however spontaneous apparently, were not so in reality. They were the result of no mere accident, but of deliberate choice. Different copies of letters, with many changes from one to another, signify that even her letters were written with an artist's hand. Words were no mere counters with her, but the coin of the realm; and she brought it to a rigid test. The outcome of her spiritual experience, in spite of sentences that state the most painful things without reserve, was a vigorous optimism. She goes in and out among the different systems, "pouncing upon her own wherever she finds it." She has heard that Theodore Parker is "poison." "Then I like poison very well," she says. But sometimes she seems as orthodox as any. This is because she could make any creed the symbol of her own thought. "When a god would ride, anything serves him for a chariot." One must attend to what she means as well as to what she says. We should like to quote, but of a hundred things that we have marked we cannot decide upon the best.

SOME MODERN PHASES OF THE DOCTRINE OF ATONEMENT, EXHIBITING ITS OBSCURE AND UNCERTAIN CHARACTER. By G. Vance Smith. London: Philip Green. Price, 1s.—Here is one of those "small books on great subjects" in which our time abounds. Inevitably, such treatises are fragmentary and not adequate to the full satisfaction of the interest which they may have aroused in the mind of the reader. Dr. Smith has constructed this little book partly upon the basis of certain chapters in his larger work, "The Bible and its Theology," issued in its revised form two years since. The first phase of the modern doctrine of the atonement to which attention is called is its vagueness and uncertainty as stated by its different expounders and defenders, which lack of essential agreement is an indication that we have here to do not with a fundamental idea of Christianity, but with a speculation of the theologians. True, there is in the New Testament a doctrine of atonement; but it is not the doctrine of the creeds. Dr. Smith devotes considerable space to showing the unsatisfactoriness of the various explanations of the doctrine of atonement which have been offered in recent times. Coming at last to the consideration of "the true atonement," it is maintained that this at-one-ment, this "true expiation of sin before the All-righteous, can only be in the sinner's return to right ways, in his penitence, his resistance of passion and self-indulgence, his seeking to undo or remedy the wrong he has done to another, his trying to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God." Thus obedience and not sacrifice is at the root of this Christian doctrine. As in the larger work, so here, there is a somewhat full consideration of the Biblical teaching upon the subject. Finally there is a statement of the late theory of Dr. Fairbairn, and attention is incidentally called to the fact that this distinguished defender of the faith devotes so little space to the discussion as to suggest a doubt as to the degree of importance which he attaches to it. Dr. Fairbairn's teaching seems to Dr. Smith to be only ditheism in a new dress. The last page is devoted to a consideration of Mr. Gladstone's treatment of the subject in the Nineteenth Century for September.

THE GREAT REFUSAL: BEING LETTERS OF A DREAMER IN GOTHAM. Edited by Paul Elmer More. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The introduction to this dainty volume is extremely matter of fact in its form, but we imagine it is quite as fictitious as the remainder of the book. Indeed, the name of the editor confesses as much, if we are not mistaken. Pronounce "More" in two syllables, and we have the Latin for "in a manner," "after a fashion." The manner of the book beyond the introduction would seem to have been suggested by Dante's "Vita Nuova," as the title was, of course, by his "Il Gran Rifiuto." The former is that of a series of poems with a prose comment. Both the prose and poetry are those of a highly cultivated person with a very genuine poetic gift. The book is one of the most interesting of those—their name is legion—betokening a certain engagement with Hindu thought. It is the more interesting because this engagement does not appear to be really serious, but an artifice adopted for its artistic value. For our joy and peace, we could wish that the author had renounced his philosophy instead of his lady; and that he did not is the condemnation of his philosophy in our eyes. But much of the book has a value quite apart from its final outcome. Some of the poems impress us as having been written without any inspiration from the central theme,—some of the best of them. "Sally Smiled" is one of these. Many of them have a peculiar form, three quatrains and a triplet following. It is an agreeable enlargement of "the sonnet's scanty plot of ground."

GOOD SENSE IN RELIGION: ELEVEN LECTURES. By Rev. Henry R. Rose. Universalist Publishing House.—Dr. Rose attempts in these lectures to answer the general question, "To what conclusions would a person come in considering the familiar and vital subjects of religion and theology if he proceed by the methods of good sense?" They fairly represent the advanced and dominant thought of the Universalist denomination. The writer has adopted the rather effective method of quoting largely from eminent clergymen of other sects, in order to support his own position. Beginning with the general topic of reason in religion, he goes on to consider "The Bible," "God," "Evolution," "Man," "Jesus Christ," "Salvation,"

"Hell," "Annihilation," "Immortality," and "Heaven," strengthening his expositions by argument and illustration. Probably, most readers who desire to know the present thought of Universalism will turn first to the chapter on "Jesus." He thinks it safe to say that the tendency of the denomination is more and more toward the humanitarian view of his personality, though wide latitude of belief is allowed in the communion. The lectures in book form will probably continue to receive the attention which they awakened when first delivered.

WAYSIDE POEMS. By Wallace Bruce, author of "Old Homestead Poems." New York: Harper & Brothers.—The author of these poems has a warm heart, abounding in quick human sympathies, and a genuine gift of singing to commend him to the popular taste. We should expect a man named Wallace Bruce to know something of the land of Burns. And, indeed, he has enjoyed a period of consular service in Edinburgh; and the subjects of several of his poems came to him out of that experience. Other subjects are American, and still others of that No-man's Land which poets hold in fee without conflicting rights. We are very sorry for the people, old or young, who can read the "Blarney Romance," without some pleasant palpitation of the heart; and there are several other poems that go to the same tune. The illustrations of the book are perhaps better for not having been made for it, but judiciously selected from a wide range in the publisher's portfolios. They are certainly a very great addition.

THE ROYAL MARINE: AN IDYL OF NARRAGANSETT PIER. By Brander Matthews. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—The "Royal Marine" of Mr. Matthews's story is "a terrapin girl,"—i.e., a Baltimorean,—the elision of whose consonants is her principal geographical distinction. The local color is extremely good. It is the color of the waves and sand at Narragansett Pier, of white duck trousers and black bathing suits and gay parasols, and under one of them Hectorina Carroll's light brown hair and pretty face. She is the Royal Marine. Why she is called so the reader easily finds out. It is a brave conceit of Mr. Matthews to make his hero dream that he has proposed to her, and then have the greatest difficulty in making out whether he has done so or not. The situation is very comical and amusing, and is worked out very nicely with the help of Miss Marlenspuyk, a delightful old maid, of whom we have a much more vivid sense than of the Royal Marine.

"'Marcella' is a novel not to be lightly passed over; it seems to us the greatest that Mrs. Ward has written, and easily the greatest written by a woman since the pen fell from George Eliot's hand."—N. Y. Independent.

"The task undertaken in producing 'Marcella' was worthy in magnitude and in interest of the hand that gave us 'Robert Elsmere' and traced 'The History of David Grieve.'"—F. MARION CRAWFORD.

"A remarkable book, but, unlike the author's earlier works, the qualities upon which the success depends are permanent. 'Marcella' has more life and more art than either of her other novels. It is not overpowered with ethical ideas, nor does the author sacrifice the heroine to the solution of social problems."—N. Y. Evangelist.

*LETTERS OF EMILY DICKINSON. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd. In two volumes. Boston: Roberts Brothers.

unprofessional students of nature to certain interesting phenomena of the seashore and of the ocean depths. The author has left untouched a great body of technical knowledge, in order to emphasize the features that may enlarge the reader's conceptions as to the methods of nature. The earth is a laboratory which accomplishes constructive work day by day, and we are allowed to study something of the causes producing changes and their results. The wonders of the deep sea, icebergs, tidal currents, harbors, and their relation to civilization, and allied topics, are treated in a most interesting and instructive manner. Prof. Shaler's ability to produce a valuable book on this subject is already well known.

THE RIGHT HONORABLE W. E. GLADSTONE. By Henry W. Lucy. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—This is called a study from life rather than a biography, but it preserves the main outlines of Mr. Gladstone's career from boyhood to the present times. This phenomenally busy life is sketched rapidly, but with vigor, and with due appreciation of telling points. Here are many effective pictures of the great statesman; and back of these we get interesting glimpses of the man himself, as he has been to those nearest him. Best of all, the writer gives us graphic descriptions of hours in which the House of Commons saw through the haze of conflict how noble were the proportions of the man who held the foremost place there for more than fifty years.

DAME PRISM: A STORY FOR GIRLS. By Margaret Harriet Matthews. New York: Frederick A. Stokes.—Miss Matthews is the author of "Dr. Gilbert's Daughters," a book not yet forgotten, although it was published several years ago, if we are not mistaken. This is the story of a bright, healthy, happy girl, determined to make the best of her life, fertile in resources, fond of fun, but aiming constantly at usefulness and solid worth. She passes through various changes of fortune; and toward the close of the book a simple, uneventful love-story develops naturally. The book is long; and the type, though of good size, is too crowded for easy reading.

IN THE LION'S MOUTH. By Eleanor C. Price. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.50.—This is the story of two English children who were obliged to spend several years in France at the time of the Revolution, and whose affection for a noble family in Mercy-le-Roy nearly brought them to the guillotine. Betty, then a girl of eighteen, was saved by the self-sacrifice of a lover, who lost his head in the effort to secure her freedom. The picture of these troubled times is quite effective. Parts of the narrative are needlessly complex, as, for instance, the device employed to account for the presence of the children in France at such a time.

A BOOK OF ELIZABETHAN LYRICS. Selected and edited by Felix E. Schelling. Boston: Ginn & Co.—The introduction to this collection of English sixteenth-century song shows how the influence of the Italian Renaissance shaped its form as well as its thought, and traces its advance in greater variety of measure and inventiveness, until the new classic influence arose with Ben Jonson. The collection is quite full, and is amply supplemented with notes and indexes.

The Magazines.

The April Century contains the usual variety of articles and stories. "Casa Braccio," the Napoleonic memoirs, "An Errant Wooing," and Harriet W. Preston's "Beyond the Adriatic" are continued. Biography has its dues in this number, since, in addition to the "Life of Napoleon," Noah Brooks contributes an article on "Lincoln's Re-election," and Molly Elliot Seawell writes in spirited fashion of Paul Jones. Science is represented by an authoritative account of Tesla's recent electrical work. Ferdinand Bol, the artist, and Bernard Stavenhagen, the musician, find consideration here; and Lyman Abbott contributes to the literature already existing on "Religious Training in the Public Schools." There are three fairly good short stories.

"A Talk over Autographs," by George Birkbeck Hill, in the April number of the Atlantic Monthly, gives reminiscences of great men as well as interesting information and gossip on the subject in question. Alice Morse Earle writes of "The Flower Lore of New England Children," and recalls various traditions of childhood, many of which are still familiar to our boys and girls. In "The Expressive Power of English Sounds" Albert H. Tolman convinces his reader, if he needed convincing, that a delicate use of sound-symbolism is one of the innermost secrets of style, besides producing an article interesting for its own sake. John Foster Kirk analyzes the play of "Macbeth." James Jay Greenough defends the study of the classics, "The Basis of our Educational System," not only on the grounds of their value as to general cultivation, memory, and as substantive knowledge, but for their direct help in training the reasoning faculty and increasing mental power. Mr. Greenough would modify methods of teaching the classics so that the definite object should be, not to teach linguistic science, but to train the mind in transferring Latin and Greek ideas into English. He believes this could be done without absorbing the time needed for other essential topics of study. C. T. Copeland contributes a delightful article on Robert Louis Stevenson.

Miscellaneous.

The Easter hymn, "A Song of Life," by Carol Norton, which appears in this number of the Register, has been set to music by Henry Lincoln Case, and is published by Luckhardt & Belder of New York. It is arranged for four solo voices and a chorus.

The Sons of Ham.

A Tale of the New South. By LOUIS PENDLETON, author of "The Wedding Garment," "In the Wire-Grass," etc. 12mo. Cloth. $1.50.

A powerful and striking novel, dealing with the social problems as seen through Southern eyes.

"The book is worth reading, not only by those who are merely interested in the story, but by the thinking reader, who will find much that will throw light upon a question that must always be one of importance, just so long as the negro is, with those in the North, 'a pet of politics,' as one of the characters in the book puts it. Whether this is so or not, there is so much that we must acknowledge as true that we are glad to have it brought before us."—Boston Times.

"We think Mr. Pendleton is a genuine novelist. He has the faculty of holding the attention of the reader, and the 'Sons of Ham' will be popular."—New Church Messenger.

"A scholarly and dispassionate consideration of the race question as it now stands in the South. It is embodied in a story; but, although the characters cannot fairly be called lay figures, they are of small consequence compared with the principles involved. . . . The book should be widely and attentively read"—Saturday Evening Gazette.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.

Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.

The third volume in the cloth-bound series of "Life" books,—"A Child of Nature," by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter,—is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its contents, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. "The graceful little volume," as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-reaching, "the message" of Mother Nature "that is ready for the human heart."

Five Services for Public Worship

WITH

SERVICES FOR SPECIAL OCCASIONS.

As stated in its Preface, "The preparation of this book was undertaken in response to a demand for some new book of worship less costly than the book entitled 'Prayer and Praise' and of somewhat different character. The 'Five Services,' here republished, have been arranged in such order that the Te Deum may be sung on the second and fourth Sundays of the month instead of the first and second; and various other changes have been made corresponding to suggestions received from ministers who desire to use them. Especially, an attempt has been made to introduce into the 'rubric' the utmost possible degree of flexibility."

The book is a 16mo, of 226 pages, is bound in cloth, and sold, at retail, for 50 cents, and 40 cents to societies introducing it and to ministers.

AN EASTER HYMN.

From winter's sleep the earth awakes
To don the robes of spring,
And all her outward fairness takes
Of what doth inly sing.

For life of God swells in her heart,
And God's fixed purpose strong,
In which each spring must have its part,
Though earth has slumbered long.

If hearts have slept the winter sleep,
With dreams of life more free,
More noble and more high and deep,—
Let dreaming cease, and—be!

Forth from the tomb as thou dost lead
Thy purpose, then confess
Thine ancient creed of thought and deed,
"Truth, Love, and Righteousness."

O God, to thee we lift our eyes,
We lift our feeble hands:
Give us to see thy right arise,
To do what it commands.

Yea, as thy glory to the year
Its matchless grace imparts,
Lord, may thy spirit entering here
Make Easter in our hearts!

A COUNTRY EASTER YEARS AGO.

BY ISABEL C. BARROWS.

When we five children were young, and the green hills of Vermont were our playground, such a thing as a church Easter was known only in books. The native-born citizens celebrated Thanksgiving with turkey and pumpkin pie, fired off crackers on the Fourth of July, and went without their dinners on Fast Day. Those were the great and sacred days of the year. In the family of the Scotch doctor alone was a green tree laden with all manner of fruits found on Christmas Day. Only about his fireside did the children assemble the last day of April, and with tissue, lace, and silver paper construct dainty "May-baskets," to be filled with early spring blossoms and hung stealthily on the neighbors' door-latch. Door-bells there were none. No Episcopal church then, nor yet, could be found in the neighborhood,—much less a Catholic; and "church days" were utterly unknown. But among the traditions brought from over the sea was an association of eggs and Easter, and, with sublime indifference to the day appointed by the Church, a private little celebration was always held.

A love of pets was another good gift brought to this new country, where among the busy farmers little time was wasted over animals or fowls that were not directly useful. So we were not a little criticised for "idling" over rabbits, guinea pigs, and Bantam chickens. But the Bantams and the one pair of Guinea fowls were watched with as great care when spring came as any farmer could give to his Brahmas or Cochin Chinas; for how could we celebrate our Easter with our own possessions but with their aid? "Mary Queen of Scots," "Queen Elizabeth," "Queen Esther," "Candace, Queen of the Ethiopians," and the rest of the royal family in the hennery were only ours to name and feed. The product of their nests belonged in the family larder. But the wee Bantam eggs and the handsome eggs of the Guinea hen were our very own, to do with as we pleased; and there was always a little basketful in time for our celebration. Indeed, I am not quite sure that we did not set our Easter by the phases of the hen-roost instead of the phases of the moon.

The night before the glad day this little basket of eggs was taken to the good mother. Oh, what a mother she was!—never too busy, never too tired, never too sad, in spite of the great sorrows that death constantly brought to her, to do what she could to add to the happiness of her children. After we were safely tucked away for the night, the eggs were boiled hard and dyed different colors, sometimes with pretty little figures from bits of calico sewed tightly round them before putting them into the water; and we always noticed with pleasure that there were more in the basket in the morning than we had put in out of our own store at night.

Breakfast and prayers over, luncheons were packed; and away we went through the quiet streets, over the bridge that spanned the noisy brook, tumbling and foaming in its spring-filled banks, up a long, gentle slope, where the young grass was already green and soft to the tread.

Here we rolled our eggs, letting them chase each other down the grassy hillside, till we tired of that fun. Then, in turn, we threw them up in the air; and it was surprising how many times they could fall on the springy turf without breaking. But, one by one, they came to grief; and, when the last was hopelessly cracked, we would eat our luncheons of bread and butter, maple sugar, ginger cookies, and hard-boiled eggs.

There was little thought of immortality in any of this sport; but there was always a long afternoon for searching the woods, the brook banks, and the meadows for signs of nature's resurrection. Following the course of the stream there were willows whose pretty catkins had blossomed out into graceful tassels, and golden coltsfoot hiding among the grasses that fringed the banks, the half-opened buds nodding to the music of the waters. In open glades hepaticas, or squirrel cups, as we called the pretty blue or pinkish-purple blossoms, were plentiful; and anemones starred the ground. Along the edges of the fields the pale straw-colored uvularias were blooming, which, owing to their familiar name, "wild oats," were always associated in those childish days, in a wondering way, with the misdoings of young men whom we heard described by our elders as sowing their wild oats.

But best of all were the pine woods, under whose sheltering branches bloomed, in profusion, the sweetest of America's wild flowers, the darling of the May, the trailing arbutus, that many a learned European botanist has longed to see, and died without the sight. Late in the fall, as we had searched the woods for beech-nuts, we had found the buds already formed. For months they had lain under the deep snow, but with the first breath of spring they had risen from their white tombs; and to our simple minds it was just as easy to believe that the three little brothers who also slept beneath the snow would some time rise again as it was to believe that the flowers would bloom after the long winter.

At last the sun would droop toward the horizon; and, creeping out between the bars, the flock would turn toward home. Suddenly a sound of quick feet (only "Bessie's" could trot so fast), and the good doctor-papa would be seen returning from his daily round, ready to pick up the three little ones and tuck them away in the ample, old-fashioned chaise, while the older girls would follow on behind. How good it was to curl the tired legs up on the comfortable seat and rest, while the most energetic of the three was allowed to hold the reins and "truly drive."

Next Sunday city churches will be gorgeous with flowers, and the breath of the lilies will rise like invisible incense; but, to our thinking then, there could have been no Easter offering so beautiful and so sweet as the wild-wood flowers that we brought home to our dear mamma. To be sure, as we tumbled them out into her motherly lap, the broken egg-shells came with them; but even they were a symbol of obedience and love, for that was always one condition of an outdoor feast,—that no relics should be left to make the woods ashamed.

It is forty years since those primitive Easter celebrations took place, but their memory is strong and sweet to-day. And because the Easter spirit grew first by faith in nature's renewed life, and home love called forth the earliest Easter offering, it has been easier every year to believe in the spirit's resurrection; and, because love never fails, it has been natural to widen the arms of affection to take in, not only the human household, but to see in the earthly love a symbol of the divine. And so Easter no longer stands for the opening of the buds and flowers after winter's death, but for an unfolding of heart and soul into an immortality of love.

MARY HARDING'S EASTER.

Hackett's Mills—three great, grim, prison-like buildings—stand on one side of a little stream. Long rows of cheap tenements cluster closely about the mills, but farther away give place to a pretty little village, with a white church steeple that clearly pierced the misty foliage of the budding elms one warm day in early April. Then the gently sloping hills across the stream were beautiful with the soft, faint coloring of the young spring.

Mary Harding, from her window in the fifth story in one of the mills, looked often across the hills. Her face was pale and severe in its expression. Her smooth, light brown hair was brushed plainly back; and her dark dress was covered by a large apron. There was not a loose end about her anywhere.

The hard look on her face did not change when she saw the beautiful hills. It seemed as if she gazed at them rather in the wish to escape some annoyance within than from any love of the springtide without.

The long, low room stretched away from her window, which was the only one from which the woods could be seen: the others were cut off from that view by tall tenements. Seventy girls were working there. Usually they were bright and chatty, but to-day most of them were dull and languid from the heat.

Now and then some whiff of sweetness from the outer world blew in at Mary's window, but it seemed to pass just beyond the other girls and die in the oily smell of the machinery. It was as if they caught a glimpse of some beautiful face that faded away before their eyes.

Marie Gautier, who did not mind the heat, laughed and hummed a little snatch of a French song as she sat over her work. She was a pretty girl, younger than most of her companions, and had fine dark eyes. A scarlet bow sat coquettishly in her glossy black hair.

Suddenly Marie gave a little cry of alarm. The laughter died out of her eyes and her voice. She bent anxiously over her work. The girls all looked up. Marie was a great favorite in the mill.

"What's the matter, Marie?" "Are you blocked?" "I wish I could help you, dear!" several said at once.

Marie did not answer. At first she had cast a pleading glance at Mary Harding, but Mary did not turn her eyes from her task: she sat before her work unmoved and implacable.

The seat next to Mary belonged to Esther Morgan, whose gentle, delicate face was full of perplexity as she looked from Marie Gautier to Mary Harding.

Marie bent closer over her work, her hands nervous and trembling; for, if she did not find the trouble soon, she would not come up to the requirements for the day, and that would be her second failure within a week. Tears gathered in her eyes, and her mouth drooped pitifully. Esther Morgan hesitated no longer, but leaned over to Mary Harding.

"Marie Gautier is blocked again," she said. "Can't you help her, Miss Harding? You are the only one who knows how."

Mary turned with an impatient frown. "I suppose I can," she said. "I don't see what we have these French girls for, they are more trouble than they are worth!"

She left her work, and bent over Marie's. The French girl, with a deep flush on her cheeks, stood humbly by.

"There!" said Mary in a minute: "it is all right. Do see if you can't keep it straight now." She marched back sullenly to her own place.

She knew she had not been kind: she knew she ought to have offered to help. If it had been any one but Marie Gautier! Marie, who, with her gayety and laughter, seemed to think the world a pleasure-ground. How could people be so careless and happy when—Mary felt the tears gathering in her eyes, and bit her lips fiercely.

When the six o'clock bell rang, Mary seized her hat and jacket, and hurried away without speaking to any one. In the hat-room the girls gathered in a clamorous group around Marie Gautier.

"It was too bad, dear!" "So mean of her, too, when she is the only one that knows what to do!" "She's getting crosser and crosser every day."

"And we're as good as she is, if some of us are French. It isn't the people, no! It's the temper sometimes."

"She's freezing to an iceberg." Esther Morgan, standing outside the group, had not spoken. Now she stepped forward suddenly.

"Girls," she cried, "that is it: she is freezing—for love! I will tell you something." She stopped a moment, and then spoke more softly. "Girls, her little sister died a year ago at Easter; and little Bel was the only one she had in the world."

The girls were silent. Marie Gautier's lips quivered as she thought of her own little black-eyed sister. A faint color rose in Esther's face, and she spoke with a soft eagerness:—

"Listen, girls! Last Easter Sunday they buried little Bel. Can't we do something? Mary Harding is so sad and lonely! See! The violets are in bloom in the woods. I know a place. Can we not go early Easter morning, and gather some and put on little Bel's grave? We can do it before church,—before Mary will go there."

She stopped, half-frightened at her boldness. Would they do that for Mary, who had been so distant, often so bitter, to them?

Marie Gautier went up to Esther, timidly. "I will go," she said, "and little Toinette, too. She shall help. And you, —you will go, too, will you not?" She turned to the others.

"Yes," they answered softly.

Meantime Mary Harding had hurried down the street to her home. As she unlocked her door and entered her little sitting-room, a burst of fragrance met her. A long window-box stood at the south window; and there, rank after rank, in their snowy whiteness, blossomed many a slender hyacinth. Mary bent over them eagerly.

"Two days," she whispered. "They will be perfect Sunday. They will cover the grave." She touched them tenderly.

Soon she took off her hat and jacket, and began to get supper. She could not eat anything, but she forced herself to drink a cup of tea. Then she washed and put away her few dishes, and sat brooding in the darkness. Last April seemed as near as to-day. She forgot the weary months between.

Once again she saw Bel's little flushed face, and heard her ask for her flowers. How eagerly they had watched them together, she and the little sister! It seemed as if the child had only waited for them; for, when the first cluster was put into her hand, she closed her eyes with a sigh of content, and fell into the placid sleep from which she never awakened.

On Easter Sunday they had taken Bel away,—had buried all that life seemed to hold for Mary. How could she bear another Easter! And to think it would come again every year all her life, and she must hear people speak of the Easter joy!

Joy! They knew nothing. There was no joy for her. There never could be again. What was it the old minister had said? He had meant to be kind.

"You are young, Mary. This sorrow will melt into tenderness. The years hold much for you yet."

"Who cares for violets in the summer-time?" she had answered bitterly. "My season of joy is past. I had only Bel, and she is gone. My name means bitterness. I shall carry it to the end."

Was it not true? What had the year held for her but loneliness and sorrow? What had she in common with the girls around her? Who in the wide world cared for her now? Who would ever miss her as she missed Bel?

The little clock on her mantel-piece struck seven. Mary rose and put on her hat. Her whole life had been one of self-control, and now she put her memories away as she would have set aside a piece of work. It was the night for prayer-meeting.

She did not want to go, but there was no sign of hesitation as she locked her door and walked resolutely down the street. Here and there an acquaintance greeted her, but no one offered to join her.

A stranger was in the pulpit. She turned her face toward him, and seemed to be listening attentively. In reality she heard nothing at first, and the words beat their way into her consciousness like sounds from a distance. The strange speaker grew more earnest. The light shone full on his high, earnest face. His voice reached her at last with a compelling force.

"What is your gift this Eastertide? You say you have no gift: the year has brought you nothing but sorrow, you are weary and heavy-laden. O friends, friends! We are selfish in our joys, we are most selfish in our griefs." He paused, and let all think of his meaning.

"You have no gold or frankincense?" he went on. "Bring the myrrh! It is because you hold your sorrow so fast that you have nothing. It seems a hard, bitter possession. Do not keep it, dear friends. Christ never meant you to keep it.

"Sorrow is God's greatest gift. It was never meant you should keep it selfishly to yourself. Bring him your griefs this Eastertide. Christ will again conquer death in your hearts, and out of sorrow will blossom joy." Mary Harding sat with a fierce tumult in her heart. It seemed as if the very props of her life had been shaken. Give up her sorrow? It was all she had. She could not,—could not!

There was the soft patter of raindrops outside. Somehow it made her think of little Bel as she had seen her tearful, pleading face sometimes. Would Bel wish her to put away her sorrow?

An old gray-haired man rose to pray. He grasped the chair in front of him, his voice rose in trembling cadences. Mary bent her head gratefully: she had been afraid people would read the struggle in her face.

When the meeting ended, one or two asked her to stay until the shower was over; but she would not. She longed to feel the cold drops on her face.

At home she lighted the lamp, and sat down to think it out. She would not think in the darkness, for then she could think only of Bel. She must be just in this. She must think it out: she must not let herself feel. It was one o'clock when she put her light out, and went to bed.

The next day Mary Harding was not in her place at the mill. She sent a note to the foreman, saying that she would be at work Monday.

Esther missed her, and planned to go around there after work. She scarcely confessed to herself how much she loved this cold, hard girl, and how the coldness and hardness pained her. Mary's heart was like some grim wall, through which Esther's slender beam of sunlight could not pierce. She must wait until a way was opened.

At noon the girls all went home. They never returned until the great mill bell called them. No one spent a moment longer than was necessary in the noisy, oily rooms.

When the bell rang, all came running up together, Marie Gautier ahead. The exercise had brought a bright color to her face; and she stopped at the top of the steep flight, glowing like a red rose in the sunlight.

"Ah!" she cried, "to go in from the sunshine,—it is too bad! Go first. I will not. It is so ugly in there."

Then, with a quick change of mood, she darted ahead, before any one could pass her, singing her favorite bit of song. As she entered the room, the song stopped suddenly. She turned to the others with a frightened face.

"Look there!" she cried.

The girls pressed forward, eager, curious, but hushed by something in her tone. At each girl's place lay a cluster of snowy hyacinths, tied with white ribbon.

"Who could?"—began one; but Esther Morgan spoke with a great gladness in her voice.

"Girls," she said, "it was Mary Harding. And this was little Bel's favorite flower."

When Mary Harding went to church Easter morning, many people remarked on her looks. She was indeed pale and heavy-eyed. No one knew what it cost her to meet the bright faces and listen to the Easter music. And she thought the scent of the flowers would make her faint.

So many, many flowers, and not one for little Bel! Why hadn't she saved a few? But no: the sacrifice must be complete. Little Bel would like it so. But where were the joy and the light?

After church she went to the cemetery. As she walked firmly along, no one would have guessed what she suffered at every step. In the time of the persecution martyrs might thus have walked to the stake.

All around her was joy and light. The delicate shadow of the tiny new leaves on the tender grass was like visible music. All nature was singing the Easter song; but always, always she saw the little bare grave without a single flower. She would have been glad of anything to turn her back, but went unflinchingly forward, hastening because she knew her heart was delaying.

She had to go up a little path and turn a sharp corner. A high hedge of box hid little Bel's grave until she had passed this corner. She turned quickly, and then stopped, her slim black figure outlined against a white marble monument. A girl was bending over the grave.

Mary felt anger flame in her cheeks. What right had any one else here,—here?

The girl rose, startled by her step; and Mary saw it was Esther Morgan.

"I—I did not think you would come so soon," Esther faltered. "I am so sorry! I will go now."

Mary looked down at the grave. It was purple with violets, and in Esther's hand was an Easter lily. Mary said not one word, but her face quivered as if drawn by pain.

"Don't, dear!" cried Esther. "Don't! I will leave you now. It was the girls at the mill who did this. Marie Gautier gathered most of all. You don't know what your flowers did for them."

Still Mary did not speak. The long-dead love within her, the yearning for affection that she had pressed down with an iron will, struggled to answer the call; but her forced control had built up a barrier that could not be broken down in a minute.

"I will leave you, dear," said Esther again; "but I want to say one word. I have wanted to love you so long, Mary; and you would not let me. Won't you let me now?"

Mary reached out her hands. The tears rolled down her face, but the hard look was gone.

"Don't go!" she cried pleadingly. "Stay with me!"

A little brown bird swung lightly on a long spray of a bush near by, singing over and over his one sweet note. Over the tiny grave at their feet the violets lay in the young green grass; and out of deep sorrow the Easter joy had blossomed.—Dorothy E. Nelson, in Youth's Companion.

THE JAPANESE DOLL FESTIVAL.

In the early part of the month of March, the children in Japan have three days devoted to the festival of dolls. The peach and cherry blossoms send their fragrance over the country at this time; and the trees are very pretty, full of their pink and white flowers. In the shop are shown dolls of all sizes and descriptions, some dressed in beautiful silks, embroidered by the best workers that can be found; while those that are not as expensive are gowned in bright cotton costumes, decorated with birds and flowers. And yet, though these dolls are bought by the hundreds at that time, the little Japanese girls are much like our own little girls here at home: they love the old dolls best.

At the time of the dolls' festival dolls that have belonged to the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother, are brought out from the places where they are so carefully treasured. These dolls are never given the children to play with except on those certain days, and our friends in Japan tell us that these heirloom dolls are the honored ones of the fête.

Every Japanese home, even the very poorest, during the festival time has one room set apart, in which the children may entertain their dolls by offering them tea in pretty little china cups and small rice cakes moulded in the shape of little fish, dragons, and other funny designs. These cakes are made specially for the occasion. After the play feast is over the children eat the cakes themselves, for they are very fond of them. The Congregationalist.

THE EASTER GOSPEL.

BY A. G. G.

It is not in a world beyond our own
Man life eternal wins;
Nor need he cross Death's silent bridge of stone
Before that life begins.

Eternity is first with man below,
E'en from his very birth;
A heaven hereafter can he only know
By making one of earth.

Christ rose by triumph over sin and wrong
When in the desert tried,
Not that third day when vainly sought the throng
His body crucified.

So when all evil dies, and base desire,
Our souls are sanctified,
Upraised, and purged by God's consuming fire;
And this is Easter-tide.

While for the rest, O man, thy faith still keep,
And know Death ends not all:
The Lord our shepherd is, and we his sheep,
Who humbly wait his call.

We wander here awhile and idly roam,
Set down on Earth's domain;
But God will bear us, when night's shadows come,
Back to his fold again.

A GHASTLY DISEASE.

Different Doctors Give It Different Names.

The Result Always the Same.—Speedy Death.—Until Recently, Considered Hopeless.—Now, New Methods. Salvation.

Nothing is more alarming than diseases of an ulcerous nature. A continual gnawing away of life-generating tissue, until a vital spot is reached, an artery is severed, or from sheer weakness death ensues.

Especially in Gastritis—ulcers of the stomach—is terrible suffering experienced. The symptoms, though not at first alarming (seemingly a slight attack of indigestion), gradually become worse, so that no nourishment can be retained on the stomach, and unless the trouble-causing ulcer produces death by perforation, the patient

Dies of Starvation.

In Consumption, where the ulcers attack the lungs, the termination is very similar, as it is, in fact, in any of the wasting diseases to which are given various names, according to the organs affected.

By the methods of physicians of to-day thousands of lives are being saved in cases that a few years ago were considered hopeless. The first step now taken to effect a cure is to make new blood and tissue, give the patient strength, and keep him "on the gain" by administering Bovinine.

Bovinine is not a medicine, but a greatly concentrated extract of the most vital elements of lean raw beef. The life-maintaining qualities of this wonderful preparation are simply marvellous. Dr. A. M. Cook, of New Castle, Pa., states that he maintained life in his wife, while suffering from gastric ulcers, for three weeks without giving her anything through the mouth, injecting Bovinine instead.

With such results as this, it is not to be wondered at that Bovinine is indorsed by physicians everywhere, and has become recognized as the greatest factor in saving life, hastening recovery from sickness, and warding off disease, ever given to man.

EASTER HYMN.

“Over the land in glory
Breaketh the Easter morn:
Nature repeateth her story,—
Life out of death new-born!
Lo, the year's at the spring,
Buds are blossoming,
Earth and heavens sing:
Life is life forever, evermore!

“Listen, the birds are singing,
Softly the south winds play;
Bells in the steeples ringing
Welcome the festal day;
And the message they bear
On the radiant air
Chides sorrow and fear:
Life is life forever, evermore!

“Skies of the spirit brighten,
Hopes like the birds return;
Hearts with the promise lighten,—
'Blessed are they that mourn.'
To each winter a spring
God will surely bring,
And the heart shall sing:
Life is life forever, evermore!”

—Rev. F. L. Hosmer.

FROM CALIFORNIA.

The churches around the bay have had their Lenten season enlivened by a visit from Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Rev. Leslie Sprague and his live church have their faith more than justified by the results in sending for Mr. Jones. Large audiences greeted him at the Second Church, San Francisco, where he gave a course of six lectures. At Golden Gate Hall a course of four reached the more general public. At the two universities, Leland Stanford and Berkeley, several hundred students listened to him with enthusiasm. This, with Sunday sermons in San Francisco, Oakland, and Berkeley, left too little time for needed rest. After speaking twenty-three times in twelve days, he left us to visit the South. He came to shame our discouragements, strengthen our hopes, enlarge and exalt our ideals, and has left us with a new desire to fulfil our Unitarianism.

The work of the churches in this neighborhood is now at its height. The winter rains, which hinder work as the cold of an Eastern winter does not, are over; and the beautiful spring weather quickens all the activities. Rev. R. H. Haweis of England has been preaching to the crowds who always rush to hear Unitarianism from orthodox pulpits. And just now our Congregationalist brethren are in doubt over the welcome to be given Rev. George D. Herron, Professor of Applied Christianity in Iowa College. His friends are many, and his welcome will be warm, in spite of the protest of the timid ones, who prefer Christianity in the abstract or to make their own application. Mr. Gunsaulus of Chicago is also expected.

The women of the churches around the bay—Oakland, Alameda, Berkeley, and San José—met with the Society for Christian Work of the First Church, San Francisco, Saturday, March 23. A luncheon and social hour were followed by interesting papers upon “Post-office Mission Work,” “City Charities,” and “Institutional Life for Children.” This is the second of these meetings, and it is hoped they may become part of our regular order. The call for help from the unemployed in these cities has been even louder than last winter. So many tramps followed the industrial army in last season's march East, we thought to be spared this winter from this demand upon our sympathies. But a new army has arisen asking aid, and two thousand two hundred and twenty-six cases of real want have been helped by the Associated Charities of San Francisco; and in Oakland, whose charities are less thoroughly organized, nearly as large a number; while private charity has been taxed to its utmost. San Francisco has put her street-cleaning in the hands of the Associated Charities Association, who have given the work to men with families. The general testimony is that the work has been better done than ever before, and hundreds of families have thus been provided for. A wood-yard has given employment to the unmarried men, where food and lodgings could be secured. Here, as elsewhere, indiscriminate giving is a great obstacle to systematic helpfulness. A call was made for help through the public schools, and the response came in tons of clothing and provisions with Californian generosity and thoughtlessness, confusing the real charity work of the city. Our hills are at their greenest now. The rose-bushes, laden with buds, are preparing for the April blooming. The golden poppy, just made the State emblem by our legislature, makes our fields and hillsides radiant with its glorious color. In these spring months in California it is indeed good to be alive.

A BAD HANDWRITING.

A Massachusetts clergyman nearly got himself into a peck of trouble because of the bad quality of his handwriting. It was more than a century ago that he had occasion to address a letter to the General Court of Massachusetts upon some subject of great interest at that time. When the letter was received, the court ordered the clerk to read it, and were filled with wrath at what appeared to be these words in opening:—

“I address you not as magistrates, but as Indian devils.”

“What!” they cried. “Read that over again. How does he address us?”

“Not as magistrates, but as Indian devils,” repeated the clerk. “That's what he says.”

The letter was passed around, and the judges were by no means pleased to see that the clerk had apparently made no mistake. Very angry at what they believed to be an insult, the judges passed a vote of censure upon the clergyman, and wrote to him demanding an apology. He came before them in person, when it turned out that where the judges had read “Indian devils” he had written “individuals,” which, of course, made an apology unnecessary; but the reverend gentleman was admonished to improve his handwriting if he wished to keep out of trouble. —Harper's Young People.

Here and There.

The smallest business house in New York City is a little tailor-shop the actual inside measurements of which are 3 feet 9 inches by 4 feet 2 inches; and there is just room for a small gas-stove and two three-legged stools. For this tiny little shop the lessees, a father and son, pay $75 per month rental and make a living besides.

Capt. Charles Gale, now a resident of Sombre, Ont., was born in old Fort Dearborn, Chicago's historic fort, in 1817, and spent several years of his boyhood there. “There was only one log store at the settlement in those days,” he says. “Sugar was 20 cents a pound; nails, 30 cents; raisins, 50 cents. And calico was 60 cents a yard. For furs they would get 20 cents for muskrat; otter, $2; bear, $1; wild-cat, 20 cents; wolf, 40 cents.”

The large transfer of cotton manufacturing from the North to the South has caused much alarm among the mill-owners of Massachusetts. A committee appointed by the Massachusetts legislature has been making investigations in North Carolina and Georgia, where most of the new mills are situated. The interesting fact has been developed that the capital for these new enterprises comes almost entirely from the North, and about one-half from Massachusetts.

The agents of the Palestine Exploration Fund are making good use of the permit granted by the Ottoman government seven months ago. In the quarterly report of the fund Dr. Bliss describes his recent important finds. He has traced for over a thousand feet the Old Jerusalem “First Wall” of Josephus. He has found a wall with towers, and beside it a paved street. At the end of a street commencing at the Damascus Gate and running due south until it strikes the newly discovered wall there is a gate. This the explorers identify with the famous gate of the Essenes, the “Old Gate” of Nehemiah.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

LINCOLN'S SIMPLICITY.

An incident that has probably never appeared in print was related by Schuyler Colfax regarding Abraham Lincoln, and is given in Bell's Altoona Gazette. It was during the dark days of 1863, on the evening of a public reception given at the White House.

A young English nobleman was just being presented to the President. Inside the door, overawed by the splendid assemblage, was an honest-faced old farmer, who shrank from the passing crowd until he and the plain-faced old lady clinging to his arm were pressed back to the wall. The President, tall, and in a measure stately in his personal appearance, looking over the heads of the assembly, said to the English nobleman, "Excuse me, my lord, there's an old friend of mine."

Passing backward to the door, Mr. Lincoln said, as he grasped the old farmer's hand: "Why, John, I'm glad to see you. I haven't seen you since you and I made rails for old Mr. — in Sangamon County in 1817. How are you?"

The old man turned to his wife with quivering lip, and, without replying to the salutation, said, "Mother, he's just the same old Abel!"

"Mr. Lincoln," he said finally, "you know we had three boys. They all enlisted in the same company. John was killed in the 'seven days' fight,' Sam was taken prisoner and starved to death, and Henry is in the hospital. We had a little money, an' I said: 'Mother, we'll go to Washington an' see him. An', while we are there, we'll go up an' see the President.'"

Mr. Lincoln's eyes grew dim, and across the rugged, homely, tender face swept the wave of sadness his friends had learned to know; and he said: "John, we all hope this miserable war will soon be over. I must see all these folks here for an hour or so, and I want to talk with you." The old lady and her husband were taken into a private room in spite of all their protests and at the end of the reception had a real visit with the president.

Charities and Reforms.

The first public kitchen for the working-classes was established in Berlin in 1866 by a German woman, Hannah Morgenstein; and the Nineteenth Century has an interesting account of the numbers which have since then been opened, and which may well serve as models to all who would work in the same direction. Each one of these kitchens has a public dining-room, comfortably warmed and furnished and supplied with the daily papers. Each one, supplying from three to four hundred people with daily meals, is managed by a local committee, the whole scheme being under control of a central council. Waste of any kind is absolutely forbidden. A subscription of $3,250 was sufficient to start the scheme. The reserve fund set aside for providing new kitchens increases each year, while the council pays fair wages and is able to pension off its old servants. For a sum varying from three to six cents the Berlin workman can obtain a satisfactory meal at any of these restaurants. A dinner for four cents allows a basin of thick, substantial German soup, a plate of vegetables, and a plate of pudding; and a roll of bread in addition costs a little over one quarter of a cent.

Personals.

MR. CROTHERS IN NEW YORK.—To those who have had the pleasure of meeting and hearing Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, recently the minister of Unity Church, St. Paul, now the minister of the First Parish, Cambridge, the announcement in Saturday's papers that he was to lecture last Sunday for Felix Adler at Carnegie Hall brought anticipations of a rare spiritual and intellectual treat. Mr. Crothers has genius, and his personality is so winsome and so unique that it is a real pleasure to listen to him. Of average height and slight in stature, the most striking thing about his person is the high, well-filled, and rounded forehead, which at once suggests power. His other features are good, if not striking; and his smooth face, youthful appearance, and quiet modesty of bearing recall some of the modern German pictures of the younger manhood of Jesus. Nobody but one who has heard Mr. Crothers out of the pulpit would suspect for a moment that this earnest, spiritual seer is also one of the brightest of our new generation of after-dinner speakers, who upon occasion bubbles over with delightful table-talk, full of happy and original epigrams. In the fresh youthfulness of his appearance, he seems at first to be a man of thirty; but, as he goes on quietly, but assuredly in his discourse, his thorough intellectual equipment and mastery of a style remarkable for its simplicity, directness, sincerity, show him to be nearer forty than thirty. His lecture last Sunday, delivered with plenty of voice and with only occasional reference to his notes, was on "Saint Francis of Assisi." It was only slightly biographical in form, and was designed to show that, notwithstanding all that the world has learned since the time of the good Saint Francis, preacher to the wayside peasants of the thirteenth century, his noble, self-sacrificing spirit was never more needed than now. Mr. Crothers held the wrapt attention of his thousand Jewish hearers throughout an hour's discourse, and we regretted very much that ignorance of his presence in the city prevented the attendance at this lecture of more than a half-dozen of the Unitarians of New York. We trust that he may soon be heard in one of our New York or Brooklyn churches, where our more famous and rising preachers from other parts of the country are now heard far too seldom for the welfare of our common cause.

Education.

The fourth summer session of the School of Applied Ethics will open in Plymouth on Monday, July 8, and continue for four weeks. There are to be four departments, —Economics, Ethics, Education, and History of Religions; and there will be about eighty lectures in all. The subjects will be treated by leaders in the different lines of thought, many of which are already announced. The complete programme will soon be ready, and will be sent to any one on application to the secretary of the school, S. Burns Weston, 1305 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Science.

The application of steam power to life-boats has been made a success in England. Instead of the ordinary screw-propeller or paddle-wheels, the power is applied by a jet of water forced out of the boat astern. One boat has disposed of the objections to it by making twenty-eight trips and saving fifty-one lives.

At a recent meeting of the Royal Society of London was exhibited an appliance for keeping up the temperature of a patient during an operation. It is called a thermogen, and is in the form of a quilted cushion with fine wires inside. It is designed to do away with blankets and hot-water bottles, as the desired degree of heat is obtained by means of electricity.

Electricity has now, it seems, beaten the record of the gold-beater, and can produce a foil of metal from five to ten times thinner than ordinary gold-leaf. Joseph Wilson Swan, the well-known chemist of electro-lighting fame, has presented to the Royal Society specimens of this wonderfully thin foil made by depositing gold on copper with the electric current, and then dissolving away the copper from it with perchloride of iron.

A French paper recently pointed out that, although asbestos was known by the ancients, who used it for crematory purposes, and although in more recent times it was spun into table-cloths, serviettes, etc., its applications were very limited until a few years ago. Twelve years back not more than four articles were made of asbestos, whereas now at least one hundred things are made from it; and the list is ever extending.—Buffalo Christian Advocate.

The Colones system of stopping holes in a ship's side has been adopted by the French navy, and is favorably regarded in official circles elsewhere. This employs a conical bag, filled with cellulose and having a metallic plate for its base. It is used as a plug from the inside, where it is properly braced. Upon absorbing a certain amount of water, the cellulose swells enormously and fills all irregularities in the opening so as to make it perfectly tight.

Diplomatic Doctrine.

There are few men who are not conscious at times of a state of feeling quite beyond expression in words.

When you try to skate upon a banana peel, or when your silk hat blows two blocks on a windy day, or when in the silent watches of the night you reflect upon the poverty and general clumsiness of your Hall Furniture, then words fail.

There is an old doctrine of the diplomats that, when words fail, you should pass to action. Why not outfit with new Hall Furniture this season? At least you can make a beginning.

Here is a Hall Stand that you can buy for much less than you expect. It costs less than the wood and trimmings would cost you if you purchased them separately and built the stand yourself.

Important Works.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.

"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert, Mr. Savage's words might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

Uplifts of Heart and Will. Religious Aspirations in Prose and Verse. By JAMES H. WEST, author of "The Complete Life," etc. Second thousand, with additions. 106 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"Full of a happy sense of Nature's beauty and bounty. One unceasing aspiration towards the 'Moral Ideal,' the 'Blessed Best.'"—William C. Gannett, in Unity.

"One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression. Mr. West is a devout and earnest religious writer."—Boston Herald.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troubled, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"'Afterglow,' like Gannett's 'Wrestling and Blessing,' is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

Pleasantries.

Jack: "Yes, poor John may have had his faults; but his heart was on the right side." Wagge: "Is it possible? No wonder he died."—Yale Record.

"Mamma, is it true that they wear snowshoes in Alaska?" "Certainly, Teddie." "Don't they melt when they go in the house?"—Harper's Young People.

"Papa," said a boy, "I know what makes folks laugh in their sleeves." "Well, my son, what makes them?" "Cause that's where their funny bone is."

Streeter: "There goes a man that has left a great many behind him in the race of life." Meeter: "Who is he?" Streeter: "He's a street-car conductor."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

"We don't want bear stories," said the editor. "Our readers demand something spicy." "Well," said the man with the manuscript, "this story is about a cinnamon bear."—Pearson's.

"Yes," remarked Mrs. Malaprop, "it was a great sight. First came the king, carrying a sceptic in his hand and wearing a beautiful red mantle all trimmed with vermin. It was a grand sight."—Truth.

George Augustus Sala, when in this country, remarked sweetly: "Two things I abominate in America,—the pie and the American child. Not until the child has been made into the pie will I tolerate either!"

A little girl heard that people were made of the dust, and, after watching heaps and columns of it eddying about the street, exclaimed: "O mamma! I just thought there was going to be another little girl!"—Transcript.

An extempore preacher intended to end his peroration with a slow ejaculation of "a mess of pottage." He did end with, "A pot of messages—a message of pots—a pottage of messes," then, giving it up, hastily retired.—Organizer.

"Oh, my friends, there are some spectacles that a person never forgets," said a lecturer after a graphic description of a terrible accident. "I'd like to know where they sell 'em," remarked an old lady in the audience.—The Methodist.

Editor: "What qualifications have you for this position? What do you know?" Applicant: "I know what I ought to find out, and that is all I ought to know; for, when I know what is necessary to be known, I know all that is necessary to know." Editor (bewildered): "Leave your address."—Brooklyn Life.

Sympathetic Old Lady: "Will you please tell me if the lady in who writes the 'Mother's Column' in your paper every week? I want to tell her how much pleasure I had in perusing her articles on 'The Baby in the Cradle.'" Office Boy: "He's yonder, ma'am. That's him who is standing there with a pink shirt on and smoking his pipe."—La Semana Comica.

An old man went into a life insurance office and asked to be insured. The company asked his age. His reply was ninety-four. "Why, my good man, we cannot insure you," said the company. "Why not?" he demanded. "Why, you are ninety-four years old." "What of that?" the old man cried. "Look at statistics, and they will tell you that fewer men die at ninety-four than at any other age."—London Spare Moments.

The Mrs. Partingtons are not all dead yet. The last one is a devout Episcopalian. The church which she attends was lately embellished with a large and handsome stained-glass window, a copy of Doré's picture of Christ leaving the Prætorium. Of a member of the church who had been absent for a time this lady inquired: "Have you seen the new window? Isn't it beautiful? It represents Christ leaving the Petreum, you know, by Doré!"—The Outlook.

THE BACON OIPHERS.

The Pall Mall Budget reports a remarkable literary discovery by "an advanced Baconian." The writer proves conclusively (cryptographically speaking) that Bacon, the great originator of all the English literature of his age, was also the author of "Box and Cox." This he sets forth evidently from the back of the first edition, where the name of the play is printed

COX

These columns, read from top to bottom, give BACON OXDX. Here the author not only actually signed his name, but gave the date also; for, taking out the letters that have a numerical value, we have "CXDX," which, added, give 620. This stands for 1620, the date of the "Novum Organum," and without doubt of "Box and Cox" also. The Outlook.

Editorial.

THREEScore and ten is the age of the American Unitarian Association on its coming anniversary in May. Whether its seventy-first year and subsequent ones shall be years of "labor and sorrow" or of labor and joy, as one of our ministers aptly said in making his appeal a Sunday or two ago, will depend upon whether the churches do their duty in contributing in this and the following years to the Association treasury. It is especially important that, when the record is made up for this seventieth year, three things shall be unmistakably shown, — first, that the list of contributing churches is longer than ever before; second, that the total amount received from the churches is larger than in previous years; and, third, that no society which by a contribution in two previous consecutive years has thereby acquired membership in the Association has lost it by a failure to contribute to it this year. But, to reach these three important results, there must be great diligence among the churches for the next ten days, when the record must be made up. Let this record be one that Unitarians may be proud of.

IN this year of straitened resources it should be counted as a real disgrace to a Unitarian church if it fails to make a contribution toward the support of our missionary work. Friendship in time of need is the only friendship that counts for much in the long run. It is the aggregate of comparatively small gifts that makes the largest footing. Nothing could be more fatal to our general work than the feeling spread abroad among our smaller churches that, because each one can furnish only a little portion of the sum required, therefore its contribution will not be missed. A dozen of such failures may be much more serious than the defection of a big city church. If your minister has not given notice of a collection, suggest to him in a very pointed manner that this is a matter which has to be attended to immediately. But, in exhorting the small churches not to neglect their contributions, we do not mean to excuse the larger churches from equal diligence and earnestness. The fact is that all our churches, large and small, must do their best this year to support the Association if our missionary interests are not to suffer serious loss.

THE Christian Register believes in fair discussion. We therefore wrote to ex-Gov. Long, as one who conducted the hearing on behalf of child life insurance, inviting him to reply to our editorial article, if he wished to do so. His answer we publish on another page. We cannot, nor do we think it necessary, just on the eve of going to press, to present additional arguments and testimony in favor of the bill limiting child life insurance. We can, however, assure Gov. Long that the Christian Register was represented at the hearing; and the arguments of counsel on both sides, including the able and extended argument of ex-Gov. Long, were heard. It was after carefully weighing these facts and arguments on both sides that the conclusions expressed in the editorial were reached. The fact that, in spite of the able plea in behalf of the insurance interests, the legislative committee reported seven to four in favor of the petitioners, shows that this legislative court sustained our position. One error, however, in the governor's statement it may be well to correct here. Our recollections and notes of the hearing show that Mr. Read, the counsel for the petitioners, did not rest the case upon the claim of child murder, but, on the contrary, all through the hearing repeatedly stated that he rested it on the evils produced by the starvation and neglect of living children.

WE stated in our previous article that good men are arrayed on both sides of this question. As ex-Gov. Long has named physicians and clergymen who uphold and approve of the methods he defends, perhaps, in justice to our position, we may refer to the eminent cloud of witnesses by which it is supported. Over against ex-Gov. Long we may set ex-Gov. Brackett; representing the bench, Judge R. E. Harmon, Judge Hiram P. Harriman; among lawyers, Mr. Richard H. Dana, Charles F. Donnelly, — representing the State Board of Lunacy and Charity, — F. W. Kittredge, J. G. Thorp, Jr., Joseph Bennett; of prominent citizens, Col. T. W. Higginson, Hon. Stephen Salisbury, Joshua M. Sears, Willard T. Sears, Edward Atkinson, J. W. Coveney, — postmaster of Boston, — Mrs. H. M. Plunkett of Pittsfield, Mrs. Louisa P. Hopkins; of physicians, Dr. H. P. Walcott, chairman of the State Board of Health; S. W. Abbott, secretary of State Board of Health; Dr. W. F. Wesselhoeft; W. P. Wesselhoeft; Dr. James B. Bell; Dr. I. T. Talbot, dean of Boston University; Dr. Olin M. Draper of Massachusetts General Hospital; Dr. Francis A. Harris, Medical Examiner of Suffolk County; Dr. J. Heber Smith; Dr. Walter Wesselhoeft of Cambridge; Dr. E. C. Briggs; among clergymen, Rev. M. J. Savage, Rev. Philip S. Moxom, Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge, Rev. Alexander McKenzie, Rev. A. A. Miner, Rev. Frederick B. Allen, Rev. D. N. Beach, Vicar-General Byrne, and eight Catholic priests from different parts of Boston, Father Mundy of Cambridgeport, Father T. J. Conaty of Worcester, Rev. Everett D. Burr; Prof. G. Stanley Hall of Clark University; and missionaries and philanthropists in large number.

AN important measure is now before the legislature in Massachusetts. It is the application of the indeterminate sentence to the State's prison. Under the bill, as proposed, instead of being sentenced for a definite period, a maximum and minimum period will be prescribed by the court; and between these boundaries release will depend upon the record the prisoner makes for himself. This will compel a grading and marking system at Charlestown, which will in itself establish a better classification of prisoners and greatly aid in prison discipline. The indeterminate sentence has already been applied to the Concord Reformatory. It is a measure which has been applied to the Elmira Reformatory of New York for a dozen years with much success. It has repeatedly received the indorsement of the National Prison Congress. The plan, as proposed in this bill, is but a limited and cautious application of the principle; but it is a perfectly safe one. As nothing could be worse than the present system of administering sentences, nothing more illogical, unjust, and ineffective, there is nothing to lose, but everything to gain, by the change.

THE situation in Sweden and Norway is at present very critical, and the war cloud seems to hang over the Scandinavian Peninsula. The two countries are closely allied in history, religion, language, and interest. But for many years there has been jealousy between them. The conditions of liberty are equally enjoyed in both countries. Norway has its own parliament, and enjoys every privilege of home rule. Indeed, the present complication does not arise from any question of home rule, but rather from jealousy and disagreement concerning the foreign service. As Norway and Sweden are joined in one kingdom, their foreign consulates represent both countries; and, as a matter of fact, there are as many Norwegians as Swedes, if not more, in the consular service. The Norwegian opposition claim, however, that the consuls endeavor to promote the commerce of Sweden rather than that of Norway, and ask that they may have a separate consular representation. The answer is that they are sufficiently represented now by their own countrymen, and that, if they were allowed to have separate consulates, they would also want separate diplomatic representatives, in which case foreign relations would be complicated, and there would be two powers to deal with instead of one. Under the existing union each country is pledged to assist the other in case of war; but, if each country had separate foreign representatives, the hazards of war might be increased. Though the excitement at present is great, the political majority against the king in Norway is not large, numbering only a plurality of five votes, the figures standing 59 to 54. In the event of war, Sweden has a much larger army and a much greater fleet; but, if Russia were to aid Norway, the complication would be very serious. Let us hope, however, that we shall not have the spectacle and horrors of war between the Scandinavian nations. They have little to gain, but much to lose by separation.

WHILE it is undoubtedly true that agnosticism has chilled the hope of immortality in certain minds, it is also true that barriers to its joyful acceptance have been broken down in other directions. This is especially true within Christianity itself, and the Boston Herald has good ground for saying: "Nothing has so distinctly marked our generation as the widening of the hope of immortality. Our fathers were worried to death over the belief that some were elected to be saved and some were elected to be damned. Their great difficulty was that they were not sure of their own salvation. To the present generation Christianity is a religion of hope; and, whatever may be the sins which burden the lives of men and women, and obscure their faith in the future life, Easter always brings to them a certain hopefulness; and they share in the joys of the risen Lord."

THE writer further shows that life more abundantly is seen in the whole range of human relations: "It seems as if the whole compass of human life were richer than it used to be,—home more sacred, the relations of parents and children more intimate and helpful, and the ties of friendship and the bonds of love between individuals grown to a larger meaning. Society is still in bondage to the law, but the motives which control people are more and more the higher motives of life. Even the criminal, who was once regarded as a lost soul, is now looked upon as one who can be restored to society. Sin is no less hateful than it used to be, but the sinner is regarded as a more hopeful member of society; and the arrangements of life, on their ethical side, are so modified by the sense of the love of God that it seems as if the larger hope were extended to the whole human race."

DR. MARTINEAU'S BIRTHDAY.

AN INVITATION TO OUR READERS.

On April 21, 1805, was born one of the greatest thinkers and writers of this century, Dr. James Martineau. It is a remarkable personal event when any man reaches his ninetieth birthday with his eye undimmed and his natural force unabated, but in the case of Dr. Martineau we may add gratitude and admiration to our wonder. He has lived in the highest altitudes of thought and life, in contemplation of the grandest themes which may engage the human mind. But he has not lived apart from the thought and life of his time. From these mountain peaks of contemplation have flowed streams of thought, sentiment, to irrigate and freshen the plains of life below. No one has done more than he to vanquish materialism with the weapons of a spiritual philosophy. He has interpreted the supreme sanction of ethics, and kindled and fed the devotional life with the flame and fuel of his own piety.

Though Dr. Martineau belongs especially to the Unitarian household of faith, the service he has rendered to spiritual Christianity is shared by the whole Christian world.

Our next number will largely be devoted to a recognition of the life and teachings of this philosopher, scholar, and saint; and we cordially invite our friends and readers, lay or clerical, without regard to their denominational connections, to send us their messages of greeting to Dr. Martineau. We may not be able to print more than a small portion of those we receive; but these greetings will be acknowledged, and the autograph letters will all be forwarded to Dr. Martineau. Let the home, as well as the study, the pulpit, and the class-room, be represented in these birthday greetings; and let them be forwarded as promptly as possible.

Readers on the Pacific Coast and the Far West will not be deterred, we hope, by time or distance from sending their message. The autographs will not be forwarded until we have had time to hear from all the parts of the country.

THE ETHIOS OF CREED AND RITUAL.

With the pastoral letter of the Episcopalian bishops freshly in their minds, a great many people would find Hon. Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief" a very interesting book. To the bishops themselves it might be particularly commended. They insist with cumulative emphasis that the creeds and formularies of the Church have one meaning, and only one; and that that is the meaning which they had when they were first composed. It might possibly be objected that this time would be difficult, if not impossible, to fix in the case of two out of three of their great creeds,—the Apostles' and the Athanasian; but no matter for that now. This original historical meaning, insist the bishops, is the only meaning which the ministers and adherents of their churches can be allowed to put upon the creeds and formularies.

Now, in Mr. Balfour's book there is no more interesting chapter than the one which criticises this position of the pastoral letter. It was not, of course, written as a criticism upon that. It was written, probably, long in advance of it; but, if it had been written as a conscious and deliberate review of it, it could not have been more pertinent. Mr. Balfour contends with much force of argument and illustration that creeds and formularies cannot have the same meaning to different persons, even in the time of their original appearance. Their meaning would be affected by the personality of the believer, by the degree of his intelligence, by the belief already in his mind. This seems very reasonable; and equally, if not more so, Mr. Balfour's further contention that, with the lapse of time, the possibility of men's believing creeds and formularies exactly in their original sense grows ever less and less. Times change, and the manners of thought with them. It is very difficult to enter into the conceptions of a time centuries remote from our own.

If these things are so, the bishops are requiring an impossibility of the clergymen whose consciences they have in charge; and, so far as we have come, we shall agree with Mr. Balfour much more cordially than with them. So far as the difference between them is an intellectual difference, he has our complete assent. But there is a moral difference between them which compels our sympathies to take another course. The natural corollary of Mr. Balfour's proposition would seem to be "Good-by to creeds and formularies." But he has not so learned the policy of an English Churchman who is already opposition leader in the House of Commons, and is confidently looking forward to his promotion to the premiership at no distant day. Creeds and formularies must not be taken too seriously, he tells us; but they cannot be dispensed with altogether. There must be unity of confession, but there need not be identity of belief. The identical confession need only mean, as a sympathetic critic has written, "a dim consciousness that there is something beyond the reach of definition, which, however, it is both necessary and wise to reduce to some definitive formula, however imperfect it may be."

There is nothing new in this. We have had something of the same sort from Prof. Jowett; from Thomas Hill Green; from Dr. E. A. Abbott, in his "Kernel and the Husk"; and in Matthew Arnold's idea that theological phrases are only "words thrown out at a mystery," and must not be thought to express it logically. Indeed, this sort of talk is getting frightfully common.

Compared with this way of thinking, that of the bishops is incomparably better. If creeds and formularies are to be retained, and made the objects of common reverence, and used in the habitual forms of worship, the bishops are right in their insistence that they should mean (if possible) exactly what they meant for those who first gave them utterance with passionate sincerity. If they cannot mean exactly what they meant for their original framers, they should mean as near to that as possible. But, if their meaning is as loose and vague as Mr. Balfour thinks, the honest, manly course would seem to be to cease wholly from the pretext of believing them, and to relegate them from the sphere of religious worship and subscription to that of historical documents,—mémoires pour servir. Liberality is good, but it may be purchased at too dear a rate. Sincerity and honesty are too much to pay for it. The best answer to Mr. Balfour's doubtful invitation was written long before his day. It will be found in Carlyle's Life of Sterling: "Go to perdition, if thou must. But with a lie in thy mouth? By the eternal Maker, No!"

PARKS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Among the many reforms that are to a greater or less degree agitating the world is that of giving more breathing-room to the dwellers in cities. This subject appeals with special insistence at this time of the year, when the trees are budding and the grass is sloughing off its winter brown and appearing in emerald green. Those who live in the country can watch this delightful transformation day by day, but the dwellers in the crowded cities have little chance to see the beauty of the oncoming spring. The most that can be done for them is to provide parks where on a Sunday or a holiday they can get an occasional glimpse into nature's workshop.

One would suppose there would be an abundance of such open spaces and parks in the United States, where land is plenty and towns are comparatively new, but the contrary is the fact. The figures with reference to Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York, are fairly depressing, so little breathing-room is there in proportion to the population. There is hardly a city of any considerable size in Europe that has not much more park space than these American cities. To be sure, New York has its Central Park; but it might almost as well be in the moon, so far as the crowded tenements of the East Side are concerned. Philadelphia and Chicago have also fine parks, but they are too far away for the poorest people; and the time and money that must be spent in reaching them cut off their pleasures from multitudes.

Until within a few years Boston was also ill provided with places for recreation and outdoor exercise. The establishment of the park system, which promises to supply delightful breathing-places for unborn millions, is one of the greatest boons ever conferred on the city. A well-chosen Park Commission has the matter of the extension of these parks in hand, and more than six thousand acres have been secured in the so-called metropolitan district. This is divided into four sections,—one of the heights known as the Blue Hills; another, including the Middlesex Fells; a third, the picturesque region of Stony Brook; and the fourth, a narrow bit of beauty of fifty-nine acres along the charming shores of Beaver Brook, with the magnificent oaks which are said to be the finest in New England. It is suggested that a cheap buckboard service shall be introduced in these wild, sylvan parks, where nature has been left comparatively undisturbed; and, if this shall be done, these six thousand acres will afford untold delight to thousands all the year.

With great wisdom, as well as true appreciation of the possibilities of nature, the commissioners have contented themselves with cutting only as many paths as were necessary to prevent danger from forest fires. They have felled no trees of any value, but have let in air and sunshine to such as were struggling against adversity; and they have secured protection for the wild life within those limits. Let alone, nature will, in the course of time, repair damages; and before many years there will be secluded spots where one can go and sit in quiet, and listen to the wild bird's song.

It is greatly to be hoped that public enterprise and private generosity will soon make possible another greatly to be desired improvement,—the construction of a dam across the Charles River. The advantages of this have been well set forth in the admirable report of the Park Commissioners, a report which abounds not only in sagacious advice and scientific facts, but has so many charming photographs that the denizens of Boston and vicinity may well take pride in it. Should this dam be constructed, Boston would almost rival the beautiful city of Stockholm, and other European cities, where so much use is made of water fronts in the way of pleasure and recreation. In summer boats would swarm on the placid sheet of the Charles, and in winter there would be such a chance for skating as has never been known in this part of the world. As the commissioners truly say, "In no other way could so much healthy enjoyment through so many months in the year be afforded, at an equal expense, to the same number of persons within the metropolitan district; while the increased beauty due to this great water park could hardly fail to add greatly to the value of all adjacent property for purposes of residence."

The moral side of park extension can hardly be overrated. Men and women must have recreation; and, the sweeter and purer that recreation is, the better the effect on their characters. And there is no recreation equal to that afforded by outdoor life. Money spent in open spaces, parks, skating ponds, playgrounds, and forest walks means less money to be expended for criminal courts, lockups, and jails. Temperance workers, especially, should try to secure parks and recreation places, not only in every city, but in every village of the land. Rational recreation is a great safeguard against intemperance and crime.

MR. MOZOOMDAR'S WORK.

Some weeks ago we published a report taken from the Interpreter, Mr. Mozoomdar's monthly paper, giving an account of his tour in Upper India written by a companion. Mr. Mozoomdar has a horror of self-reporting; and his work, which is radiant and atmospheric, cannot be reduced to statistics, any more than a barometer or a thermometer can register the best influence of sun and atmosphere, which later may be revealed in blooming flowers and ripened fruit. Nevertheless, this fruitage is not produced without a vast expenditure of strength, whether it be in the exhalation of thought and feeling, the productions of the pen, the delivery of sermons and addresses, or the travelling over vast spaces to meet engagements. In a private letter received recently from Mr. Mozoomdar he says:—

I do meditate a good deal; but still last year I found time to travel about 3,500 miles in all directions of the country, and to hold about 150 divine services, delivering a sermon at each, and gave about 50 lectures to audiences ranging from 70 to 1,700 people. Then nearly the whole of the Interpreter is written by me, single-handed, each month, besides a heavy correspondence with many of the Brahmo-Somaj in all parts of the country.

Years ago I founded a society called the "Society for the Higher Training of Young Men," which is now taken in hand by the government, and is in a most flourishing condition. Here I give occasional lectures to the graduates and undergraduates of our university, crowds coming to hear me. Over and above all this, I sometimes preside at public meetings and semi-private meetings in my own house, to promote good feeling and co-operation among different sections of the Brahmo-Somaj.

A new feature of my present year's work will be the printing of every Bengali sermon I give weekly. I shall send you a package by and by.

This is a record of activity of which even a Western circuit rider might be proud. To maintain it needs not only time and strength, but expenditures of money. By printing and circulating Mr. Mozoomdar's sermons, his message will have a far-reaching effect. We hope that contributions for sustaining a work to which he is divinely called may not be lacking.

PLEASANTRIES.

Somebody has said that there is no strain on friendship like a difference of taste in jokes; and, surely, incompatibility of temper may reveal itself in this way more definitely than in some things commonly supposed more important. Our friend may like olives or not, as he chooses; he may prefer Italian or German opera, at will; he may have his own opinion about "Trilby"; but, if he cannot smile when we bring to his notice a new and irreproachable witticism, then he is none of ours. And the resentment we feel is as undoubted as it is indefensible. Perhaps it is because he thus seems to put himself on a plane of superiority indicated by none of his other tastes, and he throws us back suddenly to a conviction of our own foolishness. About olives or the opera or "Trilby" there is room for discussion, but you cannot argue over a joke. Either it is funny or it is not; and the disagreeable shock one receives when he finds himself laughing alone justifies a coolness of affection, for the time being at least.

There is room in this many-sided life of ours for pure fun that seems as unrelated to the serious matters of our ordinary interests as do the white foam-drops on the crest of a wave to the dark, unstirred depths of water far beneath. There is room even for rollicking exaggeration and nonsense, but he who is born without a sense for it can no more be instructed in its various degrees than can a poet be made by presenting a man with a book on versification. The distinctive fooling of "Alice in Wonderland" makes it a book for philosophers rather than for children, but neither child nor philosopher has ever been initiated into its inner circles by argument. A sense of humor is the correcting grace of many a mind that would be cold and austere without it; and, if it could be more general even than it is, how it would protect us from some of the sentimental novels and the shoals of sentimental verse that we are asked to take seriously!

There is one thing more dreary, however, than finding a delicious story fall heavy on unappreciative ears; and that is to be asked in turn to laugh when, with the best will in the world, you can see nothing to laugh at. Few are those who have not stood in each position, and who do not know by double experience how elusive and refractory is one's willingness to be amused. Alas for the jokes that are meant to be funny and are not! Alas for those with a sting which wounds and irritates! One who responds readily to an unexpected turn of a sentence or to a brilliant flight of absurdity may yet be as sensitively averse to the wrong kind of a joke as one who considers all nonsense alike flippant and unworthy. The marvel is that so many people who follow high ideals of purpose, who insist that our libraries should contain only decent books, who would have the startling theatrical posters banished from our city, who would not allow a coarse word spoken before their little ones, can yet laugh indulgently over an indelicate suggestion or a bit of actual irreverence when it is used as seasoning for a poor little joke, that would otherwise have nothing whatever to recommend it. Pity it is that so much of our current newspaper paragraphing is of this character, that our children laugh at it, and that we ourselves grow hardened and indifferent. Comedy is often the reverse side of tragedy. That depends wholly on the point of view. Falstaff was infinitely amusing to Prince Hal, but not amusing at all to King Henry. The jesting of Carlini moved all Naples with merriment, while he himself was under the care of a physician for his melancholy. Speaking more broadly, one may say that in no way is character more unerringly revealed than by an examination of the things found amusing; and this is true of a nation or of an individual, so that we must, like Lord Chesterfield, beware of betraying ourselves. There is nothing in the opera of "Faust" more significant than the suppressed laughter of Mephistopheles as Marguerite stands by her open window. Mohammed declared that he who can enjoy making others ridiculous will find the gates of Paradise forever opening before him only to be closed as he tries to enter, and we close for ourselves the way to real delight every time that we condescend to take pleasure in things unworthy of us.

Musings.

A REVERENT Irishman, who, after viewing the Catholic cathedral in New York on the outside for the first time, passed within, said, "Bedad, it's larger on the inside than it is on the outside!" The same effect is sometimes produced in a work of musical architecture. The auditor who simply hears it for the first time stands, as it were, on the outside: the player or the singer passes within. He becomes familiar with its interior structure, he perceives effects and relationships which cannot be perceived by an external view. I have sometimes thought that in the rendering of every new composition there ought to be two musical criticisms,—one from a critic in the audience, the other from some critic in orchestra or chorus. The critic in the audience, unless he has thoroughly studied the piece in the score, will give an external view. The critic in orchestra or chorus will give an internal view. The music has passed through him. He must absorb it in some degree before he can give it forth. It must, indeed, become part of his experience. I suspect that this is often the reason that a musical composition, when rendered for the first time in public, is more interesting to the performers and singers than it may be to the audience. Repeated rehearsals have familiarized singers or players. They have studied its light and shade; they are familiar with its motives; they can see them at the start, appearing prophetically in introduction or overture, and blossoming or expanding and entwining on the trellis of the score. They know what effects to look for, because they know what effects they must seek to produce. And this is the reason, I suppose, why it takes some time to educate an audience to the appreciation of certain compositions. Thus I have seen an audience receive a Brahms symphony with the utmost indifference or with positive ennui, when the musicians were enthusiastic; and we all know Wagner's struggle for recognition, and the criticism and the hissing that greeted works which are now received with enthusiasm by popular audiences. There are, indeed, musical compositions which secure recognition and applause from the first. But they are generally apt to be of the lighter sort, and the audience has been educated to some appreciation of the style of the composer. But, the more complex the structure, and the more individuality is put into its composition, the more difficult it is of appreciation at the first hearing.

So I was glad to note, on the first performance of Mr. J. C. D. Parker's work, "The Life of Man," composed for and rendered by the Handel and Haydn Society on Easter Sunday night, that the chorus had become well possessed of the music, and sang it with an interest and enthusiasm which showed that it had taken hold of them. Indeed, one of the chorus said to me that he could hardly wait to sing it. I heard many other expressions of personal interest and satisfaction from the singers, which were ratified by the earnestness, power, precision, and sympathy with which they sang. I was sorry that the audience did not generally know that Mr. Parker was present, and that the chorus did not insist on calling him out; but perhaps their best evidence of respect for the composer was the way in which they sang his tuneful and inspiring music.

Brevities.

There is a science of God and a science of man, the last included in the first; but man is not the real God of science, and science cannot be the real God of man.

The Basis is the title of a new weekly, a journal of citizenship, edited by Albion Tourgee, and published at Buffalo by the Citizen Publishing Company. Under Judge Tourgee's editorship the Basis is sure to be bright and strong, and to stand for equal rights, personal security, and good government.

The Evening Post says, "Rev. Dr. William H. Furness, who eighty-three years ago witnessed the launching of the United States frigate "Constitution," one of the first war vessels built for the United States Navy for the War of 1812, was an interesting figure at the launching of the "St. Paul" at Philadelphia."

Attention is called to the important appeal of Secretary Batchelor in another column. Not only is the fact of its being the seventieth year of the American Unitarian Association a reason for general and generous giving, but, in addition, the action at Saratoga forcibly calls for a thank-offering from every one of our churches.

We extend the warmest congratulations to King's Chapel, Boston, upon calling Rev. Howard N. Brown to its time-honored pulpit; and we shall congratulate it still more if Mr. Brown accepts. We dare not say a word to influence his choice in this matter, lest the avenging angels from Brookline disturb our slumbers. But we do say, with certainty of warm applause from that beautiful town, that, should Mr. Brown accept the call, King's Chapel will have secured one of the most thoughtful, reverent, broad-minded, sound-hearted, and effective preachers in the whole Unitarian body. And it is equally certain that he will find a field of usefulness and influence in King's Chapel whose great opportunities cannot easily be computed.

A member of the Illinois Legislature has introduced a bill proposing a tax upon bachelors for the benefit of "old maids." The bill is thus summarized by a contemporary. It proposes "an annual tax of $25 on all 'male persons of the age of thirty-two and over, being of sound mind and limb, who are single and never have been married.' The tax is to be continued until the 'male persons' have reached the age of sixty-five, or until they furnish satisfactory proof that they have exercised due diligence in an effort to get married. To carry out the provisions of the act, there is created a board, to be known as the 'State Board of Managers of Old Maids' Home,' to consist of three unmarried men, either of whom shall be less than sixty years of age, and to be appointed by the governor. Each member of this board is to receive an annual salary of $1,000. The bachelors' tax is to be paid into the State treasury; and, when the fund shall have reached the sum of $50,000, the board shall proceed to erect an asylum, to be known as 'Old Maids' Home,' and maintain the same thereafter from the taxes collected from the bachelors."

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE REPRESENTATION OF CHURCHES.

All churches contributing to the funds of the American Unitarian Association for two consecutive years are entitled to representation at the annual meeting. The fiscal year closes May 1. In order to keep the right of representation, a contribution from each church should be in the treasurer's hands on or before that date. Up to the present time fewer churches have reported than last year. But those contributing have, on the average, given larger sums. If those not yet heard from give in the same proportion, the total income of the Association will be increased.

A PERSONAL STATEMENT.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In a quotation from a sermon of mine I have been reported as calling Unitarian ministers "confidence men and bunco steers," and, very justly, those who have cared anything at all about the utterance have been offended. Allow me to say that I had not in mind, nor did my words point to, Unitarians or the Unitarian clergy. So far as I know the clergy, personally or by their writings, I accord them a conscientiousness such as I hope myself to possess. I believe them to be, as a body, sincere, high-minded, earnest, and honorable men. In my sermon, which was before a church club, I was speaking exclusively to Episcopalians and of Episcopalians, and warning my own people of their own faults, and of dangers existing, as I believed, in our own communion from some who, while nominally in it and honored by it, were imposing upon the confidence of those within and practising on others without, and leading them into a theological system which was neither based on authority nor on sound reason, but was like the mingled vision of fact and fancy of a dreamer in an opium joint. CHILD LIFE INSURANCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I thank you for your courteous invitation to write something in favor of child insurance and in answer to your editorial of last week. Perhaps I can do nothing better than to enclose you herewith my argument before the committee, and let you make any extract you please from that. I wish you had waited to hear both sides before writing. You would have escaped some errors. For instance, you would not have made the misleading statement that "few disinterested persons have opposed the bill" to prohibit child insurance. Nearly all the opponents, and they are legion, are disinterested,—clergymen like E. A. Horton, Stopford W. Brooke, and John Cuckson of our denomination, and a score of others; city missionaries; eminent charity workers like Edward Frothingham, general agent of the Boston Provident Association; Mr. J.

Lewis Crewe, secretary of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children in Pennsylvania; the agent of the Louisville Charity Society; and Sister Pamela of Albany; our most eminent physicians, like Dr. William L. Richardson, Dr. Edward J. Foster, Dr. Francis Minot, Dr. J. Foster Bush; citizens like Curtis Guild, Jr., ex-Mayor Hart; city physicians, overseers of the poor, and a multitude more,—an entirely disinterested class.

Then you intimate that "from the start" it was not claimed that child murder results from child insurance. On the contrary, Mr. Read, for the bill, started with that claim in his very opening. It was that charge which roused all the feeling that has existed against this insurance; and, but for that, I do not hesitate to say that the public would at once have recognized that poor industrial people ought to have the right to insure their children if they desire thus to lay by a little provision for their last sickness and burial. Of course, the charge has been withdrawn and abandoned, because it is now admitted that in twenty years' experience in our country not a single case of child murder for insurance has occurred, while in adult insurance it is not infrequent.

The whole charge has come down to a criticism upon poor people for funeral expenditure, and the temptation to spend 5 or 10 cents a week for insurance that might be saved for food.

May I not say that legislative prohibition on these two points is a pretty severe interference with personal rights, and is really class discrimination?

Let me also say, concisely, that at the hearing, while cases of cruelty, drunkenness, and poverty were shown, not one was shown in which any injury to the child was traced to its insurance. Not a charge was made against insurance of children under ten that is not equally good in respect to children over ten, or, indeed, against life insurance in general.

Child insurance is not a recent scheme, like the bond-investment craze, which defrauded people a few years ago, and exploded. It is a system which has existed forty years in England and twenty here, constantly growing, because meeting a popular necessity and demand. It has been repeatedly investigated by the British Parliament, and always given a larger field. So also in this country, in State after State. Our own Insurance Department has, under three commissioners, reported favorably on it. In 1891 our own Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children "inquired" into it, and spoke well of it. And, what is particularly striking is that, in its last report, Dec. 31, 1894, while touching on every phase of that society's work, and forecasting its future fields of labor, and reciting in detail a large number of cases of suffering children, there is not, from beginning to end of the report, a single allusion to child insurance! Why? Because there is nothing in it to call for action, either by the society or by the legislature.

Many persons, when this hearing began, supposed that child insurance offers the temptation of the large amounts of adult insurance. The average amount is $28. It begins with $15 the first year of insurance, and no child can be insured under one year of age,—and, while the premium, 5 cents a week, remains the same, does not reach $100 more till after ten years of age. This little sum not only is a resource for burial and doctors' bills and help to other sick children in the family, but the existence of the fund undoubtedly secures better medical attendance and care. The statistics show also, and it was not controverted at the hearing, that the death rate is less among insured children than among non-insured.

People, however poor, will bury their children decently; and it is a question either of pauper funerals—which, as matter of self-respect, nobody will encourage—or else of the alternative between an insurance fund and debt, with its heavy interest. There will be just as much economizing in food to save money to pay debt as to pay insurance.

Since child insurance began in Massachusetts pauper funerals have diminished nearly one-half in number. Abolish child insurance, and you will either go back to an increase of pauper funerals or put a new drain on your charity funds, and pass the hat to meet the expense. You will stop the habit of saving, which is itself an education in social economy among the poor that should be encouraged. The savings-banks do not meet this need of 5-cent savings. There is no competition between the two systems. Each meets a different necessity; and, instead of one cutting into the other, both have been increasing in their business at the same time.

There are hardships attending all the systems which our modern civilization and congestion make necessary. The railroad system, the electric car and lighting systems, the fire system, the machinery system,—all result in some cases of death, injury, and suffering which are directly traceable to the systems themselves; and yet we do not abolish them. We remedy, as far as we can, but even at that we do not stop, the evils. The remarkable thing in child insurance is that at the hearing, as also in the 1894 report of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which I above cited, not a case of suffering is traced to the system. And yet we are asked to abolish it, and to deprive one hundred thousand children under ten years of age in Massachusetts, and the families they represent, of the privilege they now enjoy, without the slightest effort, even if there be fear of some attendant and occasional evil, to meet it by some amendment rather than by the wholesale destruction of the system. More than one-fifth of the population of the State are industrially insured, including the above one hundred thousand; and it is significant that not one of them appeared at the hearing to support the bill.

You are also in error in intimating that there is no insurable interest on a child under ten years of age. The Supreme Court of the United States have decided otherwise. There is certainly an insurable, or what you call "commercial" interest to the extent of the cost of its last sickness and burial. And for some years under ten, in many poor families, the child is rendering little services that are of actual value; while the prospective chance of the child's growing up and later becoming the reliance of the parent is of very great value.

You say, "If it were not for the money received from lapsed policies, these insurance companies could not exist." The fact is, if it were not that there are so many lapses, the companies could be more liberal in the amount of benefit under the policies. The companies do not begin to get paid for the first expense in issuing these policies for more than a year. The lapses, as shown by the companies' records, are greatest the first year, less the second, still less the third, until, when the policy has been in force for five or more years, the lapse is at its minimum. So we repeat that, if it were not that there are so many lapses, the companies could be more liberal.

Again, the article states that "a glance at the statistics in the office of the Insurance Commissioner will show the enormous expenses involved which are met by these lapsed policies." A more absurd statement it would be hard to find, so fallacious as to prove the writer ignorant of insurance matters. If all the "expenses" were met by the profits on "lapsed policies," how is it that the surplus is not equal or greater than the receipts? The expenses of the company are met by its receipts from policies in force; and we again repeat, without so many lapses the company could be more liberal.

The statement that, of nearly $1,900,000 received monthly, nearly $1,100,000 monthly is absorbed in the cost of the business, or nearly 60 per cent., is also, misleading. In that 60 per cent. is included the amount required to be held as reserve by the laws of the State, which people ignorant of insurance matters or interested in assessment organizations consider in the light of an "expense," because the company does not return it to the policy-holder. Some people consider that, when a policy-holder has paid his premium for a number of years, and then allows the policy to lapse, the company has made as clear gain all the money paid under that policy. They do not stop to consider that the insurance is a mutual affair, and that, while they have been fortunate enough not to die, that others, and many others, have died before premiums had been paid for even six months. Where is the money coming from to pay these losses, unless from the ones fortunate enough to live?

JOHN D. LONG.

TO SAMUEL MAY

ON HIS EIGHTY-FIFTH BIRTHDAY, APRIL 11, 1895.

BY JOHN W. CHADWICK.

True friend of all good causes, from the height
Of all thy conquered years, now looking back
Along the ever-climbing, toilsome track
Which thou hast come, what visions clear and bright Thou must behold! For Slavery's monstrous night,—
When, for no crime but that his skin was black,
They stretched the victim on the torturer's rack,
Robbed of his manhood,—lo! the dawning light
Of equal freedom for all sons of God.
Great was thy part, and with the greatest found,
Heroes and saints than whom the world ne'er saw
More brave and sweet. O prophet, look abroad.
Pierce the dark future; say, Shall yet the bound
With any chain go free, and love alone be law?

A WESTERN CHARACTER.

BY REV. E. P. POWELL.

While preaching in St. Louis, there came to my church one day an old man six feet in height and of heavy proportions. He was somewhat bowed, and showed himself to be past seventy. In his prime I should like to have seen him; for he must have stood six feet three in his stockings, and been a man fit for a place among David's men of valor. His face was large cut, with open, cheerful features of an executive cast. He was clearly made up to look outward, and not inward, upward, and not downward, and to lend a hand. He came again with his daughter; and, although a Presbyterian, he soon took a liking to me, and was regularly an attendant. I found him to be the famous "Father Paxton," Sunday-school missionary for many years in "Egypt." Egypt was that southern part of Illinois which was, morally and intellectually, "dark as Egypt." During the pressure of Eastern ideas and men westward from 1780 to 1840 the Ohio River had been the line along which, for a few miles on either side, there had been fought out a battle of civilizations. Sometimes the South crossed over and took possession, occasionally the North got a footing to the South; but more commonly New England had pushed north-westward. A part of Illinois and a part of Missouri were possessed of customs and habits, houses, people, religion, politics, prejudices, from North Carolina. It was hard-shell Baptist religion, and pro-slavery politics, and bitter antagonism to schools.

It was Father Paxton's business to invade Egypt and plant Sunday-schools. When I knew him, he was retired, in charge of the Sunday School Depository of St. Louis. When "blue," I always went down to the Depository, and begged him for a few stories. He rode a splendid horse, that was in full sympathy with his master, and bore the significant name, Robert Raikes. There were few houses, except those built of logs; and these were not prejudiced against good ventilation. He laughed long and loud at his experience in one of these which he reached one night in a furious storm. He was welcomed to the best, which was a single rude bed; while the family slept on the floor, behind a sheet hung up for that special occasion. Paxton was so thoroughly tired that he slept sound as soon as he touched the bed, but he half waked in the morning with the barking of a dog. The master of the house was shaking him, and halloing, "I say, stranger, pull in your feet, or Bowser'll bite 'em!" Stretching out in the night, he had run his feet through the side of the house between the logs; and the dog outside had gone for him. "The time he took in pulling in was so trifling as to be hardly worth the mention."

Those who know little of frontier life can have no idea of the difficulties to be met by a man with Paxton's mission. There was one district, not far from Cairo, that was ruled by a pious old fellow, who swore that no Sunday-school should be set up "in that kidntry." Some one cautioned "the missionary" to keep away from M., who would surely be as good as his word and thrash him. M. was a Hard-shell Baptist, and owned the church, which was built also of logs. He lived in the only whitewashed log house of the region. Instead of avoiding him, Father Paxton rode up one day, and, jumping off Robert Raikes, hitched him to the rail that always was to be found before a Southern house. Old M. sat straddle of a log in front of his door, eating peaches from a basket. Paxton straddled the log on the other side of the basket, and helped himself. This was Southern style. You were welcome to help yourself so long as there was anything to eat. The conversation that started up was rather wary, for M. suspected who his visitor was. Pretty soon Paxton noticed some hogs in a lot near them. "Mighty fine lot of hogs, stranger!"

"And you mought say well they be a mighty fine lot of hogs."

"How many mought there be, stranger?"

"There mought be sixty-two hogs in that there lot, and they can't be beat."

Just then a little boy ran up and grabbed a peach.

"Mought that be your young un, stranger?" asked Paxton.

"As nigh as one can say, that mought be mine."

"And a fine chap he be, surely."

"A purty fine one, I reckon myself."

"How many young ones mought you have, my friend?"

"Well, stranger, that's where you have me. Sally, I say, come to the door there! You count them childer while I name 'em. No: you name 'em, and I'll count."

So they counted out seventeen children. Paxton had his cue now, and was ready.

"Stranger, I say," he said, "this seems to me a curious kind of a kidntry."

"Why so, stranger?"

"Because, when I axed ye how many hogs ye had, ye could tell me plum off; but, when I axed ye how many children ye had, ye had to count right smart before ye could tell. Seems to me ye pay a little more attention to your hogs than ye do to your childer."

"Stranger," shouted M., "you mought sure be the missionary. You've got me, sure! You shall have the church in the holler next Sunday, and me and my wife and my seventeen shall all be there."

True to his word, he helped Paxton to establish a school. When I was in St. Louis, there was a Sunday-school convention there. A fine-looking young man came up to Father Paxton, who was then in charge of the Sunday School Depository, and said:—

"Don't you know me, Father Paxton?"

"No," said Paxton: "I reckon I don't recall ye."

"Well, I am from —; and I am one of the seventeen children of M. And I am delegate here, representing over one hundred Sunday-schools sprung from that one." Paxton was a Christian, but not a bigot. He often expressed to me his warm sympathy for liberal and advanced thought. He had not fought narrowness in vain. The worst antagonism to his work had always been from hard-shell Calvinistic religionists. I suppose the world holds no better illustration of the religious crustacean, the vigorous adherence to the shell of Christianity, than was seen in these God-forsaken regions. The Pike region of Missouri and the sand hills of North Carolina alone were rivals of Egypt. They generally dressed their women in cotton sacking, ate their food with their fingers, and swallowed tobacco. After the Civil War the public school was forced on them, and their peculiar civilization is now nearly obliterated. The last time I was in South-west Missouri I found a relic of their lingo. It was not English; and a few old fellows could be found squatting about the hamlets, cursing the Yanks, who had brought in all sorts of curious notions. One yellow sample of malaria assured me they had now "to buy calico for their wives, and knives and forks and school-books; and there really want no peace left." I condoled with him; but he plaintively assured me with a twang: "Tain't no use, stranger. The land's spiled, and there ain't no religion, nor no politics, of count. It's a kidntry as no self-respectin' person 'd care to live in."

When John Monteith was made State Superintendent of Instruction in Missouri by Gov. Gratz Brown, and a State law established public free schools in every district, the fight was a merry one. It needed a good deal of canvassing, more cajoling, and some positive fighting, to carry out the law. Paxton used to say to me: "Well, there's one thing folks by and by won't know much about. That's the question whether barbarism or civilization should conquer the South-west. But 'twas a question." Yes, it really was a question. At one time ignorance and superstition had the upper hand in one-fourth of America. It was not a struggle with slavery merely. The majority of the Missouri and North Carolina and Tennessee white trash did not own slaves, and in Egypt there were no slaves at all. It was an intrenchment of conservative barbarism. Such men as Paxton were pioneers. New England finished the work with the free school. Our history will not say much about these pioneer heroes; but, in my judgment, they were fully as important as the generals who fought down the Rebellion of the same elements.

REV. FREDERICK WEST HOLLAND.

BY REV. A. P. PUTNAM.

This venerated Unitarian clergyman, so long and widely known to the churches of our liberal faith, died in Concord, Mass., March 26, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. It is a noteworthy circumstance that, of the able and faithful ministers who have successively been the secretaries of the American Unitarian Association during the seventy years of its existence, two, Rev. Dr. Reynolds and Rev. Mr. Holland, both residents of the same town, have passed away within the last few months,—the former while still in the full tide of his power and usefulness, and the latter after sixty years of hard and intense activity as a Christian evangelist, and only when he had strength to do no more.

The earlier but more recently departed incumbent of the office was born on Fort Hill, Boston, June 22, 1811, and was the son of John and Sarah (May) Holland, the mother being a daughter of Samuel May, Sr., and a sister of Col. Joseph May of King's Chapel and of Deacon Samuel May of the Hollis Street Church. Frederick was thus cousin of Mrs. A. Bronson Alcott and Rev. Samuel J. May of Syracuse, N.Y., who were daughter and son of Col. May, and cousin as well of Rev. Samuel May of Leicester and Miss Abby W. May of Boston, who were son and daughter of Deacon May. All these, with others of their name and race, are too well known to readers of the Christian Register for their eminent worth and philanthropic service to need further remark about them in this connection. It only need be said that Mr. Holland, by his stainless character and his remarkable devotion to the cause of humanity, well deserves to be numbered with his kin in such a roll of the friends of justice and liberty. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1831; and among his classmates were John Lothrop Motley, the historian, Wendell Phillips, Drs. George C. Shattuck and N. B. Shurtleff, Rev. John H. Morison, D.D., and others of note. For the next three years he pursued his theological studies, first at Andover, and then under Dr. Palfrey and the two Wares at the Divinity School at Cambridge, where he was graduated in 1834, with William G. Eliot, Nathaniel Hall, and George W. Briggs,—all of whom became distinguished as preachers, and the last of whom alone survives him.

And now began his remarkable missionary career, with its many scattered scenes of earnest work and self-sacrifice. Its first three years were passed at Greenfield, Mass., Oswego, N.Y., and in Philadelphia and Washington. Then there were five years, from 1837 to 1842, as the successor of Rev. David H. Barlow in the pastoral charge of the First Unitarian Church of Brooklyn, N.Y. Then he went to Rochester, N.Y., and was there for five years also, establishing in that city the present Unitarian church, of which Rev. William C. Gannett is now the minister. Next followed two and a half years as secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and in 1850–51 a tour abroad, in which he visited England and other European countries, and also Egypt, Palestine, and Turkey. Returning to America, he became the pastor of the Unitarian church at East Cambridge, and was there engaged for eight years in arduous service; and then there were three years at Neponset and three years more at North Cambridge. But now the church edifice which he had built at Rochester had been destroyed by fire; and the shepherdless flock felt discouraged, and wanted their former pastor again. Back he went, erected a new house of worship for them, restored the former prosperity, and then, at the end of three years, went to continue his labors at Rutland, Vt., and shortly afterward far at the South, in New Orleans.

Succeeding this pioneer service were two years of toil here and there, as call and opportunity required; and then there were six years at Newburg, N.Y., and a return for two years to East Cambridge. He was now well-nigh threescore and ten; but, though too old to assume the charge of a parish as before, he would yet do all he could for the Master, and so he became the minister of the inmates of the almshouse at North Cambridge. And for fourteen years, until last October, he made his weekly Sunday visits to them from Concord, or wherever he resided, braving whatever cold or storm, and bearing in his arms to the humble men, women, and children of his care collected supplies of excellent papers and magazines for reading, but bearing in his heart the still better word of personal instruction and sympathy he was to speak to them. He surrendered his post only when it was impossible for him, from the full burden of the infirmities of old age, to travel and preach longer. Yet, even after that, he was often seen as a worshipper in the old Parish Church at Concord.

As long ago as 1869 Dr. Bellows, at an anniversary celebration of the First Unitarian Church in Brooklyn, referred to him as "that earnest, indefatigable, and liberal-hearted missionary, whose labors are known in all the forlorn hopes of our denomination"; and the tribute was just. Among all our Unitarian missionaries, his decided ability and large attainments, his high Christian character and his extraordinary zeal as a preacher and worker, and the very long and uninterrupted term of his active service, entitle him to be regarded as first and foremost. Most of his pastorates were of short duration. He had a genius for organizing new churches and for resuscitating such as had fallen or were falling into decay; and, when this kind of work was done, and well done, at any given place, he seemed to feel that it was time for him to move on to engage in the same sort of labor elsewhere. In the army of the Lord just such a flying artillery is needed to hasten from one point to another, wherever urgent and effective work is needed. Mr. Holland was exceptionally fitted for such work, and he was never so happy as when he was doing it. In his presence there could be but few idlers or laggards, at most. He found something for all to do, roused dead ones to life, gave things a vigorous push, brought in the wanderers or absentees, and kept his church, wherever it might be, all astir in its every department,—congregation, Sunday-school, benevolent society, social circle, or whatever else. Many are those, on earth and in heaven, who gratefully recall the hour when they received from him their first impetus to the better life; and it is not easy to estimate the vast amount of good which he accomplished in the wide field that witnessed to his varied, protracted, and untiring devotion to the higher interests of souls under his care.

I first knew about him during his earlier ministry at East Cambridge, and while I myself was in the Divinity School. He was often seen hurrying on his errands of beneficence, and was frequently spoken of as a chaplain at the State prison as well as the preacher and pastor of a neighboring church. One of the many good practical institutions or enterprises which he started in the course of his life was the East Cambridge Savings Bank, which has remained a notable success, and has been of incalculable benefit to the community in which it exists.

During my nine years at Roxbury and subsequently I remember him as frequent in his attendance at denominational meetings of all kinds, deeply interested in their proceedings and ready for word or deed. I went to Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1864. He had left the city twenty-two years before, and Dr. Farley had been his successor for the interval. Many of Mr. Holland's old parishioners were still in the church, and during the equal term of twenty-two years that followed I never ceased to hear from them the kindest and most appreciative and affectionate words concerning him and his greatly admired and beloved wife. While he was there, he founded the Samaritan Society of his parish, which now for fifty-five or sixty years has wrought for the comfort of the poor and needy near and far, and which, during all the war, sent large quantities of clothing and other useful things to the soldiers. Friends who have come from Brooklyn to Concord during these later years have been full of inquiries about the family, and have not failed to call upon them and revive the old associations; while the same may be said of others, who had known this veteran as their teacher and comforter elsewhere in the long ago, but who still owned the tie that no lapse of time or length of separation had weakened.

To refer again to his secretaryship of the American Unitarian Association, there are various volumes of the Christian Examiner that contain brief accounts of meetings of that body at the time, with allusions to Mr. Holland's work and his reports. Thus in the July number, 1849, we read: "The president, Rev. Dr. Gannett, opened the meeting; and a very methodical and extended report was read by the secretary, Rev. F. W. Holland, who has labored with persevering energy during the past year to promote the efficiency of the Association, and has taken especial care to provide the numerous passenger ships to California with religious literature." The March number for 1850 says: "The general secretary, Rev. F. W. Holland, has travelled far over the South and West to learn how our agencies may most profitably be employed; and the full results of his labors and inquiries will be looked for with interest in Anniversary Week." The July number of the same year makes record of the May meetings of the Association, and says:—

A quarter of a century having now elapsed since the Association was formed, the report of the secretary, Rev. F. W. Holland, as well as the remarks at the public meeting in the evening, made constant reference to that fact, as offering a point from which to review the work that has been accomplished, and from which to commemorate some of its most devoted friends who have passed away. The controversial, philanthropic, and spiritual agencies and efforts of the Association, when thus brought into review and presented in connection with the great occasions which have called them forth, did certainly offer most convincing evidences of the vitality and efficiency of our Christian brotherhood. The secretary did justice to the occasion and the theme. His report was by far the most interesting one to which we have listened at our anniversaries.

These extracts will suffice to show how Mr. Holland carried into the work of the Association the same energetic and consecrated spirit which always marked his ministry as preacher and pastor, and what precious seed he sowed for the harvest of our own time and of the years that are yet to be.

He was, withal, a constant contributor of excellent articles to the magazines and papers. Those which he wrote for the Christian Examiner alone show to a considerable extent the many and varied subjects that engaged his mind and pen. Thus, besides numerous obituary and critical notices, there are articles on "Borrow's Bible in Spain," "Lessons for Sunday-schools," "Abolition of Capital Punishment," "Egypt as it is," "Present Condition of Palestine," "The Character of Archbishop Cranmer," "Saulcey's Discoveries in Syria," "Greece and the Greek Church," "The Results of the Late War in the East," "Life and Works of John Kitto," "Siam," "Tholuck on Prophecy," "Prison Discipline in England," "Miss Carpenter's Work in India," "The English Bible," etc. Some of these, like many of his lectures or sermons, were suggested by his journeyings in Europe and the East. He was a great reader of the best literature, but he told me once that he was particularly fond of books of travel; and the three or four thousand volumes of his valuable private collection and the numerous volumes which he was accustomed to take out from the Concord Library and the Boston Athenæum, even in his eighties, attested his love of this kind of knowledge. He was profoundly interested in the archaeological discoveries which are still going on with so much success and promise in Oriental countries, and to the very last was alive to whatever related to the lands he once visited there.

He was a Christian believer, a friend of education, of temperance, and of peace, and a helper of the poor and of the oppressed. We buried him on Friday, March 29, at Mount Auburn, where his lovely daughter Florence had preceded him but three days before, she having been laid to rest on the very day of his own death; and the clergyman who officiated at his obsequies at the chapel of the beautiful but crowded cemetery could but remark over the open bier that there was one who, at a time when long years ago the assembled ministers of the Unitarian denomination were called upon to express themselves concerning the then recently enacted Fugitive Slave Law, and when there were divided counsels, boldly declared that obedience to such an enactment was a violation of conscience and duty, and that he was for progress and liberty. He always stood bravely for the rights of man.

He married, Feb. 1, 1835, Miss Harriet Newcomb of Keene, N.H., who now survives him. She was the daughter of Hon. Daniel Newcomb, who was a citizen of that town and State Senator, as well as a judge of the Superior Court of New Hampshire. In connection with what Dr. Bellows said of Mr. Holland, in the Brooklyn address to which reference has been made, he alluded most appropriately to Mrs. Holland as well, saying: "I hope I may be permitted to recall, although she is still in the flesh, that admirable woman he brought with him, whose intellectual power and spiritual insight made a permanent impression upon me, as it must have done on us all who knew her during the brief years of her husband's ministry here." There are four surviving children,—Frederic May, the scholarly and well-known author, who lives in Concord; Henry, who resides in Boston; Arthur, whose home is in Pittsburg, Pa.; and Emma, who is with the mother.

ABOUT OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

BY ELBERT HUBBARD.

In 1756 Goldsmith arrived in London, ragged, penniless, friendless, and forlorn. In the country he could make his way, but the city was new and strange. For several days he begged a crust here and there, sleeping in doorways at night, and dreaming of the flowery wealth of gentle Lissoy, where even the poorest had enough to eat and a warm place to huddle when the sun went down.

He at length found work as clerk or porter in a chemist's shop, where he remained until he got money enough to buy a velvet coat and a ruffled shirt; and then he moved to the Bankside, and hung out a surgeon's sign. The neighbors thought the little doctor very funny, and the women would call to him out of second-story windows that it was a fine day; but, when they were ill, they sent for some one else to attend them.

Goldsmith was twenty-eight, and the thought that he could make a living with his pen had never come to him. Yet he loved books, and would loiter about bookshops, pricing first editions, and talking poetry to the patrons. He chanced in this way to meet Samuel Richardson, who, because he wrote the first English novel, has earned the title of the Father of Lies.

In order to get a very necessary loaf of bread, Dr. Goldsmith asked Richardson to let him read proof. So Richardson gave him employment; and, in correcting proof, the discovery was made that the Irish doctor could turn a sentence, too. He became affected with literary fever, and wrote a tragedy, which he read to Richardson and a few assembled friends. They voted it "vile,—demnition vile." But one man thought it wasn't so bad as it might be, and this man found a market for some of the little doctor's book reviews; but the tragedy was fed to the fireplace. With the money for his book reviews the doctor bought goose-quills and ink, and inspiration in bottles.

Grub Street dropped in, shabby, seedy, and smiling, empty of pocket, but full of hope. And little suppers were given in dingy coffee-houses, where success to English letters was drunk.

Then we find Goldsmith making a bold stand for reform. He hired out to write magazine articles by the day, going to work in the morning when the bell rang, an hour off at noon, and then at it again until nightfall. Mr. Griffiths, publisher of the Monthly Review, was his employer. And, in order to hold his newly captured prize, the publisher boarded the pock-marked Irishman in his own house. Mrs. Griffiths looked after him closely, spurring him on when he lagged, correcting his copy, striking out such portions as showed too much genius, and inserting a word here and there, in order to make a purely neutral decoction, which, it seems, is what magazine readers have always desired. Occasionally, these articles were duly fathered by great men, as this gave them the required specific gravity.

It is said that even in our day there are editors who employ convict labor in this way. But I am sure that this is not so, for we live in an age of competition; and it is just as cheap to hire the great men to supply twaddle direct as to employ foreign paupers to turn it out, with the extra expense of elderly women to revise.

After working in the Griffith literary mill for five months, Goldsmith scaled the barricade one dark night, leaving behind, pasted on the wall, a ballad, not only to Madam Griffith's eyebrow, but her wig as well. Soon after this, when Goldsmith was thirty years of age, his first book, "An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe," was published. It brought him a little money and tuppence worth of fame. So he took better lodgings, in Green Arbor Court, proposing to do great things.

Half a century after the death of Goldsmith, Irving visited Green Arbor Court:—"At length we came upon Fleet Market, and, traversing it, turned up a narrow street to the bottom of a long, steep flight of stone steps called Breakneck Stairs. These led to Green Arbor Court, and down them Goldsmith many a time risked his neck. When we entered the court, I could not but smile to think in what out-of-the-way corners Genius produces her bantlings. The court I found to be a small square, surrounded by tall, miserable houses, with old garments and frippery fluttering from every window. It appears to be a region of washerwomen; and lines were stretched about the square, on which clothes were dangling to dry. Poor Goldsmith! What a time he must have had of it, with his quiet disposition and nervous habits, penned up in this den of noise and vulgarity."

One can imagine Goldsmith running the whole gamut of possible jokes on Breakneck Stairs and Green Arbor Court, which, by the way, was never green, and where there was no arbor.

"I've been admitted to court, gentlemen," said Goldsmith, proudly, one day at the Mitre Tavern.

"Ah, yes, doctor: we know,—Green Arbor Court! And any man who has climbed Breakneck Stairs has surely achieved," said Tom Davies.

In 1760 Goldsmith moved to No. 6 Wine-office Court, where he wrote "The Vicar of Wakefield." Boswell reports Dr. Johnson's account of visiting him there:—

"I received one morning a message from poor Goldsmith that he was in great distress, and, as it was not in his power to come to me, begging that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went to him as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for his rent, at which he was in a violent passion. I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had half a bottle of Madeira and a glass before him. I put the cork in the bottle, desired he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced for me. I looked into it, and saw its merit, told the landlady I would soon return, and, having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money; and he discharged the rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill."

For the play of "The Good-natured Man" Goldsmith received £500. And he immediately expended £400 in mahogany furniture, easy chairs, lace curtains, and Wilton carpets. Then he called in his friends. This was at No. 2 Brick Court, Middle Temple. Blackstone had chambers just below, and was working as hard over his "Commentaries" as many a lawyer's clerk has done since. He complained of the abominable noise and racket of "those fellows upstairs," but was asked to come in and listen to wit while he had the chance.

I believe the bailiffs eventually captured the mahogany furniture, but Goldsmith held the quarters. They are to-day in good repair; and the people who occupy the house are very courteous, and obligingly show the rooms to the curious. No attempt at a museum is made; but there are to be seen various articles which belonged to Goldsmith, and a collection of portraits that are interesting.

When "The Traveller" was published, Goldsmith's fame was made secure. As long as he wrote plays, reviews, history, and criticism, he was working for hire. People said it was "clever," "brilliant," and all that; but their hearts were not won until the poet had poured out his soul to his brother in that gentlest of all sweet rhymes. I pity the man who can read the opening lines of "The Traveller" without a misty something coming over his vision:

"Where'er I roam, whatever realms I see,
My heart untravelled fondly turns to thee;
Still to my brother turns, with ceaseless pain,
And drags at each remove a lengthening chain.

"Eternal blessings crown my earliest friend,
And round his dwelling guardian saints attend.
Blest be that spot where cheerful guests retire
To pause from toil and trim the evening fire;
Blest that abode where want and pain repair,
And every stranger finds a ready chair.
Blest be those feasts with simple plenty crowned,
Where all the ruddy family around
Laugh at the jests of pranks that never fail
Or sighs with pity at some mournful tale,
Or press the bashful stranger to his food,
And learn the luxury of doing good."

This is the earliest English poem which I can recall that contains an allusion to America:—

"Where wild Oswego spreads her swamps around,
And Niagara stuns with thundering sound."

Indeed, we came near having Goldsmith for an adopted citizen. According to his own report, he once secured passage to Boston; and, after carrying his baggage aboard the ship, he went back to town to say a last hurried word of farewell to a fair lady. And, when he got back to the dock, the ship had sailed away with his luggage.

His wish was to spend his last days in sweet Auburn:—

"In all my wand'rings round this world of care,
In all my griefs,—and God has given my share,—
I still had hopes, my latest hours to crown,
Amidst those humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at its close,
And keep the flame from wasting by repose.
I still had hopes—for pride attends us still—
Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt and all I saw.
And, as a hare whom hounds and horns pursue
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return, and die at home at last."

But he never saw Ireland after he left it in 1754. He died in London in 1774, aged forty-six. On the plain little monument in Temple Church, where he was buried, are only these words: "Here lies Oliver Goldsmith."

A successful author and courtier by the name of Hawkins once called on the Earl of Northumberland, and found Goldsmith waiting in an outer room, having come in response to an invitation from the nobleman. Hawkins, having finished his business, waited until Goldsmith came out, as he had a curiosity to know why the earl had sent for him.

"Well," said Hawkins, "what did he say to you?"

"His lordship told me that he had read 'The Traveller,' and that he was pleased with it, and that, inasmuch as he was soon to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and knowing I was an Irishman, asked what he could do for me."

"And what did you tell him?" inquired the eager Hawkins.

"Why, there was nothing for me to say, but that I was glad he liked my poem, and that I had a brother in Ireland, a clergyman, who stood in need of help!"

"Enough!" cried Hawkins, and left him.

To Hawkins himself are we indebted for the incident; and, after relating it, Hawkins adds:—

"And thus did this idiot in the affairs of the world trifle with his fortunes!"

Let him who wishes preach a sermon on this story. But there you have it. "A brother in Ireland who needs help,"—this was his first thought. The brother in London, the brother in America, the brother in Ireland, who needs help! All men were his brothers, and those who needed help were first in his mind.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE.

The Executive Board of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women held its regular meeting on April 12, eighteen present. Four new Branches have been formed since the last meeting,—Wolfeboro, N.H.; Medford, New Bedford, Mass.; and Bulfinch Place, Boston. The Post-office Mission Committee reported concerning proposed work in Montana among groups of interested people, and the formation of Sunday Circles elsewhere, according to Rev. Mr. Sunderland's suggestions. The Post-office Mission Committee has full power to organize and arrange for such work. The Meadville Fund Committee reported $10 received from All Souls' Branch, Roxbury.

The Committee on Appeals now recommends the appeal from the church at Wolfeboro, N.H., which desires to complete repairs upon the church. Several Branches have already helped it, so that little more is needed; and it is hoped that the amount may soon be raised. An appeal having come from Mr. Bland, Olsburg, Kan., known to some of the Branches as the leader of the "Van Mission" or "Van Enterprise," the Committee on Appeals again states that it is not its province to recommend the claims of individuals, its work being confined to investigation of the appeals from churches for aid. At the same time the committee often sympathizes with the denominational work of individuals, as in the case of Mr. Bland's efforts to circulate liberal literature by means of a travelling wagon, and considers it is legitimate work for the Post-office Mission to assist him wherever the various committees feel inclined to aid him.

For the Study Class Committee Miss Clarke reported the preparation of a leaflet to be ready for the Branches in the autumn. Suggestions of subjects and programmes which have been found of interest will be welcome.

The future of the Montana School was discussed; and it was announced that a public meeting for all interested would soon be held, to consider the expediency of relinquishing the school to the United States government. At present money is still needed to carry on the school as usual.

The National Conference having announced its intention to hold a meeting at Washington, D.C., Oct. 21-24, 1895, it becomes necessary for the National Alliance to hold its biennial meeting at the same time and place. The president and secretaries were appointed a committee to attend to all arrangements for the meeting. Mrs. Nichols and Miss Merrill were chosen to make arrangements for the annual public meeting in Boston during Anniversary Week. The president gave an account of her recent visit to Asheville and Chattanooga, with details of much interest. At Asheville there has been a small Sunday-school library, which has now been placed in one of the public school buildings, the books to be weekly lent to the children. At a recent distribution every book but one was taken away, and many children went away without one. The books are the property of the Alliance Branch, and "really give the Unitarians something to stand for in Asheville." It is very desirable that this library should receive additions of books, both for children and for their teachers and parents. Boxes and packages may be sent to Mrs. E. E. Heston, 56 Bailey Street, Asheville; and Miss Florence Everett, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, will receive single books and forward them with others. Mrs. Curtis spoke of her visit to Hamilton, and the gratitude of the little Branch there for the assistance and fellowship of those who had sent to them. Mrs. Curtis emphasized the complete isolation of Unitarians in Hamilton, and spoke of the remarkable congregational singing in the church.

The following reports were received from the Pacific Coast:—

Berkeley, Cal.—The society working in harmony and enthusiasm. They report having identified themselves with kindergarten work and Associated Charities; as having given one fine concert, a Spanish Fiesta, and a colonial dinner; also lectures by Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones. Amount in treasury, nearly $300.

Oakland, Cal., reports seventy-five members; has assisted in the support of its own church, has given $58 to the poor, has had various social entertainments (dinners, teas, etc.), has in treasury at present $59.79. The society has recently been honored by the election of one of its members to the school board in Oakland.

Alameda, Cal.—Membership, fifty-three; on hand, $34.20. The efforts of the society at present are mainly directed toward furnishing the new church. The society is in a flourishing condition.

Channing Auxiliary, San Francisco. Membership, one hundred and eighty-eight. The society carries on a large Post-office Mission work, distributing about five hundred pamphlets per month. On hand, $130. The society doing well in all its branches.

San Diego Women's Auxiliary.—The society has met with a great loss, the destruction of its church by fire; but the women are full of life and energy, and, under the inspiring influence of their pastor, Rev. Digby Johnston, are full of hopes and plans. On hand, $21.

A young society.—A society of young women in San Diego also reports, full of hope and enthusiasm; has seventeen members, has given various successful entertainments, and is helping to support its own church.

Whatcom, Wash., reports matters at a standstill for the present, owing to the financial depression. But they are still holding on, and hoping bravely.

The Society for Christian Work, San Francisco, is one of the largest and most prosperous Branches, and has held five meetings since the last report. San Bernardino, Redlands, McMillin, and Puyallup are all doing something in a small way, but do not yet feel able to join the Alliance.

At Colorado Springs the Branch has lost interest in the study class, but has gained in numbers and done much "practical" work, including Post-office Mission. They have sent articles for fairs to Austin, Texas, and to Windsor, Vt., and have paid $100 of the church debt.

At Denver the winter's programme last reported has been well carried out.

In Cañon City the Alliance and Aid Society, consisting of the same members, each meets once a month.

At Salt Lake City the Branch has been successful, helping to furnish the hall where services are held, paying for the music and other accessories. By much thought and labor $480 has been raised.

Full reports were received from New England. In all reports from Maine the visit of the corresponding secretary is spoken of with enthusiasm, as stimulating and helping to a clear understanding of Alliance principles and work. Augusta sent $5 to Montana. Bangor sent $1 to Plainfield, 3 to Montana, $15 to Rochester, N.H., $3 to Wolfeboro, and $3 to Hamilton. Eastport is deeply interested in the Cheerful Letter work, and sent an Easter box to a woman in Virginia. Kennebunk sent $3 to Wolfeboro and $10 to Montana, and is to have a class on the "Higher Criticism of the Bible." Waterville is looking forward to a union of the Sewing Circle and the Alliance. Portland sent the publications of Dr. Hill with autograph to Japan, and sent $10 to Montana, $5 to Wolfeboro, $10 to the Salvation Army, and $10 for Post-office Mission. Littleton, N.H., is flourishing, with eleven new members, and will add $125 to the church fund. At Wolfeboro the Social Circle has now become an Alliance Branch. Lebanon holds regular meetings, with good attendance. The large Branch at Concord has lately distributed all its funds, sending $10 to Rev. Mr. Gibson, $5 to Rev. Mr. Shultz, $10 to Rochester, N.H., $10 to Wolfeboro, $10 to Bath, and $5 to Mrs. Carr.

In the Channing Conference, which includes Connecticut and Rhode Island, with a part of Massachusetts, the Branches are all vigorous. At the First Church, Providence, the Branch is considering the feasibility of establishing Unitarian headquarters for literature, etc., in the church parlors. $100 has been given to the society at South Providence. Newport has had its usual meetings. Taunton has had a "gentlemen's night," and sent $2 to Neillville. The same amount has been sent by the Westminster Church Branch in Providence. The Branch at Fall River is full of life, with fine meetings, and has lately sent $10 to the Stevens Memorial Chapel at Vineyard Haven, $2 to Wolfeboro, and $2 to Neillville. The Branches in Salem are active, the First Church sending $10 to Wolfeboro since the last report. Newburyport has been listening to Mrs. Andrews upon India, and has sent $5 to Miss Putnam and $5 to Wolfeboro. The beautiful Branch at Peabody has appropriated $275 to its own church. Lynn sends $10 to Ithaca, $10 to Wolfeboro, $10 to the Church Building Loan Fund, $5 to the Mozoomdar Mission, $10 to San Diego, $50 to its own church, and $20 for Post-office Mission. Haverhill reports increased interest among its members. Twenty of them attended the February meeting of the Lawrence Branch, and in turn received other Branches with tea and a fine programme. $1 has been sent to Hamilton. Lawrence Branch is a large and enthusiastic one, its meetings attracting people from other churches. Ayer, Lowell, Littleton, and Pepperell are most earnestly at work, Littleton giving $5 to the Mozoomdar Mission, and Pepperell holding a "Plymouth tea," sending the proceeds, $7.50, to the fund for the memorial church at Plymouth. Uxbridge sent $15 to the Calhoun School. The Third Religious Branch, Dorchester, has had a happy and useful winter, with devotional exercises, able papers, music, and social teas. $10 given to swell the church contribution to the American Unitarian Association and $5 to Wolfeboro. Dedham much interested, sending books and clothing, $25 to Rev. H. G. Putnam and $25 to a clergyman's widow. Brookline continues the study of the sects. Sent Montana $25, Hamilton $10, Wolfeboro $10, Redlands $25, St. John $25, Nebraska sufferers $25, and $50 to Post-office Mission. Milton sent $5 to Wolfeboro and $100 to Montana. This same gift has been received from the Milton Branch for several years. Longwood sent $25 to Grace Chapel, and has held excellent meetings. Quincy sent $30 to Montana, $25 to Miss Putnam, $25 to Mr. Gibson, $10 to St. John, and $10 to Hamilton, devoting $130 to their own Sunday-school. Has had delightful talks on the Bible by the pastor. The new Branch at Canton intends to carry on the work of the Cheerful Letter, and is studying "The Aim of Life." Cohasset has done the usual work, and sent $1.30 to Hamilton. Plymouth and Barnstable have held regular meetings. Hingham has a good Post-office Mission, and has sent $10 to Wolfeboro, $10 to Hamilton, and $10 to East Weymouth. The Worcester League and the Franklin County Branch are holding meetings with constantly increasing interest. The Branches in the South Middlesex Conference are interested in all the Alliance activities. Arlington sent $10 to Mr. Chaney and $5 to St. John. Belmont sent $5 to Miss Putnam, $6 to St. John, and $2 to Cheerful Letter. Cambridge sent $10 to the Ramabai Fund. Somerville, Framingham, Cambridgeport, Malden, and Watertown send such good reports that it is hard to select from them. A new Branch has been formed at Medford.

As the following is the last official report to be expected from the present director for Suffolk Conference, we give it exactly as it was read, wishing we could add the writer's earnest enthusiasm in the reading:—

The Arlington Street Branch confines its work almost entirely to Post-office Mission, doing great and valuable work in that direction. There are 20 women who meet every week to attend to the correspondence; and the secretary reports the sending of 3,000 sermons during the past two months, besides books and papers. 209 letters have been received, 65 from new applicants. The appropriations have been: $20 to Wolfeboro; $20 to Ithaca; $25, Miss Helen G. Putnam; $25, Rochester, N.H.; and $14 to a poor crippled woman who has been a correspondent for years. Total membership, 150.

Church of the Disciples has a membership of 126, with an average attendance of 100 at the meetings which are held every two weeks. Original papers are read by members, with discussion under the able leadership of the president, Mrs. Ames. At the last meeting $28 was contributed by those present toward a high school for girls in Iceland, the cause presented by Mrs. Magnussen, an Icelandic lady.

Church of the Unity holds a three-hour session each month, the time equally divided between business, study class, and sociability. With a membership of more than 200, the average attendance at the meetings is 50. Every woman is expected to be a member and contribute $1 or more, even if unable to attend the meetings, thereby indorsing the work and contributing to the funds for the workers. $200 contributed to the Southern work; $25 to Marshfield; $50 to Ithaca, N.Y.; $50 to St. John, N.B.; and $5 to Japan library. More than $100 now remains in the hands of the officers, ready to respond to any urgent appeal which may be presented.

Second Church.—This is a live and earnest Branch. Papers are given each month by persons invited; and there is an average attendance of 50 at the meetings, when reports, correspondence, and news of the denomination are read, and an afternoon tea adds to the sociability. $25 has been sent to Rochester, $25 to Sharon, and $25 to Mr. Gibson. In the Post-office Mission work there are 163 regular correspondents; and 1,852 sermons and many papers and magazines have been distributed. The membership is 96.

South Congregational.—Still actively at work, and has a membership of 150. Appropriations: $50 to Montana, $35 to St. John, $25 to Rochester, $50 to Mr. Gibson, $25 to Ithaca, $25 to Chattanooga. This Branch carries on Post-office Mission and Cheerful Letter work in an earnest, active, and interesting way.

King's Chapel.—The work of this Branch is carried on mainly by the younger women of the church. They advertise in the Ohio Farmer, and respond generously to requests for books. They appropriated $25 for the purchase of books of travel and history for a library in Magnolia, Col.; $25 to Mrs. Wilson of St. Andrews, N.C., to aid in starting a circulating library; and gave $10 to the church at Wolfeboro. Collections of cuttings from magazines and newspapers are sent to invalids through the Cheerful Letter Exchange.

The Branch at Jamaica Plain, besides its regular meetings for papers and discussions, excels in the amount of Post-office Mission work done; advertises in the Review of Reviews, and received 200 new applications in the last two months, besides 194 letters from old correspondents; sent 2,800 sermons, 342 papers, 19 books, and has written 257 letters.

All Souls', Roxbury, adopted a new plan of meetings, which has proved most satisfactory, with three-hour sessions, including business, social, and study hours. Appropriations: $50 to Southern work, $25 to Marshfield, $10 to Meadville, $10 to Ithaca, $5 to Japan library. Printed two of Mr. Lyon's sermons for distribution, and voted $64 to work of the committees.

First Parish, Dorchester, devoted one meeting to Post-office Mission and Cheerful Letter. As the result, the committees were enlarged and new work in these directions undertaken. Four barrels of reading have been distributed, and $10 each given to Redlands, Cal., Hamilton, Ont., and the Mozoomdar Mission, $5 for the Japan library, and $10 to Rev. Digby Johnston. A barrel of clothing was sent to Miss Jeannie Deans, besides the $200 already contributed for circuit Southern work.

First Religious Society, Roxbury, reported regular and interesting meetings and a contribution of $25 to the Southern work and $2 to Japan library, $40 for printing Mr. De Normandie's sermons for circulation.

New South Church holds regular monthly meetings in the evening, with papers and discussion, and, with a membership of 52, has an average attendance of 50. Appropriated $50 to the American Unitarian Association and $225 to its own church fund.

Brighton has devoted all its energies to the new church, which is now finished, and given $500 toward the organ. A visit from Mrs. Fifield was reported.

Hawes Congregational, South Boston.—This young Branch has a membership of 35, and shows special interest in the Calhoun School, sending $10 and a barrel of clothing there.

West Roxbury at the last meeting particularly considered the needs of the Montana School, and voted $5.75, besides two barrels of clothing and good reading.

Neponset meets every week to work for a sale to be held for the benefit of the Alliance, with an average attendance of 25. Contributed $40 toward the entertainment of the Norfolk Conference and $7 to Dover, Mass., a package of clothing to Nebraska sufferers.

Chelsea, recently transferred from South Middlesex to Suffolk Conference, now reports to us, and, with a new Branch recently formed at Bulfinch Place Church, makes the number of Branches reporting to Suffolk director 20.

The most important places to which to send money are at present St. John, Hamilton, Ithaca, Chattanooga, Bath, and Rochester, and the Southern circuits. It is hoped that the Branches will remember the appeal for Mrs. Carr in California, so strongly indorsed by Mr. Wendte. At present $24 has been sent her, and it is hoped she will have $150. At the May meeting reports are due from the Middle States, Middle West, and Southern States.

EMILY A. FIFIELD, Rec. Sec'y.

The Sunday School.

The subject postponed from the Channing Hall "talks" of April 13 will be taken up next Saturday, April 20,—Miss Dockham in the Primary, and Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford in the Advanced. The topic discussed will be Lesson XXIX., "Jesus and the Money-changers." Primary at 2 P.M., and Intermediate and Advanced at three o'clock. All cordially invited.

Although the New Song and Service Book, issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, has been out only two weeks, the following Sunday-schools have introduced the book: Hingham, Mass.; Farmington, Me.; Woburn, Mass.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Wayland, Mass.; Shelbyville, Ill.; Quincy, Mass.; Andover, N.H.; Bernardston, Mass.; Hartford, Conn.; Bolton, Mass.; Roxbury, Boston (All Souls' Sunday-school); Rockland, Malden, Sherborn, Arlington, Melrose Highlands, Mass.

There is to be a summer school at Clark University, Worcester, Mass. The school will begin on the morning of Monday, July 15, at ten o'clock, and end on the evening of Saturday, July 27. It is proposed to open all the resources of the university—books, apparatus, buildings, rooms, diagrams, etc.—to those who may attend. Instruction is to be given not by tutors, but by the regular professors and heads of departments in each subject. There will be eight different courses of lectures. President G. Stanley Hall will treat pedagogy, psychology, and philosophy. His lectures will treat specially the study of children, and include a particular section on "The Sunday-school and Methods of Religious Training for the Young." This course, it is hoped, may be of service to clergymen, Sunday-school superintendents, and teachers. The fee will be $12 per week or $20 for the two weeks, payable in advance, which will cover everything in any or all departments. Board may be obtained at moderate rates near by. This is a fine opportunity for the Sunday-school teachers of our Unitarian churches to obtain valuable help for their work, and also to secure a pleasant two weeks in a delightful Worcester County city. Pamphlets containing full details will be forwarded on application to Clark University, Worcester, Mass. There are also a few copies at the Unitarian Sunday School Society Rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Religious Intelligence.

MONTANA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.—This school needs a contribution of nearly $2,000 before July 1, the date at which our contract with the government expires, in order that its books may balance. It is hoped that this sum may be sent in by those who have withheld it under the impression that a transfer of our school to the government had been arranged, making the contribution unnecessary. What shall be done after July 1 remains to be decided. The government has announced certain terms upon which it will take charge of the school July 1. These terms seem satisfactory to the commission appointed by the American Unitarian Association; and they will be laid before a public meeting of delegates from churches and contributors to the school to be held at Channing Hall Thursday, April 25, at 11 A.M. Alfred Manchester, Superintendent Montana Industrial School.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Albert Lazenby of Glasgow will preach April 21. Service at 10.30 A.M., and at 3.30 P.M. evening service, with music and short sermon. Seats are free in the afternoon.

At the annual meeting held at King's Chapel last Monday it was voted to extend a call to Rev. Howard N. Brown of Brookline to become the pastor.

Ministers' Monday Club: April 22, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Henry F. Bond will preside. Mrs. Eliza Stowe Twitchell, author of "Economic Principles," will give the essay, on topic, "Truths seen by Contrast." The public invited.

Boston Young Men's Christian Union: The forty-fourth annual business meeting was held April 10. The reports of the special committees gave a condensed account of the year's work, showing how wide and how successful the activities of the Union have been. Twenty-one classes in charge of sixteen teachers show over one thousand pupils enrolled. The increase in use of the rooms, and in attendance at lectures and receptions, show the appreciation of advantages offered. After the reports, addresses were made by Rev. J. B. Green, Hon. H. H. Sprague, and others.

BROOKFIELD, MASS.—A rainy Easter, yet a good-sized congregation gathered at the Unitarian church to listen to an attractive programme which had been arranged for by the pastor, Rev. William L. Walsh. The church was decorated with the customary Easter lilies and a variety of potted plants. Miss Nellie Stutson presided at the organ, and opened the service with a voluntary "Easter March," followed by "Universal Hymn," in which the congregation joined. The singing was under the direction of Mr. E. R. Irwin. Responses, by minister, congregation, and choir, Scripture reading and a brief address appropriate to the occasion, by the pastor, followed. By invitation the Methodist and Congregational churches united with the Unitarians in the evening service. The church was filled, and both morning and evening service were enjoyed and highly appreciated by those who attended. This was the most elaborate Easter service ever given in the town, and reflects great credit on those who had it in charge as well as those who assisted in carrying out the programme.

CHICAGO, ILL.—The Chicago Branch of the Women's Western Unitarian Conference met at the Third Unitarian Church April 4, Mrs. George D. Broomell presiding. Interesting and valuable papers were read by Miss Frances L. Roberts and Mrs. J. R. Effinger,—the first upon "The Growth of the Idea of God," and the second upon "The Modern Unitarian Idea of God." The subjects were discussed by Mrs. Allinson and Miss Juniata Stafford, from the ethical standpoint. Plans for meetings next year were considered, and it was the general opinion that meetings should be held monthly. The election of officers and other business was adjourned to May 23 at 2 P.M.

DETROIT, MICH.—Early in February Rev. Reed Stuart received a proposal to go to Egypt, Palestine, etc., on a two months' excursion trip from New York, but did not deem it possible to leave. The Unitarian church trustees, learning of the matter, had a special meeting, and decided to say to him: "Go. We will supply the pulpit." This kind and unlooked-for step left him free to sail February 6; and the trustees planned for each Sunday by enlisting the services of lay members of the society and others to give discourses, as follows: Mrs. Reed Stuart, "Whittier and his Poems"; E. G. Holden, "Religious Growth"; Mr. Boynton, "Bondage to Books"; Dr. Webster Cook, "The Law of the Spirit"; E. W. Meddaugh, "Intuitive Morals"; Prof. Dr. Oge of State University, sermon; G. B. Stebbins, "Intuitive Morals"; Rev. T. B. Forbush, sermon; Mr. Rowan, "The Way out of Agnosticism." Editors, teachers, lawyers, and writers mostly make up this list of names, each varying the service somewhat, in accord with varying habits and feelings, and treating earnestly topics in which they were especially interested. The audiences were not quite as large as usual, yet the series of discourses interested goodly companies of thoughtful hearers. There was a feeling that such a breaking-up of the traditional line between clergy and laity was well, and did not diminish, but made natural and healthful, the respect and affection in which a minister without priestly pride, yet earnest and sincere, will be held. On Easter Sunday all hope to give Reed Stuart a heartfelt welcome to his accustomed place in the pulpit.

JANESVILLE, WIS.—Rev. V. E. Southworth has accepted a unanimous call to become pastor of All Souls' Church.

POMONA, CAL.—A correspondent says: "The First Unitarian Church of this place has lately had a course of lectures on 'Evolution,' by Rev. U. G. B. Pierce, resident pastor. These lectures, given on five successive Sunday evenings, have been highly interesting and instructive; and the clear and scholarly way in which Mr. Pierce handled the subject, together with forcible illustrations by a splendid set of stereopticon views, have been instrumental in breaking down the strongholds existing in the minds of many against the theory of evolution.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.—Rev. B. F. McDaniel writes correcting some figures published in our "Religious Intelligence" last week in regard to the debt of the San Diego church which are liable to misinterpretation: "The total debt was about $9,000; the insurance, $6,000. By the sale of the lot, possibly the whole of the Hinckley debt might be paid. This would leave, he says, my claim of $1,400 unpaid. But later he says, '$700 has already been paid to Mr. McDaniel on this claim.' I presume he meant the original debt, which on Jan. 1, 1893, was $2,138.60, for which the society gave me its note, payable in six months, at 7 per cent. From that time, when my pastoral relations ceased, to Aug. 11, 1893, the date of the last payment, I received $705, $100 of which came from the Woman's Pacific Conference. That the society has desired to pay the debt I have had assurance, and that recently from the trustees. In the serious perplexity and struggle of the last six years, followed by the calamity of the destruction of our beautiful church, my thoughts have ever been for the future of our cause in San Diego. In the struggle that lies before the society and its minister in the next two or three years I trust they will not have to ask for the sympathy and help of our churches. Here is an opportunity for missionary enterprise worth the cost."

SOMERVILLE, MASS.—The First Unitarian congregation held their Easter service in the chapel of the new church. There was a large attendance, and the day was signalized by the ringing of the new chimes. These bells, ten in number, cast by the Blake Bell Company of Boston, at a cost of $4,000, have just been placed in the church tower by the generosity of Protestant and Catholic citizens. In his sermon the pastor, Rev. W. H. Pierson, said: "We dedicate these bells, not indeed with touch of holy water, not with formula from priestly lips, not with outward sign or ceremony, though any or all of these symbols might be most beautiful and fitting for so auspicious an event; but they are already dedicated in the fact that this Easter morning they begin to be associated with the life and history of this city and this church. They are already dedicated, that, on this joyous Sunday, in the month of April, in the year of our Lord 1895, they have rung out upon the morning air the songs of home, country, and religion. They are already dedicated, that inwrought into their very structure there is not only that composition of metals which makes music to the ear, not only an acknowledgment of the generous gift of the donors, but also a word of hope and inspiration, well suited to this festival day of the Christian Church. The bells in the tower bear in the very shape and fibre of the enduring bronze not only their own office, but indicate by the words inscribed upon them what for all time must be the message and mission of the pulpit,—this pulpit and all pulpits,—to stimulate in human life, thought, and action Tennyson's noble ideal:—

'Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.'

WAVERLEY, MASS.—A fair will be held in the hall at Waverley May 1, commencing at 3 A.M. Any one wishing to help the little Unitarian society there, and to see the "oaks" in the "Reservation Grounds," can have a lunch at the fair.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, April 9. There were present Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Wells, and Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Brown, Crothers, Dole, Fox, Hale, Hosmer, Howe, Lincoln, and Savage. The treasurer reported all bills paid up to April 9, 1895. Total, $89,182.84. Expense account for March, $9,532.36. Contributions from the churches up to April 9, 1895, $31,000. If the churches yet to contribute keep up to the level of last year, the total will be $50,000.

It being the day for New England appropriations, Rev. D. M. Wilson was present, and explained the recommendations made by the New England committee; and the following appropriations were made: $125 to the Congregational Unitarian Society, Andover, N.H.; $150 to the Church of the Unity, Beachmont, Mass.; $250 to the First Parish, Bedford, Mass.; $150 to the First Ecclesiastical Society, Brooklyn, Conn.; $200 to Rev. John A. Bevington of Barnstable, Mass., for missionary work; $300 to the First Unitarian Society of Christians, Dover, N.H., to be expended at the discretion of the New England superintendent; $100 to the First Unitarian Society, Gardner, Mass.; $200 to the Liberal Christian Congregational Society, Holyoke, Mass.; $50 to the Second Congregational Society, Marshfield Hills, Mass.; $100 to the First Parish, Mendon, Mass.; $300 to the First Unitarian Society, Middleboro, Mass.; $150 to the First Unitarian Society, Millbury, Mass.; $1,000 to Unity Church, Pittsfield, Mass.; $100 to the First Church, Pembroke, Mass., when a minister shall be settled; $300 to the Independent Society, Presque Isle, Me.; $250 to the Fourth Unitarian Society, Providence, R.I.; $500 to the Church of the Unity, Rochester, N.H.; $175 to the Unitarian society of Rockland, Mass.; $150 to the First Congregational Church, Rowe, Mass.; $200 to the Unitarian society of Turner's Falls, Mass.; $125 to the First Parish, Tyngsboro, Mass.; $150 to the First Unitarian Society, East Weymouth, Mass., on condition that all debts are paid; $200 to the First Unitarian Society, Whitman, Mass., on condition that their indebtedness be not contrary to the rules of the Loan Fund; $200 to the Unitarian society, Winthrop, Mass.; $250 to the Central Church, Yarmouth, Me.; $400 to the Liberal Christian Association, Farmington, Me.; $35 to the Liberal Christian Society, Melrose Highlands, Mass.; $100 for missionary purposes in Connecticut, the money to be at the disposal of the secretary; $200 to the First Congregational Church, Athol, Mass.; $300 to Rev. George W. Cooke, agent of Unity Clubs, guilds, and Unitarian Temperance Societies.

A resolution requesting all societies seeking aid from the Association to take weekly contributions, and to report all sources of income, was referred to the Executive Committee.

A report from the Committee on Education concerning sectarian schools was referred, and the committee were granted further time.

$300 was appropriated to pay the traveling expenses of theological students for summer preaching, under the direction of the superintendents.

A committee, consisting of Messrs. Batchelor, Savage, and Brown, was appointed to be in readiness to consider any suggestions that may be offered by a committee of the Western Conference appointed to propose measures for a closer co-operation of the Association and the various Unitarian organizations in the West.

It was voted that the Association cannot pay the travelling expenses of ministers attending conferences.

On recommendation of the Finance Committee,—

"Voted, That it is desirable to pay off all indebtedness of this Association before the end of the present fiscal year, and that the treasurer, with the approval of not less than two members of the Finance Committee, is hereby authorized to sell and transfer such portions of the General Fund as may be necessary to accomplish such purpose."

A report from the Finance Committee showed that for the last five years the total average income of the Association from churches, individuals, and the income of general and special invested funds, has been $84,000 per annum. The total expense account for five years has been $120,000 per annum. The amount to be drawn from the General Fund and other sources has been $36,000 per annum.

Appropriations were made, to Passaic, N.J., $300; to Richmond, Va., $250. The church at Ann Arbor, Mich., having granted Rev. J. T. Sunderland leave of absence for one year, on condition that an arrangement could be made satisfactory to the Association, it was "Voted, That, in view of the assent by the church in Ann Arbor to the absence of Rev. J. T. Sunderland, such financial arrangement be made for suitable pulpit supplies as shall be satisfactory to the secretary of the Association and the superintendent for the Central West."

The chairman appointed as a Committee on the Annual Meeting the secretary; the assistant secretary; A. M. Howe, Esq.; Mrs. K. G. Wells; Rev. Charles F. Dole.

To relieve the present distress of the society at San Diego, Cal., it was voted to increase the rate of appropriation for six months from March 1 from $500 to $1,000 per annum.

The secretary reported that Rev. Albert Lazenby has been appointed to represent the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at our coming anniversary. The following preamble and resolution presented by the secretary were adopted:—

"Whereas Rev. James Martineau, D.D., LL.D., the eminent advocate of the principles of Unitarian Christianity in Great Britain will, on the 21st inst., attain to the great age of fourscore years and ten, and, with the vigor of mind and body which have been characteristic of him, will be a most illustrious example of the clear shining of a luminous intelligence exercised upon the grandest themes of human life and thought, therefore,—

"Resolved, That we, the directors of the American Unitarian Association, assembled on this ninth day of April, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, with the heartiest good will and reverence, instruct our secretary to send a message of congratulation to Dr. Martineau, with the expression of the hope that he may be spared to the end of a full century, in the expectation that he may see still greater results of his life-long devotion to the principles which he has so ably proclaimed and so grandly illustrated."

A Sign of the Times.—The appearance of news paper advertisements indicates that "Rootbeer Time" is here again with all its joys, and it will be royally welcomed by the children and the grown up folks as well. Indeed there are but few homes in New England, or elsewhere, where the name of Hires is not a household word. Hires' Rootbeer has endeared itself to the hearts and tastes of all people who love health, happiness, and home, its great popularity being honestly won and fully deserved. Made from ingredients of the highest health-giving properties and so prepared as to produce the most enjoyable taste and effervescence, it has not only met with favor from the most discriminating temperance people, but has also received the approbation of eminent physicians. When with all this we couple a thought of economy, and remember that a 25 cent package of Hires' famous extract will make 5 gallons of delicious rootbeer, the universal pleasure with rootbeer time is welcomed and can be easily understood.

The last personally conducted tour to Washington under the auspices of the Royal Blue Line leaves Boston Wednesday, May 8. The rate of $23 covers every expense for the trip of seven days. Members of previous parties express themselves as delighted with the accommodations furnished. A detailed itinerary may be secured by addressing A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. Among the souvenir china pieces of Boston, just landed by Jones, McDuffee & Stratton from the old Wedgwood pottery, are plates and pitchers in old blue, with views of the State House, Fanen Hall, the Adams Lean-to-Houses, Quincy, etc.

A Clever Argument.—No reader should lay his paper down to-day without turning to another column and finding the very clever announcement of Paine Furniture Company in regard to the question of open fires and wood mantels. The arguments of the hesitating purchaser are answered with a logic which is absolutely convincing. It is no wonder that this house is credited with doing the largest business in wood mantels of any firm in the United States.

Deaths.

In Brookfield, 9th inst., Joseph Black, aged 39 yrs.

Mrs. Rebecca G. Richards, who died Thursday, April 4, in the ninety-fourth year of her age, was the oldest member of the First Church in Dedham; and she must have been one of the oldest and earliest subscribers to the Christian Register, which she had taken ever since her family can remember. She was the grand-daughter of Captain Joseph Guild, who led the minute men from Dedham to the battle of Lexington, April 19, 1775, and the widow of Edward M. Richards, whose death occurred in April, 1865. To a quiet and peaceful life a beautiful and happy old age was added as a fitting crown. On her ninety-third birthday, last November, after a long afternoon and evening spent in receiving friends, she stood up, and joined in singing her favorite hymn, "Coronation," with a satisfaction which none who were present will be likely to forget. Until within a very few weeks of the end she was able to take an active part in the pleasant home life in which she always seemed to find her chief delight; and she never failed to manifest a warm interest in the church or in the American Unitarian Association, to which through the church she was every year a liberal giver. She leaves behind many beautiful memories. "Her children arise up and call her blessed." So do her friends also: so must all who knew her.

THE FOOLISH HEART.

BY HANNAH PARKER KIMBALL.

There came a shape, they told me it was "Truth":
Its flashing eye was terrible, severe;
It trod upon my flower without ruth;
It crushed my budding leaves as well as sere,
And left my garden drear.

There came a wind, and "Science" was its name:
It blew and blew, my rose-leaves tore and cleft;
And, when it ceased and flew from whence it came,
Much dust was heaped about, and more bereft
My poor bare garden left.

Rejoice my heart! What? On the trampled sod Bowed down, poor foolish thing, and sobbing low?
It seems to think it was the hope of God
That made the fountain in the garden flow,
And even the roses blow!

The Pulpit.

SINCE LINCOLN DIED.*

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

The consequences of a great war extend far beyond the line of its last battle. A million men cannot be withdrawn from peaceable occupations and enlisted in an occupation destructive of life and property for a term of years without far-reaching consequences to the whole community. Thousands of families must lose the husbands, fathers, sons, to whom they have looked for their support. An inflated currency—for economic laws are silent in the midst of arms—breeds general extravagance, a false standard of expenditure and wages, fraught with an endless catalogue of social ills. An army has its camp-followers not less certainly than a war its train of sorrows and anxieties and dangers to the common weal. Given such a war as ours,—so lofty in its purpose, so noble in its spirit, so amply justified by the exigencies of the moral situation,—and a peculiar danger lurks in its appeal to the imagination of the ardent patriot. It is the danger that war, as war, will borrow something of dignity and glory, something of nobility and charm, from its peculiar grandeur. I do not see how any one can fail to sadly recognize that our American mind and conscience have been "made subject to vanity" in this manner. It would be mercenary to regret one dollar of the $160,000,000 that we annually spend upon our war-scarred veterans if every pension corresponded to a period of honorable service and to some present disability distinctly traceable to that; but it would be wilful blindness not to see that one of the most miserable things we have inherited from our war for union and emancipation is a more complacent attitude toward war in general than we held before. The constant efforts to enlarge our army and our navy have much of their inspiration here. And with the enlargement consequent upon these efforts comes an ever livelier itch to see what our white cruisers and our new guns are good for in some good, hard fight. It is, I believe, an axiom of political economy that no people can put itself on a war footing and long keep the peace of nations. Our fine admirals and captains need all the restraint that can be put upon them by the moral sense of the community, especially as they are being constantly encouraged in a testy disposition by the hot-blooded journalists, who think that war is something altogether beautiful, affording the leading editor and the reporter an unlimited opportunity for the display of his peculiar gifts.

With this inheritance of evil from the war we have had another, very different and calling for quite other sentiments,—for gratefulness and admiration, not for regret and shame. I have in mind the sense of nationality. "A hoop for the barrel" was the watchword of the Federalists before 1787. The Constitution gave us that, but only formally. In the South each separate State was larger on the states-rights projection than all the States together, and in the Northern States it was not so very different. But the war changed all that. It fused the Southern States into the Confederacy, the solid South; and, not less certainly, it fused the North into a nationality far more compact than the general union of the States had been till then. Here was a real gain. It meant expansion of the individual life to be thus consciously a part of a great national organism. It meant for the more lofty-minded a conviction of the imperative necessity of a national conscience equal to the expanding sense of national dignity and worth. It also meant, no doubt, a centralizing tendency at the expense of local self-government, and the fusing of all local issues in the white heat of the great national questions of the hour,—a consummation every way to be deplored.

The ability of the government to put down a rebellion of such gigantic strength redounded greatly to its honor among European nations; and the tone of foreign statesmen showed at once a marked development of interest, as if we had become "altogether such an one as themselves." But, if the splendid self-assertion of the North attracted the admiring gaze of thousands over seas, too soon the gaze attracted was not that of admiration, but that of sad astonishment, that a people capable of such heroism and devotion, and such lofty soul, could breed or tolerate such base corruption in the seats of highest power, and in all the ramifications of official service, from the highest to the lowest ranks. The fact was that the war had furnished many opportunities for getting rich in other than the old humdrum ways; and, "when the war drums throbbed no longer," a great multitude, finding their occupation gone, went into politics; while, with the rapid growth of the nation, a multitude of new offices was created for such men to manipulate and turn, in one way or another, to their own advantage. Here is a trouble that is fundamental to our political anxiety and danger at the present time. The blindest must perceive that the only reason why reform legislation halts at Albany is that the spoilsman blocks the way. "No thoroughfare" till he has some assurance that his requirements will be met. If we had any doubt of this a week ago, we can have none to-day, so entirely frank, so unconsciously sordid and abominable the justification which has been put forth by one of the principal parties in the great debate now going on as to whether a majority of one hundred and fifty-four thousand entitles the people creating this majority to any rights which the Albany legislature is bound to respect. Truly, we have here, as Lincoln said, a greater menace to the safety of the Republic than the Rebellion itself. Either we must eliminate the spoilsman from our politics, or the future that awaits us is too shameful for the imagination to conceive. And nothing we have done since Lincoln died is more assuring that we are not altogether recreant to our loftiest ideals than the little we have done to make this evil less. A few more such "sentimentalists" as Mr. Theodore Roosevelt engaged in the enforcement of the laws already framed, and the legislation that attempts to make them null and void would be avoided as if it were the yellow fever or the cholera by every politician anxious for the good opinion of his fellow-citizens.

There are many other aspects of our political development that I should like to touch upon; but already I have allowed myself too little space for those of which I wish to speak with some particularity,—the condition of the South, and especially the condition of the colored people in that section, as it has been heretofore and as it is now. First, the condition of the South. Industrially, it is full of hope and cheer. The production of cotton—ten million bales in 1894—is double what it was in 1864, while its value is enormously increased by the manufacture of the cotton oil from the cotton seed, which formerly went almost exclusively to fatten swine, and much of it to waste. Local manufactories are springing up on every serviceable stream, while the New England legislators do their best to favor this development by the pressure of taxation to which they subject the cotton manufacturers of Lowell and Lawrence and other manufacturing towns. The acquiescence of the South in the destruction of slavery is well-nigh complete and universal. Here and there a sentimentalist may chant the praises of the peculiar institution, but the general disposition of the South is one of thorough satisfaction that it has disappeared forever. Moreover, it is astonishing how little bitterness the war has left behind. This is because the men who fought the battles of the South have done so much to set the tide of public opinion. Brave men who face each other in the awful front of battle learn to respect and to admire each other. Then, too, the magnanimity and clemency of the conquerors could not but touch the generous Southern heart. Blessed are the peace-makers; and of such were Grant and Lincoln, above all. For which reason the North does not think more kindly of them now than does the South. Again, the attachment of the South to the Union is much stronger now than it was in the ante-bellum days. Hardly is the North superior to the South in this respect.

As compared with the North, the amount of illiteracy in the South is lamentably great. But even here the rate of progress is so encouraging that we cannot hope too much. Since 1870 the enrolment of children attending school has nearly doubled. "But for one difficulty," says Mr. Bryce, in an admirable new chapter in that splendid book, "The American Commonwealth," which every one of you should own and read,—“But for one difficulty, the South might well be thought to be the most promising part of the Union,—the part whose advance is likely to be swiftest, and whose prosperity will be not least secure.” But that one difficulty is portentous and immense. It clouds the prospect of the future in a most ominous fashion. It is within the bounds of possibility that it may more than counterbalance all the elements of progress and prosperity, and make the last end of the South, if not worse than the first, incalculably worse than it would be if the difficulty were met in a spirit at once just and generous and humane. We have no time or strength to waste in vain regrets. The philosophy of what might have been has its professors everywhere, but they are unprofitable servants. They tell us how much better it would have been if we had purchased the freedom of the slaves. But, then, the owners did not wish to sell. They were convinced that slavery was a good thing, inseparable from the welfare of the South. They also tell us, these philosophers of what might have been, that the process of reconstruction was a tissue of mistakes. It was; and the word "tissue" is a good word, because it suggests warp and woof, two parts, one of which the North furnished, and the South the other. The first great mistake, the root of all the mischief, was the South's. This should not be forgotten. But it was a mistake to which the Northern theory of the Rebellion contributed not a little. No one clung faster than Lincoln to the idea that secession was impossible, and that, therefore, the seceding States had never severed the bond which held them to the national government. On this basis he had recognized the new State governments of Arkansas and Tennessee and Louisiana. After his death the other States followed their example; and they all proceeded to frame laws which not only disfranchised the Negro, but tended inevitably to reduce him to a condition only nominally different from that from which he had been delivered at enormous cost. I cannot now rehearse the piteous tale of the next dozen years. The situation was immensely aggravated by the character and temper of Andrew Johnson, a poor white, trying to ingratiate himself with the late slave-holding aristocracy.

But, certainly, it was not strange that the North resented the disposition of the South to defraud the Negro of even the possibility of citizenship, while using his numerical strength for its political advantage in swelling its Congressional representation, the two-thirds representation of slavery becoming three-thirds, but with no corresponding votes. But no one, at this remove, has any occasion to apologize for the practical working of the reconstruction policy, which was organized to meet the problem which the South had precipitated on the North. If it was a necessary evil, as apparently it was—it was an evil of phenomenal bulk. The original method, which Lincoln had favored, logically but unadvisedly, meant absolute white supremacy. The reconstruction policy meant a black supremacy hardly less absolute. If it had been absolute, it would perhaps have been much better. As it was, the Negroes were manipulated by a set of political adventurers coming from the North, among whom there were, no doubt, honest and well-meaning gentlemen, but whose average character was such as to nourish in the Tammany chieftains of the time a liberal self-respect. Such a riot of misgovernment, such an orgy of official plunder, no other chapter in our history reveals. In course of time the North sickened of this business,—hardly less acutely than the South. The military occupation ceased with Hayes's administration. It had already proved itself helpless to prevent the disfranchisement of the Negro by those subtler methods to which the South had been driven in the interest of self-preservation. These methods now had freer scope; and for eighteen years the Negro—legally, a citizen, and with equal rights before the law—has been largely, if not generally, disfranchised, while still the South has had a representation based upon his nominal enfranchisement. Truly, a most abominable and outrageous state of things. We cannot wonder that the better elements of the South refused to be submerged in the black sea of ignorance with which they were overwhelmed; but the methods they have taken to redeem themselves have been such as no good citizen can approve, no just man can condone. That, under the same circumstances, we of the North would have done the same things helps matters not a whit, nor the counter proposition, that we have been very patient under the municipal sway of managers of the same stock and lineage as the carpet-baggers of the South. The colored people have not suffered most from their disfranchisement. To do wrong is a greater evil than to suffer it,—a proposition nowhere more valid than in the working of political societies.

Looking back over the past, we can see how one thing led to another; and, if here and there the individual was horribly to blame, we cannot wonder much, after the first wrong step, that the second followed, and the third. It is the fourth with which we have the most concern,—the step that comes next. The problem is a stupendous one; but, for that reason, it is not one to which we may turn deaf ears and sleepy eyes. There are those who tell us that it is a Southern problem, and that to know this is to know that it is none of our business. But, being a nation, we are members one of another; and, if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it. Better have let our erring sisters go in peace than be indifferent to their fault, or not do all we can to make the better things prevail!

There are now about seven million of colored people in the old slave States; and, though they are not increasing so rapidly as the white people in the same region, their number is proportionately large enough to make it a supreme necessity that their adjustment to the white people shall be not only equitable, but amicable. Deportation is out of the question. For all practicable purposes it might as well be to the moon as to Africa. Senator Morton of Alabama has seen in mystic vision the seven million marching eastward across the Atlantic, and seven million of Americans marching this way to take their places; but this notion of their "marching across the Atlantic" does not add appreciably to the absurdity. Did Abraham Lincoln broach the deportation scheme? No matter: "Great men are not always wise." Then, there is the speculation that, ultimately, these dusky millions will be massed together and exclusively in "the black belt," making it blacker than [it is. Let us hope not. It is not a consummation devoutly to be wished. A wider distribution and completer interfusion is a much more rational and practicable ideal. Meantime, "we are confronted with a situation, and not a theory." No body of people can long afford to do shocking injustice to another body, or to place a widening gulf between its political practice and its constitutional law. Nor will any device avail that is a mere pretence of justice, which it systematically and of set purpose violates. Such a device is that of Mississippi, where the illiterate white person is not excluded if he can give "an intelligible interpretation" of what is read to him from the Constitution, the registering officer to judge of his success. Better the frank injustice of the past than such roundabout dishonesty as this! South Carolina is soon to have a constitutional convention, in which this Mississippi plan, "or something better," will be put through, — something better meaning something worse. Thank Heaven, there is one native white man, the editor of the Sumter Freeman, who, at the risk of his life, continually threatened, pronounces the proposed scheme "unchristian, un-American, undemocratic, a conspiracy against the Constitution and the laws of the nation." Such it undoubtedly is; and, wherever such a scheme is set on foot, all the resources of our national legislature and judiciary must be drawn upon to work its condemnation and defeat. To an educational test, impartially enforced, no friend of the colored people would object. He could trust them to overcome their illiteracy quite as soon as the illiterate whites. In twelve years, from 1877 to 1889, the school attendance of white children increased 70 per cent.; that of colored children, 113. Here is something for the political vote-juggler of the South to "view with alarm." The Negro is more ambitious for book-learning than for anything else. But given an educational test, and it must be no respecter of persons. It must apply to white and black without discrimination.

How to bring this to pass, or, without the educational test, to call a halt to the march of Negro disfranchisement which has been proceeding tumultuously or quietly for the last twenty years, is a problem second in its interest and importance to no other in our politics. We have proved conclusively that force bills and military occupations mar more than they mend. The Negro vote grows in proportion as they cease. But let the national government be on the alert for every violation of the constitutional law; and let a public opinion, at once sober and intense, be generated North and South before the face of which the evil cannot stand.

If but the South could know the things that belong to her peace, how would she hasten to adjust this matter in some equitable manner! There are not too many colored people in the South for her industrial strength. Admit them to the suffrage upon equal terms with their white neighbors, and, with the questions and the passions of the war so far away, the old color line would soon be broken; and the Negro vote would range itself on one side or another, as new questions should arise appealing variously to the interests or prejudices or affinities of the colored population. If but the South could know the things that belong to her peace, she would remove every artificial barrier to the interfusion of the white people and the black. She would educate their children in the same schools. She would annul such absurd discriminations as admit the colored nurse into the palacé-car and remand the colored lawyer, doctor, teacher, to the second-class. (I know that we have similar discriminations in the North: that doesn't make them any better.) She would repeal the laws that prevent legal unions between the black and white, only to make illegal unions far more numerous than they would otherwise be. It is absurd to talk of natural repulsion. Thousands of mulattos, quadroons, octoroons, throughout the South under the old régime, give all such talk the lie. It is absurd to talk of physical degeneration. If there are those who argue such an effect of intermarriage, there are others of as good authority who argue that a mixture of the races would have the happiest results. Be these things as they may, to legally prohibit marriage between black and white is to perpetuate "the doctrine of slavery,—that, when all is said and done, the colored man is less than a human being." He was that for slavery only in theory and to justify his master's ownership, thus, as Goldwin Smith once said with biting truth, "taking a shade from the master's cruelty only to add a deeper shade unto his lust." He was not that in the practical working of the old régime, where the black nurse hugged the master's child to her big, faithful heart, and the black servant was the master's trusted friend, and the master went to the rebellious war that he might weld the black men's chains, knowing that he could trust to them his wife and babes, and that they would swing no flaming brand. It is the political equality of the Negro that has made him socially repulsive. It is not his social or personal repulsiveness that has discriminated against him in the school and on the train and in the marriage laws.

I think it altogether probable that those who look back on our times from some high vantage one or two centuries away will wonder that, all things considered, we did so well in such a critical period as the world has seldom known, when the whole industrial system of a dozen States and some twelve million people was turned upside down, and we had to shape another without any precedents to guide us in the dark and dangerous way; and still I cannot but approve the strong impatience of the men and women who find the present situation in the South too shameful and abominable to be endured. But I do not despair. There is a wisdom in events which is denied to politicians. New questions will arise and new divisions will ensue; and the black man will wake up some fine morning to find the white man "out for votes," and knocking at his door. Slowly, but surely it will dawn upon the mind of statesmanship, and on the minds of many average men, that cruelty and oppression are not well adapted to economize what is best in the kindest of all races on the earth, the most responsive to the touch of sympathy, at whatever hand. It may be that there are none sitting here who will live to see this kingdom of God; and yet, believe me, it will surely come.

Sermon Gleanings.

THE BIBLE.

Rev. Dr. Hillis, the successor of Prof. David Swing at Chicago, lately preached a sermon on "The Bible as a Book of Manhood." He said:—

"The structure of the Bible is now undergoing remorseless investigation. Once men treated it as a book written in heaven and dropped over the battlements. Now a thousand theories are being asserted. Many foolish claims have been set up for it. But the book makes only one claim for itself; i.e., 'Every scripture inspired of God is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, thoroughly furnished for all good works.' It declares that the inspired scripture is to man perfecting scripture. It claims to be exhaustive only in teaching the art of making character. To this end it is a record of the development of the moral sense. It capitalizes righteousness, and exhibits him who is the exemplar of right living and the world's Saviour. In general, it asserts that the world did not come into existence of its own accord, but that, as the engine began in the mind of Watt, so back of the universe is the great God, the world Architect, the world Artist, the world Engineer, but also the world Father. It further asserts that man was made in God's image, reason, affection, and conscience in him so answering to these qualities in God that responsibility exists, and obedience and communion are made possible.

"How unique is this volume! It is not so much one book as a library made up of many books. In the interests of convenience some fifty and more different pamphlets on moral themes are here brought together and made one book by the printer. Here we have the best thought of some forty individuals who lived centuries apart, who spoke three different languages, who represented hostile nations. Between the career of the first author and the work of the last more than a thousand years intervened, during which period states and empires rose, culminated, and fell, while time performed its greatest exploits. It is as if some printer should go back a thousand years, and take the works of Cædmon and Beowulf, of King Alfred and Piers Plowman, of Wiclif and Shakspeare, of Johnson and Tennyson, and bind into one volume these various products of Saxon genius.

"For the sake of convenience, therefore, all these treatises were bound together. But, if the book has no exterior unity, interiorly a single purpose unifies it. One mother idea runs through all the pages. It teaches the art and science of right living. It is a man-making and a man-mending book. It is a chart pointing out the dangerous rocks and shoals. Every page is instinct with this idea, and glows and throbs with this purpose. Whatever fact is given is presented as bearing upon the principles of right and wrong living. It mentions the phenomena of land and sea and sky, but not as teaching geology or astronomy. It gives laws, but is not a system of jurisprudence. It contains history, but is not an encyclopædia of progress. It includes poems, but is not a book of poetry. All these materials are mentioned only incidentally. In geology it asks us to go to the rock pages and the books of science. One idea is dominant, How shall man be developed out of animalism into the highest spiritual manhood? This thought is the special chord that runs through all the related parts, and unifies them. But the unity is the unity of an oratorio, not of a single song. It is the unity of a 'Hamlet,' not of a single idea."

DEFENCELESS GLORIES.

BY J. F. HOWARD.

In the world around us we see much of beauty that in its present state is without defence. The principle of beauty will never die; and that element is continually appearing in new and diverse forms about us, lasting while it may, and then lapsing again into that universal glory which was, and is, and is to come.

The flowers represent the evolution of the vegetable world, and to the finer mind are divinity. Yet their beauty is dependent on the smallest circumstance; and with frost, lack of moisture, or careless handling it disappears.

In passing to the life of man, we also find defenceless glories. Youth is one of them, but its glory is saddened by the thought of its brevity. No marvel that men have sought for the fountain where they might bathe and have perpetual youth. In later life we see our reflection in the glass; and, as we look on the face, all gray and scarred, our mind reverts to the distant scene, and we are young again. But soon reality brings us back to age, and the dream of youth grows sadly beautiful.

"Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
The earliest pipe of half-awakened birds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glimmering square;
So sad, so strange, the days that are no more."

Physical beauty, on which the world to such an extent has set its heart, is a defenceless glory. Accident may destroy it in a moment, disease in a very brief period, or time may more deliberately deaden the eye and take the roses from the cheek, and silver with eternal omens the glory of the golden hair.

"Beauty is as roses, whose fair flower,
Being once displayed, doth fall that very hour."

These things would cause our hearts to sink within us, if we did not believe there was an abiding beauty of soul, unaffected by the influences that destroy its physical emblem.

Another of the defenceless glories is health. In that word there are beautiful landscapes, joyous streams, the voice of birds, the music of waterfalls, and many perfect days. Why the world is all wrong to so many people is that they have no health except in dreams.

One more defenceless glory is wealth. Money is a good thing, for it enables us to do many things for self-improvement and for the benefit of others; but let us remember it is not an end, but a means to an end. It only stands for what purchasing value it has; and the joy we get of it is in what it will buy in comfort, in improvement, and in sweet gratitude of those we may aid and serve.

In turning from our physical surroundings to the skies, we find higher symbols of abiding beauty. The stars, the constellations of old, the same that rose five thousand years ago, are they that rise in every age. The sun, producing an endless succession of mornings,—these are emblems of the higher and enduring beauty which we see when we look beyond the physical life of man into that inner life which is alone immortal, and whose glories have the protection of inimitable law.

What are the abiding glories? The treasures of soul that survive the changes of environment and the disappearing of bodily organisms all through a long life, thus giving assurance of their enduring nature. Education is one, for it is the soul that educates. Virtue is another. In proportion as it is known to us, the present is glorified and all worlds revealed. As we see afar off its summits shining in God's eternal sunlight, we feel immortal longing. Virtue is only another name for God, and every advance we make in virtue is a step toward God. A clear conscience is a continual reward, and bears us through the dark places of earth. With it there is no experience of life so dark but is struck through with the "light and color of hope." When we lie down, it is the nightingale that sings us to sleep; and, when we wake, it is the lark that upspringing greets the purpling of the east. It makes old age cheerful, and takes away the fear of death. It is incalculable peace to be able to look over the past, and say, "My remembrance is very free and clear from any image of offence done to any man."

The gratitude of those we love and help on earth is an abiding glory. Jesus said, "Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness, that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations." Our happiness here depends largely on our relations to those around us. We never like the place where we have not behaved well, but we are always glad to go

The Kettle Case.

You remember the defendant's reply in the famous kettle case:

- (1) Kettle was cracked when he borrowed it.
- (2) Whole when he returned it.
- (3) Never had the kettle anyway.

Now here is the defendant's reply in the open fireplace case:

- (1) Don't need it.
- (2) Can't afford it.
- (3) Chimney isn't big enough or would have it.

DOES HE NEED IT? Every scientist will tell him that it means better ventilation, purer air, and improved health.

CAN HE AFFORD IT? He can afford it better than half the things he buys. We are selling wood mantels from $6.00 upwards.

IS THE CHIMNEY BIG ENOUGH? There is not one chimney in one hundred that is not large enough. Any fireplace mason will satisfy him of this.

among the friends we have made. They make our heaven. And in making friends who believe in us we are laying up treasures that will never perish or pass away; for, as men grow perfect, gratitude toward those who have been their friends on earth will be fixed and eternal.

"Oh, well for him who finds a friend
Or makes a friend where'er he roam,
And loves the world from end to end
And wanders on from home to home."

Men are measured in the higher world by their love, and we are rich or poor according to the love we have. It is the soil from which all virtues blossom that represent abiding glories. When we leave this world, we shall take with us only the love we have and the nobilities of character; and we shall all do well to take heed lest we carry then the smallest load we have ever carried.

Literature.

MONASTICISM: ITS IDEALS AND ITS HISTORY. A Lecture by Adolf Harnack, D.D. Translated by Rev. Charles R. Gillet, A.M., Librarian of Union Theological Seminary, New York. Christian Literature Company. 50 cents.—The growth of monasticism, and the asceticism of which it was a product, was not rooted in the earliest Christian conceptions: it was the product of a later age. It was stimulated most of all by "the belief that only a span of time remained for the world and its history, and that its end came on apace." Likewise, the first Christians saw in heathenism the kingdom of Satan set up on earth. They came to regard themselves as citizens of a future world, whose beginning was soon to come. The origin of the monastic spirit in this conflict between worldliness and unworldliness is brought out by Dr. Harnack in his opening pages. Another epoch in monasticism was when the Church freely associated with the State, and became a new power in the world. But Harnack disputes the popular notion that the secularization of the Church began when it became a national Church under Constantine. He maintains that the Church was already secularized, to a great extent, at the end of the third century. With historical insight and impartiality, Harnack traces the influence of the monastic spirit in its relation to the genius of Christianity. We cannot allow prejudices against a system from which we are freed to obscure our sense of the good it achieved by preserving to us ideals of Christianity which the Church of the world had lost. The difference between the development of monasticism in the East and in the West is pointed out. The high ideal maintained by Saint Francis, and the contribution of the order he founded to art and science, to religious individualism and freedom, are acknowledged. The book is less a collection of facts than a philosophic analysis of influences and results. Prof. McGiffert of Union Theological Seminary furnishes a suitable preface.

A CREEDLESS GOSPEL AND THE GOSPEL CREED. By Henry J. Satterlee, D.D. Charles Scribner's Sons.—This is a big, but not a great book. Its more than five hundred pages, heavily forced with quotations, can be profitably read only by those for whose express use they were written. "It should be added that the book has not been written for unbelievers. Its sole object is to help in confirming the faith of the faithful" (p. viii.). An author has an entire right to pick his audience, but it is a mark of weakness when a book on such a subject as this is addressed to any narrower circle than that of thoughtful men everywhere. The chief importance of Dr. Satterlee's book is its evidence that the "evangelical" churches have taken alarm at the strength of the current toward naturalism disclosed by the Parliament of Religions, and are bestirring themselves to block it. This is a most encouraging sign; for many of those who have rejected the old-time supernaturalism have been slipping along in too easy-going a way, hardly realizing the significance and goal of their progress on account of the amiable acquiescence in orthodox circles. It is well that the issue should be distinctly made and met; for, if we are wrong, we wish and need to know it; while, if we are right, it is high time that the difficulties of the position should be frankly faced and its vast religious implications discerned. Caring only for the truth, we welcome such books as Balfour's, which, from the point of view of philosophy, compels us to scrutinize afresh our basis and methods of thought, and this by Dr. Satterlee, which, taken in connection with the "Pastoral Letter," is assurance that the days of unthinking liberality are numbered, and that we are no longer to enjoy a life without examination, which Socrates held to be good for nothing at all.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE'S FIRST CAMPAIGN. With Comments by Herbert H. Sargent, First Lieutenant, Second Cavalry,

United States Army. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.—This book has a peculiar value in the midst of the many books now appearing to the interest of which Napoleon is central. It is addressed almost exclusively to military intelligence and students of the art of war. The "Life of Napoleon" now appearing in the Century Magazine has just come to the Italian campaign, and it will be interesting to compare the two. According to Lieut. Sargent, the success of Napoleon was no stroke of luck or genius, but the result of careful study and the devout application of acknowledged principles of strategy to the situation. The intellectual and moral incoherency of Napoleon's course up to this time does not prepare the reader for such an exhibition of his energy, but what was most superficial in his earlier life may have been the least significant. Let us hope that such wisdom as can be learned from this book will be less and less in request as time goes on. In the mean time England has increased her naval armament to double that of any European power; and the other powers will probably be fired with a spirit of emulation, and a great deal of unproductive labor will be the inevitable result. What was it that the angels sang? But that was for "men of gentle will."

LETTERS OF A BARITONE. By Francis Walker. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.—It is seldom that one picks up a more charming volume than this, written from sunny Italy,—especially if one have interest in vocal music. It is the letters of an American singer who goes to Italy with a voice badly strained and misplaced by the maltreatment of "voice-builders." It is in Italy that he finds his vocal salvation. In his delightful letters, which contain suggestions and descriptions of many phases of Italian life, he does not lose sight of his main purpose; and, without writing any formal treatise on voice-culture, and in a style which is natural, simple, and fragrant of the aroma of Italian life, the process and experience of voice development, so far as it can be described on paper, is related. Without being too didactic, excellent information is introduced for the American student who is going to Italy. The struggles with the language, the cost and manner of living, experience with teachers, opera singers, artists, composers, are all woven into correspondence fresh in comment and full of unobtrusive information. The book ought to carry like the well-trained singer's voice.

THE IDIOT. By John Kendrick Bangs, author of "Three Weeks in Politics," etc. New York: Harper & Brothers.—The title of Mr. Bangs's book is its principal offense. It is the name by which the hero goes throughout, but we do not get used to it. It continually jars, as it did in the author's "Three Weeks in Politics," where the same character was much in evidence. Of course, he is not an idiot. On the contrary, he is very bright indeed,—another autocrat at the breakfast-table, delivering himself of many amusing, sound, and pleasant judgments upon men and things. One of the suggestions is for a newspaper to tell the things that haven't happened. Another is for an apparatus that displays advertisements on the disk of the moon. Fancy that splendid orb climbing the eastern sky with "Pear's Soap" or "The Christian Register: The Best Religious Paper in the Universe" in large letters, visible to thousands of spectators! There is much more of the same sort,—excellent fooling,—with here and there a bit of real, sound common sense to give the mind a rest. Such a book should not be very long, and the author has observed the proper limit of his infringement on our more serious pursuits.

A GIRL'S LIFE IN VIRGINIA BEFORE THE WAR. By Letitia M. Burwell. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.—Miss Burwell dedicates her book to her nieces with the earnest desire that they may thus know the truth concerning their ancestors, and have a record of plantation life uncolored by Northern prejudice. Despite the repetitions and certain faults of construction, the book is very interesting, giving, as it does, a charming picture of Southern life, in which the old conditions are presented under the most favorable circumstances. She shows us the immense plantation, where all the Negroes were contented, dreading nothing so much as freedom, where mutual affection was the rule between the races, where the house-mother literally spent her days in caring for those incapable of caring for themselves, where "the proposition of a collegiate course for women would have shocked every sensibility of the opposite sex." The book is worth the writing and the reading, since its sincerity and naïveté make it more valuable than many a more pretentious book written with the same purpose.

SELECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF ROBERT BROWNING. Edited and arranged for School Use by Charles W. French. New York: A. Lovell & Co.—It is a good thing to have a small volume of selections from Browning thus prepared for school use, and these poems are generally well chosen. It seems a pity to have included "Saul," which, as one of the noblest poems in the English language, absolutely clear in itself, might well be left for him who would seek it for its own sake alone rather than go through it as a part of school work. It should be a reward rather than a means to an end. There are one or two misprints, as in Rabbi Ben Ezra. As a matter of fact, young people enjoy Browning with comparatively meagre introduction; and the notes here are chiefly of the kind that give actual information rather than suggestions that the student might prefer to make for himself, though they err, if at all, on the side of fullness.

A MAN OF MARK. By Anthony Hope, author of "The Prisoner of Zenda." New York: Henry Holt & Co.—Either Mr. Hope is making hay while the sun shines with great assiduity or his American publishers are inverting the order of his popularity by publishing, one by one, backward, the books by which he climbed to "The Prisoner of Zenda." The latter of these suggestions is the more favorable to the author's talent. One thing is sure, that the sun will not keep on shining long if Mr. Hope does not make better hay than he has given us here. One feels indignant at having his time wasted over such a ridiculous performance, and at finding himself thrust into the society of such questionable characters. One of Mr. Hope's books was called "The Indiscretion of the Duchess." This one might be called "The Indiscretion of Mr. Hope," without hitting wide the mark.

THE FACE AND THE MASK. By Robert Barr. New York: Frederick A. Stokes & Co.—The general quality of Mr. Barr's former venture, "In the Midst of Alarms," is characteristic of the present volume without diminution or excess. But, as here he has several stories where there he had but one, his opportunity to display his ingenuity is much enhanced. Some of them are quite too horrible for any real enjoyment. One of them is a lively skit at the expense of Mr. Conan Doyle. Another is suggestive of the manner of Poe, or perhaps of Frank Stockton. If the majority are amusing, several are decidedly pathetic,—notably, those which introduce us to a gambler's den. "The Predicament of De Plonville" is a very good story of a kind that is not the best, and of which we are growing just a little tired.

A SOUND CURRENCY AND BANKING SYSTEM. By Allen Ripley Foote. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This book appears in the series of "Questions of the Day," and is written with the desire to show how incorrect monetary education results in unsound legislation and produces business panics, and how the losses caused by these panics are fines exacted from the losers in consequence. The writer pleads for a monetary commission and for a sound banking system, reviews the record of the United States Treasury as a bank of issue controlled by political exigencies, and discusses the question of gold redemption. The book ought to help in securing the appointment of a monetary commission, and in making people understand the aim and direction of the work such a commission should do.

PROTESTANT MISSIONS: LECTURES. By A. C. Thompson. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—These lectures on the rise and early progress of Protestant missions were first delivered at the Hartford Theological Seminary, and were intended to form an introduction to the history of more modern missions. Beginning with the period of the Reformation, with its spasmodic and individual movements, and continuing through a description of the early Dutch, English, Danish, and more distant missions, he closes his review with a chapter on the "Early Moravian Missions." One lecture records the work of Eliot, the apostle of the Indians; and another, the colonial endeavors; and still another is about David Brainerd, the missionary among the Delawares.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF THE ROMANS. By Harriet Waters Preston and Louise Dodge. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn.—This book, especially interesting to all students of Latin writers, has been compiled mainly from the latest German authorities. Such chapters as these are of great value in helping one to form a mental picture of the domestic life of classical antiquity, which, as it was in the early days, may well be compared, in its sternness and purity, to that of the Puritan settlers of New England. The family; the every-day life; the children, slaves, guests, and clients; the food and clothing, agriculture, amusements, etc., are taken up in turn; and much interesting information is given in the most compact and systematic manner.

MEN BORN EQUAL. By Harry Perry Robinson. New York: Harper & Brothers. The interest of this book is almost equally divided between politics and love, though, if there is any difference, politics has the best of it; and the hero is in trouble for the sake of both. The story is rather long drawn out for the successful maintenance of lively concern about the outcome; but the social problems discussed are well considered, and the writer shows a moderation and good sense not always found in those who choose the novel as a medium for presentation of their serious opinions. An important strike furnishes much of the plot and incident, and some of its scenes may have been drawn from the Chicago confusion and trouble.

PICCIOLA, THE PRISONER OF FENESTRELLA, OR CAPTIVITY CAPTIVE. By X. B. Saintine. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—The beautiful, touching story of the prisoner's friend, "the herb o' grace," will continue to delight readers for a long time to come. In the Appleton edition of 1893, illustrated by J. F. Gueldey, it finds appropriate setting. It matters little how many times it has been reread: it retains still the power to delight by its purity of thought, its delicacy of style, and its sympathetic delineation of the hope, fear, and sorrow experienced in the cell at Fenestrella.

NAPOLEON. By Alexander Dumas. Translated by John B. Larner. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The "Napoleon" of Dumas has had a large and continuous sale in France, but it is now translated for the first time. The charge has often been made that it was not really written by Dumas; but that charge cannot be sustained, and it is now considered certain that he was the author. It deserves the attention and study of all who are interested in the French general and emperor. Mr. Larner has made the translation as nearly literal as possible.

THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE. By John Fiske. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. This book is a sketch rather than the detailed narrative which Mr. Fiske's lectures will make when completed and published. It is not a rival, but an aid, and a most important one, to the ordinary text-book; and its tracing of causes and effects is interesting, not only to the student of to-day, but also to one whose study of that period was made before the present common-sense methods of teaching history. A brief sketch of Mr. Fiske's life, studies, and work is included.

SARTOR RESARTUS. By Thomas Carlyle. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.—The new edition of a standard work calls for slight comment, except as to its outward form. The present volume is convenient to handle; and, although the print is close, it is clear and readable. The taste for Car-

American Cut Glass.

The new designs of Cut Crystal Glass we have had in process the past few weeks are now on exhibition, in full table services or single dozens, and the handsome single pieces for presentation.

The new designs also of Flower Vases, Flower Bowls, and Epergnes in domestic, as well as beautiful Vienna and Carlsbad Gold and Colored Glass, beautiful products of the glass cutters' art, are ready.

The new Jardinières and pedestals from Mintons' and Doultons', as well as the large and very large old blue Canton China plant pots, can now be had.

The Dinner Set department (3d floor) has now in new designs of the best French, English, and American China, together with new Fish Sets, Breakfast Sets, and Entrée Sets, from the low cost to the most expensive decorations; also on main floor, the new shapes and decorations of China Toilet Sets, Foreign and American.

Never in the history of Pottery could handsome decorated China be bought so low as now. Our stock patterns readily matched. (One price marked in plain figures, and we are not undersold on equal ware if we know it.)

lyle grows with reading; and it is a good sign that people desire still to pick out the choicest plums "from the enormous, amorphous plum-pudding which Herr Teufelsdröckh kneaded for his fellow-mortals."

FLEURS DE FRANCE. By C. Fontaine. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. 60 cents.—The fifteen stories, "choisis et annotés" by the director of French instruction in the high schools of Washington, represent the spirit of modern French writers, and will be found useful in classes as well as interesting to readers of French literature. Ernest Daudet, Ludovic Halévy, François Coppée, André Theuriot, and others perhaps less known, are among the writers included in this collection.

BEHOLD HE GOETH BEFORE YOU. By May Field McKean. Boston: James H. Earle.—This is an Easter poem, "a legend of the risen Lord," written in blank verse, and embodying a tradition told to Rev. Russell H. Conwell in Jerusalem by an old monk who was acting as his guide. There are few readers for a long poem; and, if the legend had been told in simple, effective prose, it would have been more likely to accomplish the ends desired by the writer.

The Magazines.

Under the title "The Nymph of the Attitudes," Mrs. Robert P. Porter describes, in the Cosmopolitan for April, the experiences and character of beautiful Lady Hamilton. The various paintings by Sir Joshua Reynolds and Romney illustrate the text as effective commentary. "Picturesque Papua" is described by O. M. Spencer. The story of "The Krakatra Eruption" is told for the first time by an eye-witness of its horrors, Jean Theodore van Gestel. George Frederick Seward, who served as consul-general in Shanghai through the great Taiping rebellion, writes of "China and Japan," fair in statement and moderate in expression. One of James Lane Allen's charming essays, entitled "English Wood-notes," tells of days with the skylark and the nightingale. Besides these there is a first-rate story by Gertrude Stanton, a rather depressing account of "English Country House Parties," two or three poems, and the usual departments.

The leading article in the New England Magazine for April is by Clara Erskine Clement, entitled "Later Religious Art in America," and illustrated from paintings by Hunt, La Farge, Vedder, Charles Sprague Pearce, Frank V. DuMond, and Mary L. Macomber. Mrs. Clement pronounces Miss Macomber "the most remarkable American painter of religious subjects," and adds that she "is able to attain the greatest end which the greatest master ever reached, for she moves the heart." "Joseph Jefferson at Home," by William E. Bryant, presents the great comedian with appreciative and sympathetic skill, brightened by numerous illustrations. Myron R. Sanford shows us in "Germany's Tribute to Arminius" a corner of Germany not very familiar to Americans and a statue unique in significance and effect. "New England Butterflies," by Margaret Wentworth Leighton; "Indian Education at Carlisle," by O. B. Super; and "The Physicians of Early New England," by May Kelsey Champion,—are other articles of interest. There is more poetry in this number than usual; and "A Fantasy," by Dorothea Lummis, is particularly worth quoting:—

"The first pale violet lifts its perfumed head,
From budding boughs a bird takes wing.
My heart aches for the dead, the unknown dead,
Who nevermore may feel the spring."

Miscellaneous.

The American Book Company publish in their Eclectic English Classics "The Oration on Bunker Hill Monument," "The Character of Washington" and "The Landing at Plymouth," by Daniel Webster, with an introduction and notes. Price 20 cents.

The American Book Company publish Cicero's De Senectute, edited with introduction and notes by Frank Ernest Rockwood, A.M., Professor of Latin in Bucknell University (90 cents). We are glad that the editor has not been tempted to sacrifice literary and historic features to grammatical learning. Numerous quotations of similar thoughts expressed by ancient and modern writers are set before the reader. Thus the text is made the main thing, and its grammatical elucidation a secondary matter, though this is not neglected in supplementary notes.

But few of the many thousand readers of "Robinson Crusoe" know that the author wrote about two hundred and fifty books and pamphlets, yet few of those who read "Crusoe" read the "History of the Plague in London." The American Book Company have just issued in its Eclectic English Classics this latter work. The editor has pointed out the loose syntax of the author, his rambling sentences, lacking in unity, precision, and balance. But, for a writer who was only four years old when the plague occurred, the book is written with graphic facility and imaginative power; and it is possible that there is more of imagination than personal memory in the record. Price 40 cents.

The Taber Art Company have made a reproduction of Mr. Darius Cobb's painting, "Christ before Pilate." The reproduction is a photogravure 20 by 27, printed on plate paper 30 by 38, with India ink, which is sold at $5 for artists' proofs and $3 for plain prints. Of the original painting Longfellow said, "It is grand and beautiful, and should be in every household." This reproduction will make it possible to realize Mr. Longfellow's wish. When the painting first appeared, a notice in the Christian Register spoke of the exalted conception of the artist, and the remarkable contrast in the faces of Christ and Pilate. Though no reproduction can do justice to the original, the essential contrasts of expression are brought out in the photogravure.

Literary Notes.

S. R. Crockett's new book, "Bog-myrtle and Peat," is said to contain many of the best and most characteristic stories the author ever wrote. It comprises adventure tales, idyls, histories, tragedies, humors, tales of the kirk, and an epilogue "In Praise of Galloway."

Studies of the Outward as Related to the Inward Life. By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D., Author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. Cloth, red edges, 50 cents; full gilt, $1.00.
Contents: 1. A Wayside Prophet; 2. The Joy in Harvest; 3. Monuments of the Leaves; 4. The Mission of the Snowflake; 5. Down to the Lake.
The third volume in the cloth-bound series of "Life" books,—"A Child of Nature," by Rev. Dr. Marion D. Shutter,—is already meeting large and favorable notice. The book is so handsome externally that many, seeing the 50-cent edition, at first suppose it to be the $1.00 edition. In its contents, the book, while entirely different from either of its predecessors in the series, is certain to meet with a no less cordial reception. "The graceful little volume," as the Boston Traveler calls it, has much of interest and much of meaning for all who shall read it, and, from cover to cover through its 111 pages, presents vividly, by tender and wise and picturesque object-teaching, "the message" of Mother Nature "that is ready for the human heart."

THE PRONOUN "I."

BY REV. ELI FAY.

I may not be a child of fame,
No breeze may ever waft my name,
No strong ambition lure me on Till toil shall speak her benison.

I never may high office hold
Or find my way to mine of gold;
Grim want may stalk before my door,
My clothing may be scant and poor.

Miscarriage may my plans attend,
And I may sorely need a friend;
In poverty may die alone,
And not a soul my death bemoan.

Yet wondrous meanings I descry
Within the little pronoun "I."
It opens all the realms of being,
It clearly hints the One All-seeing.

I hold a half supernal dower,
Am charged with vast creative power.
Without, I speak the forming word;
Within, I reign the only lord.

My patrimony is untold,
My wealth is more than mines of gold.
I know, I love, I feel the right,
Am thrilled with expectations bright.

On wings of thought abroad I roam,
The boundless universe my home.
All truth and good by right is mine,
My being's texture is divine.

To know and love and live the truth,
And feel the glow of endless youth,
The grand uplift of pure desire,
Life's tides forever rising higher,

New truth from time to time revealed,
Fountains of life for me unsealed,
Enriching personality,—
Ah! this is immortality.

Oh, what is wealth or fame to me,
Compared with what it is to be?
A living, an unfolding soul,
While the eternal ages roll.

No flaming world that swims the sky
E'er thought the thought of saying "I";
Yet God hath given unto me
To know how grand it is to be

A self-poised personality,—
To feel, as endless years roll by,
The wondrous fact that I am "I,"
The offspring of Infinity.

A CHINESE FESTIVAL.

BY LU WHEAT.

The New Year's festival of the Chinese is a movable one, like our Easter, dependent upon astronomical conditions for its date; and this year it fell upon the 25th of January. The yellow flag of China and the smoke of incense gave notice to Los Angeles that Chinatown was in holiday attire. As I went to the temple, all fear of being an intruder was dissipated by the pleasant greetings I received, with offerings of nuts and New Year cards. Idols representing Gautama, with his favorite disciple, Ananda, sitting on his right hand, occupied central positions in the temple; while other deities were placed according to their rank. I asked an intelligent Chinaman what good he received from the idols. "The benefit we expect," said he, "is that they will help us become good. All we hope to do is to make men better."

Mottoes were hung in great profusion on the walls,—some embroidered in gold, and others simply printed on paper. "Let the householder not give himself to drink, nor cause others to drink, nor approve of those who do drink"; "The struggle is to prevent sinfulness from arising and to put away sinful states when they have arisen"; "Wait on father and mother,"—are some of these mottoes. The idea that men may be bad and yet have forgiveness from God is incomprehensible to a Buddhist. Whatever he is, he is not a spiritual tramp. He expects to pay the price for all he gets. He attributes his misfortunes, and even his bodily deformities, to his own sin, his hope being that at some future rebirth he will come all right and be born into a higher family, if he is good in this life. He believes in all religions, and frequently belongs to all three of the national churches of China. With this idea he often joins the mission church, and professes Christianity and idolatry at the same time.

HILDA'S FIRST JOURNEY ALONE.

Have you ever taken a journey in the cars all alone by yourself? If you have, you will understand how Hilda felt when she said good-by to papa and mamma in the Central Depot. Hilda had no idea that she would feel so sorry at the last minute: she had thought it would be a grand thing to go to Aunt Jane's all alone, just as grown-up people did. But, when the man opened the door in the large waiting-room and called out, "Housatonic Express," and papa and mamma pushed her through the turnstile, she began to wish she had never been so anxious to undertake to go to Aunt Jane's alone. She felt a choking sensation in her throat, and the tears kept coming into her eyes. She had not thought before that it is a very sad thing to say "good-by" to those we love so dearly, even for a few weeks. She whispered to mamma, as she passed along to the car at the further end of the station,—

"If pa hadn't bought my ticket and checked my trunk, I would rather go back home with you."

But Hilda's mamma said:—

"You will feel a little homesick at first, dear; but you will get over it soon. And you must remember that you have only a three hours' ride before you will be at the station where Aunt Jane lives; and Jennie and Arthur and little Bess will all be there to meet you, and then you won't feel lonely any more."

"But it is such a dreadful feeling to have you and papa go home without me," whispered Hilda.

They had reached the parlor car, and papa had found the conductor and told him about his little girl who was going on a journey alone; and the conductor came up and spoke so pleasantly and looked so cheery that Hilda began to feel differently already.

The cars began to move, and papa and mamma gave the good-by kisses and hurried off. As Hilda saw them jump off from the steps, she thought: "Oh, how I do wish they had been too late to get off! Then they would have had to go with me."

Hilda wondered as the cars moved along faster and faster how she could have ever been unkind to mamma and spoken as she had at different times, when mamma wished her to do something she did not want to do. Mamma's ways were always best, of course. How plainly she could understand it all now! And often she forgot to get papa's slippers for him when he came home at night and his feet ached. If she were only home again, she would never make mamma feel troubled; and she was sure papa would never have to hunt for his slippers again.

But what if anything should happen that she would never see these dear ones again? It is a comforting thought that our Father in heaven is with us everywhere we go, and with those we leave behind, and we can talk to him anywhere and at all times. Mamma had told her little daughter about this many times; and, somehow, the Father in heaven seemed to be right by Hilda in that car. She whispered in her heart to him, and asked him to take care of all the dear ones and bring them together again; and then she began to feel happier and to look out of the window.

By that time the conductor came in for her ticket, and spoke some very kind words to her; but after he passed on she began to have that same unpleasant and lonely feeling. She did wish she had some one else to talk to. Just then she saw a caterpillar with a beautiful green coat, with black bands and golden spots, crawling toward her. Once she would have moved away from such a creature, but at that time it really seemed as if the worm was like a fellow-traveller.

As it crawled on to her lunch-basket, she picked it up and put it in a little box where she had some wintergreen lozenges, although you may be sure she took the lozenges out first and put them in the lunch-basket. She could but wonder where the caterpillar came from. At all events, it had got into the cars and was taking a journey without so much as a ticket or a check. How funny it was that the caterpillar had all its clothes on its back, and did not need a trunk! Hilda thought of the pretty gowns which her mother had folded up so carefully and put in the trunk that was piled up with so many other trunks in the baggage-car.

When Hilda ate her luncheon, she put some bread crumbs in the box for the caterpillar; but it did not eat them. Then she put some cookie crumbs in. The little fellow picked out the caraway seeds from the crumbs very daintily. Then Hilda remembered that her Uncle John told her the summer before that some caterpillars are very fond of the leaves of the caraway plant, and that they also like heads of red clover. She knew when she got to Aunt Jane's that she could pick plenty of clover-heads for her new friend.

Then a lady who sat behind Hilda said to the gentleman next her, "Do look at that dreadful worm that child has in the corner of the seat!"

But the gentleman only smiled, and said, "I am glad that little girl is not afraid of a little worm"; and he smiled at Hilda as she turned around to look at him.

While she was thinking about it, the conductor came in again, and told her to put on her wrap and get her things together, for the next station she would stop at would be the place for her to get off. Hilda put the caterpillar in the little box: she wished to carry her fellow-traveller to Aunt Jane's.

As soon as the train stopped at the station, Hilda saw Aunt Jane walking up and down the platform, watching every one who came off the cars. Then she heard a voice call out, "Here she is"; and in a moment Cousin Arthur had stepped up, and taken her bag and basket. Then all the family rushed up and kissed Hilda, and told her they were so glad she had come.

"Weren't you afraid to come all alone?" asked little Bess.

"I didn't mind it at all," said Hilda, "after I met my travelling companion."

Then they all asked who it was; and Hilda, laughing, said,—

"When we get to Aunt Jane's house, I will introduce you all."

The children could not imagine what she meant; but, when Hilda had taken off her hat and wrap, she took the box out of the basket, opened it, and showed the green caterpillar.

"Isn't it a lovely worm, with its pretty green coat with black bands and golden spots?"

The cousins all laughed to think Hilda had such a funny travelling companion. Uncle John told her to feed it every day and keep it in the box, and something very strange would happen. And what do you think? Before Hilda went home her travelling companion began to spin a web in one corner of the box, and shortly it had wound itself all up in a silk ball. Then it slept in the ball a long, long time, until long after Hilda went home to the city.

One morning, after she had forgotten her fellow-traveller for some time, she opened the box, and saw a butterfly in the place of the caterpillar. Papa explained as well as he could how the change came about; for this is one of the wonderful transformations God makes, and which is a great mystery to us. And, while Hilda was looking at its pretty wings in the sunshine, it spread them and flew away; and she never knew where it went. She thought it might have flown to the beautiful butterfly land she had read about in a story-book.

You know there is a great difference in going away from our dear friends and coming back to them again. Although Hilda had a beautiful visit at Aunt Jane's, yet she never had been as happy before in all her life as on that day when the train brought her back to the Central Station, and papa and mamma met her there, and the dear ones were all together again.—
Susan T. Perry, in the Evangelist.

KENNETH'S SURPRISE.

It was very much more of a surprise than Uncle Charlie had thought it would be, for it happened that, while he was planning a surprise for his little nephew, he was very much surprised himself, and I am not sure but Bonniwell was surprised, too; but there, I must tell you all about it, or you will not know who Bonniwell is, nor Uncle Charlie, nor Kenneth.

I will begin with Kenneth first. Any one in Lockport could have told you who Kenneth White was. He was just the jolliest, dearest, happiest little six-year-old boy that you could find anywhere. His papa was the rector of the beautiful little stone church in the centre of the village, and his uncle was the doctor whom people were glad to see when they were sick, because he made them better, and whom they were glad to see when they were well, because they loved him so much, and he had always had such a cheery smile and bright word for every one.

"Just the very sound of his voice does me good like medicine," old Granny Hall used to say, as she watched him go by with old Jerry, his faithful horse, who had carried him many and many a mile on his rounds.

I think, if people had not loved Kenneth for his own sake, he would have had a great deal of love for the sake of his father and uncle; but the brown-eyed little man had made very warm friends on his own account during the six years of his life.

But Bonniwell, do you ask? Wait and you shall know all about Bonniwell, too. I must tell you first that it was the day before Kenneth's birthday. He was very impatient for the day to come, for it was so long since his last birthday that he could scarcely remember that he had ever had one before.

Would it ever be to-morrow? Kenneth had never known a day to pass so slowly. When dinner was over, he went down into the orchard to play. The orchard and Uncle Charlie's stable were his favorite play-grounds, but that morning Uncle Charlie had told him that he had a special reason for not wanting him to go into the stable that day.

"Why, uncle?" asked Kenneth in surprise.

"It's a surprise," said Uncle Charlie, nodding his head mysteriously. "I will tell you to-morrow, but be sure not to go there to-day."

Kenneth promised, and then ran down to the orchard for a frolic. It was such a delightful place to play. The grass was long and soft; and the trees were covered with baby apples, very small and green now, but growing every day as the sunlight fell upon them, until some day they should be as round and rosy as Kenneth's cheeks, and he could feast upon them to his heart's content.

Kenneth had a coach and four in the orchard in which he took many a ride. You might not have known that it was a coach and four. If Kenneth had not told you, you might have thought that it was only Seth's old red wheelbarrow, with a bit of rope tied to the handles; but, when Kenneth jumped into it, and shouted and brandished his whip, and pulled at the reins as if he were holding in four of the most spirited horses that ever pranced, he was quite as happy as if a fairy's wand could have transformed the wheelbarrow into just what he imagined it was.

"Gee up!" he shouted, cracking his whip, and tugging at the reins. All at once he looked around, and I am quite sure you could not imagine what he found standing beside him, with a gentle, puzzled expression on his face, as much as to say, "Why don't you take me?" It was a little donkey,—a real live donkey, scarcely taller than Kenneth himself, with a fuzzy coat and long ears, and a nose like brown velvet.

And that was Bonni-bell. Kenneth jumped out of the wheelbarrow, and threw his arms about Bonnibell's neck in a transport of delight.
"Oh, oh, oh!" he cried. "What a beautiful little horse you are! I am so glad I found you."
He patted the rough coat, and Bonni-bell laid her soft nose against the little boy as if she was quite sure that she had fallen into the hands of a friend, and knew that she was safe.
"Oh, I must show you to papa and Uncle Charlie," Kenneth said; and he led the pretty creature up to the house.
Papa and Uncle Charlie were sitting on the back porch when Kenneth led Bonni-bell around the corner of the house.
"Look! look!" he cried joyously. "Just see what I found down in the orchard. Isn't it a pretty little horse? Just my size! Can't I keep it, papa? I can keep it in the nursery."
If Kenneth looked surprised when he first saw the donkey, Uncle Charlie looked doubly surprised when he saw the little boy leading her around the house. He had left Bonni-bell securely locked up in the stable, where he had intended to keep her out of Kenneth's sight until the following day, when he was going to give her to him for a birthday present. How Kenneth had found her down in the orchard was more than he could imagine.
Just then Seth came up with a worried expression, that changed to one of astonishment when he saw the little party.
"I was just after coming to tell you, Dr. White," he said penitently, "that I left the stable door open for just a minute, while I went to the pump for some water, and the little creature must have taken her chance and got out. I thought she was back in the stall where you left her, and it wasn't till just now that I missed her; and I was coming to tell you, and here she is after all."
"Well, there's no great harm done," said Uncle Charlie. "This young man has his birthday present a little sooner than I meant he should, that is all. Bonni-bell is the surprise I was telling you I had for you, Kenneth, boy; so she is yours to keep, though I didn't mean to let you see her till your birthday. But you mustn't keep her in the nursery, though. You will find a place for her in the stable near Jerry, and the two can keep each other company."
"Oh, thank you, Uncle Charlie." And Kenneth jumped into his uncle's lap, and hugged and kissed him until Uncle Charlie begged for mercy. Uncle Charlie brought out the pretty little saddle, and Kenneth and Bonni-bell had a nice ride at once and many another one after that. Bonni-bell was a playfellow that Kenneth never tired of, and many a happy day they spent together. If Kenneth did not want to ride, Bonni-bell would trot around after her little master as if she were a great dog, and watch whatever he did with her big velvety brown eyes, as if she quite understood everything, and thought that all that Kenneth did was right.
When Kenneth went to bed on his birthday night, after a very happy day, he opened his eyes to say sleepily: "Uncle Charlie meant to surprise me with Bonni-bell, didn't he, papa? But I guess Bonni-bell and I s'prised him most, after all."
And I think Kenneth was right, don't you?—Mrs. George A. Paull, in the Churchman.

THE JOLLY OLD GENTLEMAN'S BOY.

The jolly old gentleman lives next door to us. He is very nice, and seems to like boys, which is unusual. So many people don't like boys, and talk about the noise they make and their ways and tricks in a way to make a boy feel very unpleasant.
Little girls, now, they pet and praise and call pretty, until they are so set up that they talk about "horrid boys," too.
Boys' mothers generally love them, but the rest of the world are dreadful to us. The jolly old gentleman is not: that is why I like him. I told him so once, and he said:—
"Well, Tom, that is because I was a boy once."
"But wasn't everybody, sir?" I asked.
"Oh, no!" said the old gentleman.
"That is a general error. Some people are old men from the first,—old heads on young shoulders. Now I like you because you are a real boy."

He is a short, old gentleman, with curly gray hair and red cheeks and black eyes; and he has all sorts of curious things in his pockets,—knives with heaps of blades and corkscrews in them, and a watch that strikes the time any minute you want to know, and nuts and apples and boxes of sweeties. He takes you out to drive, and all of a sudden says: "Are you hungry, Tom? I am." And out of his pockets come nice things that you never heard of in all your life before.
In his house he has electric things, and cameras, and games, and books full of pictures, and comic papers; and he doesn't fidget when you look at them. He has a big piano, too, and plays for you. But I had never seen any one in the house besides himself and the old black servant-man, when one day he said to me,— "Tom, I never told you I had a boy, did I?"
"No, sir," I answered.
"Well, I have one," he said. "He is a great musical genius,—wonderful that way. Would you like to see him?"
"Yes, sir," I said. "Is he away at school?"
"Oh, no!" said the jolly old gentleman. "He is upstairs. He never goes out."
"Oh, I am so sorry! I suppose he is ill," I said.
"No," said the old gentleman. "But he is so small and delicate it wouldn't do to let him go out. Why, he is only half as big as that baby of yours, honor bright! It is twenty years since I carried him upstairs, and he hasn't grown an inch."
"I never saw any one so small as that but General Mite in the exhibition," I said.
"He was a dwarf," said the old gentleman. "Of course, you won't hurt my boy's feelings by calling him that."
"Oh, no, sir!" I said.
"Well, I guess I can trust you," said the old gentleman. "But, when I take you up, just bow to him and sit down. He won't talk; but, if he likes you, he'll play for you."
"Thank you," I said.
Then the old gentleman made me a sign to follow him; and we went upstairs to a small room, very pretty with rugs and pictures. And there beside the window, sitting on a plush ottoman, was a tiny little boy. He had long, curling golden hair, and beautiful eyes with long eyelashes; and he was dressed all in blue velvet, with lace at his throat and wrists.
The old gentleman went up to him and whispered in his ear; and then the little fellow turned his head toward me, bowed and smiled, and lifted something he had in his hand to his lips. It was a flute.
Then I knew he liked me, and was going to play. So I said, "Thank you very much." And then, really, he began to play. And, oh, how he played! First one tune, and then another,—tunes I knew and tunes I never heard before.
Whenever he stopped, I clapped my hands, as people do at concerts; and then he went on again, until I think he had played twenty-four tunes, when he laid the flute down, turned his head toward me again, and bowed and smiled.
"I've enjoyed the music very much," I said; but he did not answer.
"My boy is not very polite," said he. "Just go up to him, and see if he won't shake hands."
I walked up very slowly. I cannot tell why I felt a little shivery, only he stared so. But the closer I got to him, the more I saw; and at last I cried out:—
"Oh, oh! How I was taken in! It's not a live boy at all! It is only a—a—figure!"
Then the old gentleman laughed and laughed.
"Yes, yes, Tom," he said. "He's all the boy I have, all the same. That's what we call an automaton flute-player. I bought it in Paris years ago, and gave a mighty big price for it. They told me that it once belonged to the empress of the French,—that beautiful Empress Eugénie, who had to run away and leave most of her valuable possessions behind her. I do not know if that was true or not, but I thought it the most wonderful thing I ever saw. Its face is so beautiful, and its motions so natural; and I used to try the trick of telling people it was a dwarf very often. It never took any one in quite as long as it has you, though."

"I like to be taken in like that, sir," I said. "I don't like jokes that trip you down or hurt you, but this was clear fun."
"Shake hands," said the old gentleman; "and you can bring your sister in to hear my boy play, and have the joke on her."
I did that next day, but you can't take girls in at all. The very minute sissy saw the little fellow she squealed out,—
"Oh, Tom! It's a musical doll,—there now!"—New York Ledger.

A BIRD STORY.

Here is the little bird story copied out of a letter written by Miss Edgeworth one March morning a long time ago. She says: "I have no domestic occurrence to tell you, except that a robin, who for several seasons has frequented this house, and Lucy's room particularly, has this spring grown so familiar that he began to build his nest in Lucy's old bonnet, laid a great heap of leaves in it, which we used to see him bringing in his bill, the leaves often as large as his body. Yesterday morning Betty, the housemaid, said: 'Ma'am, when I opened the hall door this morning, in flew the robin over my head, and knowing his way wherever he wanted to go through the doors just as if he was master of the house, ma'am! And he sits down before a door, and looks to have it opened for him!'"—Harper's Young People.

DIPHTHERIA

Too many homes bear this fear-inspiring placard, denoting the prevalence of that most insidious and dreaded of all diseases—Diphtheria.

It is to-day a recognized fact among the best practitioners that nine out of ten cases formerly considered hopeless may be brought to a happy termination by the use of that great original raw food product, Bovinine.

This great blood-generating, life-maintaining, strength-developing, and flesh-producing product of lean, raw meat, contains the greatest amount of life-preserving qualities in the least possible bulk of any preparation known.

In cases of Diphtheria, Bovinine has special advantages. In this disease, as in others, the rapidity with which it is assimilated gives to it a preference over all other foods, passing, as it does, into the system immediately, without causing the digestive organs to perform any labor. And considering the fact that the lesions in the throat prevent the swallowing of solid food, it becomes an absolute necessity. In the worst cases, where even liquids cannot be taken by the mouth, Bovinine by being used as an injection. Above all, Bovinine is in itself a germicide, and in all such diseases as Diphtheria, caused by microbes, it not only performs its greatest mission of maintaining life, but antitoxes the existing bacilli.

Bovinine has done wonders in thousands of cases of Diphtheria. When your doctor uses it you may cease to worry, and be assured of a speedy recovery. To neglect its use may mean years of remorse in the feeling that some loved one might still be with you if everything possible had been done. Bovinine is sold by all Druggists.

AWAKENING.

Never yet was a spring-time,
Late though lingered the snow,
That the sap stirred not at the whisper
Of the south wind, sweet and low;
Never yet was a spring-time
When the buds forgot to blow.

Ever the wings of the summer
Are folded under the mould;
Life, that has known no dying,
Is Love's, to have and to hold,
Till sudden the burgeoning Easter!
The song! the green and the gold!
—Margaret E. Sangster, in Harper's.

OUR FARM GIRLS.

A correspondent of a Greek paper, Amaltheia, published in Smyrna, attended last fall some American county fairs in New England,—notably, at Taunton, Attleboro, and Brockton. In a letter to his journal the correspondent, Mr. K. D. Phasoularides, gives his impressions of American farmers' wives and daughters. We cannot call them American peasant women, for no such distinct class of this kind exists in this country as in Europe:—

"The comely American girls who in face and form are distinguished as maidens of the field very kindly conversed with every stranger about the exhibits which their strong hands had arranged so tastefully in the fair. The farm maidens of the East have not reached the point at which their American sisters are now found, and it will be very long before they arrive there. The American countrywoman, in her best array, simply clothed, with a newspaper in her hand, is able to enter into any office or store without betraying by her demeanor or breeding to what class she belongs. Only her sunburnt face and the hard touch of her hands make known her station to careful observation, not her manners. She is able to converse about the culture of potatoes or wheat, and does not find it difficult to be drawn into a political discussion, especially when it concerns the Wilson tariff."

BRITISH COUSINS.

Although our country is sometimes called England's foster-child, and Uncle Sam and John Bull are cousins, there are a great many little things, particularly in forms of speech, in which we differ. For instance, every young American knows what "candy" is. But here in England, if you were to ask for "candy," you would be shown what we call "rock candy." All others are "sweets," though, of course, as with us, the different varieties have names of their own. Crackers are all "biscuits," and ginger-snaps are called both ginger-nuts and ginger-breads.

Then, if you were to ask an Englishman how much he weighed, he would reply, "Ten stone, eight," or "Eleven stone, six," as the case might be. This is very unintelligible to me, for I always have to reckon it up in my head; and I, for one, don't like mental arithmetic. A "stone" is fourteen pounds, so, instead of saying 148 pounds, they divide it into stones, and say, "Ten stone, eight," or ten stones, eight pounds. A few days ago I was walking with a friend, and she said, "Is that Mr. W.?" "Oh, no," I replied: "he always wears a beaver." "A what?" "A beaver,—a silk hat." And I showed her one on a passer-by. "Oh, I see," she said, "you mean a 'top-hat.'"

Another odd expression is calling a waist "body," and that is very commonly used. Just imagine saying, "I have a new body," or "Run upstairs and put on another body." Yet the word is often used in that way. Then, if you were to say to an English girl, "So-and-so has a bang, has she not?" she would very likely look at you in blank astonishment (unless she was used to Americans); but, if you said that the person in question had a "fringe," that would be very different. As if we were table-cloths or rugs to have a "fringe."

Rubbers are always "goloshes," and a clerk is invariably called a "clark," and what we would call a dry-goods store is here called a "draper's." Then they never "guess," but always "presume" or "fancy,"—as an English girl would say, "Fancy that!"—Harper's Young People.

Spiritual Life.

Common-sense religion is not a spasmodic affair: it is a steady, prayerful, and cheerful observance of God's commands. It teaches that character is an achievement, not a gift.—John W. Chadwick.

In the very midst of pressure he called a halt. And in the seeming respite from labor lay hidden really much work to be accomplished,—work to fit them for their work, and deeper knowledge of their Master to carry them through it.—Anna Warner.

The attempt to serve God without love is like rowing against the tide. Love makes duty sweet. The angels are swift-winged in God's service because they love him. Jacob thought seven years but little for the love he had for Rachel. Love is never weary.—Watson.

If I should sum up my thought of Sunday in a word, I should say it was a great opportunity. There is no duty nor obligation nor divine sanction about it; but it is an opportunity,—one which past civilization has bequeathed to us, and for which we are in one sense indebted to the Jews, but more immediately to the Christian Church.—W. M. Salter.

This is the law,—not Moses' law, but the gospel law; the law of liberty, by which a man becomes truly free, because he has trampled under foot the passions of his own selfish flesh till his immortal spirit can ascend free into the light of God. Remember that Saint Paul always couples with the ascension and resurrection of our bodies in the next life the resurrection and ascension of our souls in this life.—Charles Kingsley.

Nothing is plainer than that beliefs, when intensely conceived, really taken into the heart, do affect character mightily. It is a common saying that a man is good in spite of his creed. This is impossible. No man is good, nor can be, in spite of his creed, his real creed. He may be good notwithstanding what he assents to, but he cannot be a good man in spite of what truly he believes and conceives in his soul.—J. V. Blake.

All that's Yellow is not Cottolene

There's hardly a housekeeper in the country but has heard of Cottolene the new vegetable shortening. It is a strictly natural product; composed only of clarified cotton seed oil, thickened for convenience in use, with refined beef suet—pure and sweet. So composed,

COTTOLENE

Was bound to win, and to drive out lard from the kitchens of the world. When housekeepers wish to get rid of the unpleasant features and results of lard, they should get Cottolene, taking care that they are not given cheap counterfeits with imitative names, spuriously compounded to sell in the place of Cottolene.

It's easy to avoid disappointment and insure satisfaction. Insist on having Cottolene.

FILES OF "THE UNITARIAN."

I wish to say to persons desiring to obtain back numbers of the Unitarian in order to complete their sets, that they will need to attend to the matter between now and the 10th of June, or it will be too late. The present publisher, Mr. Geo. H. Ellis, can furnish back numbers since January, 1891, the time when the publication office was removed to Boston. But for the five years previous to that time back numbers can be obtained only from me. Most of the numbers of that period I can furnish; but I shall dispose of all before June 10, after which time it will be impossible for me to give aid to any in completing their early files.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations.

By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

MORAL INFLUENCE OF SCIENTIFIC STUDY.

The first thing that all beginners must learn is to see a thing just as it is. None of us have this power fully developed. We go through life with our eyes only partially open. We do not see things as they really are. The first power that a proper study of plants and animals develops is that of observing accurately. None do this when they begin the work. Usually, they see at first only vague generalities. But the best stimulus to seeing accurately comes through expressing what has been seen. This expression should be required of the pupils in three forms,—drawing, notes, and oral discussions. This is a very valuable part of the exercise. To be able to express accurately with a pencil point what is observed is a power of inestimable value. However, the power to observe accurately is not necessarily accompanied by the power to express accurately; but the former must precede the latter. No one can draw accurately what he has not seen accurately. And along with this mental development must also go a moral development. Seeing accurately is only seeing the thing as it actually is,—that is, seeing the truth; and drawing and describing are only stating the facts or telling the truth. Here is where the temptations lie. An indolent or careless pupil finds telling the exact truth with his pencil point to be arduous, and is tempted to distort or only partially represent the truth. But accuracy of expression must be a constant drill in truthfulness.—A. J. McClatchie, in Popular Science Monthly for March.

THE BIRDS.

At a little fishing village last summer on the coast of Devonshire I was noticing the tameness of the sea-gulls, as they flew around the boats, when they drew to land or sat like so many barn-door fowls waiting for any bit of fish thrown to them. "Yes," said an old fisherman, "they are getting tamer again now, but for a long time they kept aloof. A couple of city guests came down here, and began blazing away at the poor, tame creatures, that did not know at first what it meant; for they had never had a stone even thrown at them or heard a gun fired in their life. How many they would have killed, 'just for fun,' as they said, I don't know, if we fisherman hadn't stopped them; for the gulls we consider our friends. We like to hear their wild cries, and they lead us to where the fish are shoaling. But it was a long time before they became tame again."

A would-be sportsman stopped over night at a backwoods cabin with a whole arsenal of guns. Early in the morning the farmer was awakened by a fusillade in the garden. "I jumped up," he said, "to see what was the matter; and there was that city chap blazing away at my little robins and orioles, to listen to whose songs I have lain awake by the hour. I just caught the little fellow by the collar, and says I, 'Look here, young man, if you fire that gun again, I'll fire you out of this mighty quick.' He dropped his 'shooting iron,' and looked at me in amazement."—Babyhood.

Temperance.

The Swiss government made a profit of about £200,000 last year on its monopoly in spirits.

The Woman's Temperance Publishing Association printed over one hundred million pages of literature in the past year.

The legislature of South Carolina has passed a scientific temperance instruction law. This reduces the number of States without such a law to four.

The habits of the parents of three hundred idiots have been learned; and 145, or nearly one-half, are reported to be known to be habitual drunkards.—S. G. Howe, M. D.

Efforts are being made in England and other countries to forbid the employment of women behind public-house bars. In America such employment has been declared illegal, and now in Norway and Sweden it has been made a punishable offence to employ girls as barmaids.—Christian World.

Gov. Hughes of Arizona asks Congress to prohibit the liquor traffic in the Territory, and so lessen public expenditures as to come within the law. The governor's further remarkable statement that there has been no Indian uprising in Arizona for the last thirty years that could not be traced directly to the liquor traffic is not only a hint for those trying to solve the "Indian problem," but it points the way for a reduction instead of an increase in the army, as some are now demanding.

Here and There.

An item in a daily newspaper of Philadelphia says: "An artistic feature of the new building for the Aged and Infirm Colored People at Belmont and Girard Avenues is the stained-glass window in the manager's room, which gives a beautiful portrait of Lucretia Mott. The countenance of this venerable Friend is a most appropriate subject for a practical illustration of history in such an institution. The memorial window, which is vis-à-vis from Mrs. Mott, has the portrait of William Lloyd Garrison, or 'Lord Garrison,' as an aged inmate explained to a recent visitor."

A recent letter from New Zealand says: "I have travelled in many countries; but in no other land have I seen the courtesy and unobtrusive chivalry habitually shown to women, whether young or old, by New Zealand young men of every condition and rank. The status of a New Zealand woman is considerably higher than that of her sister in Australia or England; and she is not likely to forget that she gained the political franchise, not by inadvertence or by party scheming, but as a deliberate act of justice, no less than chivalry, on the part of her countrymen."—American.

The London Times thinks that a common interest in golf will be even more useful than cricket as a tie between rich and poor; and it believes, too, that a golf-links affords a villager a much wholesomer occupation for his leisure than he can find at the village public house. Commiserating America, which has no cricket,—nothing but base-ball,—it suggests that, "if in course of years she make golf her own, as England is making it, she may find in it a bond of union between classes, which is nowhere more badly needed than in the great republic where all men are equal."

Editorial.

ONCE more we remind pastors of churches and those having charge of collections that next Sunday will be the last opportunity to take a public collection for the American Unitarian Association to secure representation this year. The work of gathering the annual contribution ought not indeed to rest upon a casual collection taken on a single Sunday which may be rainy or otherwise unpropitious. It should be the result of systematic and organized effort. In some churches the annual sum has been doubled by improving the method of collecting it; but churches that have neglected to do this will need to take the matter in hand at once, since the financial year of the Association closes on the first of May. As the constitution requires that contributions shall be made consecutively for two years to entitle churches to representation, if the right to vote is lost this year, it cannot be regained within two years.

THE jubilee of the Temple Emanu-El of New York enables us to extend our congratulations to Dr. Gottheil, not only upon his able and fruitful personal ministry and far-reaching influence, but also upon the success of the movement of which he is one of the most distinguished representatives in this country. Reformed Judaism is not a transient element in our religious history. Like every progressive movement, it has had to bear the reproaches and condemnation of the household in which it was born. But it has passed out of a bondage of literalism into a new spiritual Canaan. It has taken some of the family jewels with it,—some which come to it lawfully, by descent; and others, perhaps, it has borrowed from the Egyptians. For Reformed Judaism is catholic in its spirit, and does not hesitate to take and return thanks for whatever may enrich its life. It is Judaism adjusted to the nineteenth century. It does not hope to recover the ancient earthly Jerusalem, but it seeks to bring the new Jerusalem down to earth.

A FEW weeks ago an item went the rounds of the press, stating that William Penn Bowman, a ten-year-old boy recently convicted of murder, had been sentenced to be hanged at Wilkesbarre, Pa. We doubted the truth of the statement, and wrote to the Wilkesbarre Record for information. We have received a reply stating that the young man is not ten years old, but twenty. This shows how careless the press despatches sometimes are, and how frequently mis-statements are printed and reprinted and passed from one paper to another without any attempt at verification. It would be a serious indictment of civilization in Pennsylvania if a ten-year-old boy were condemned to be hung, and we are glad to correct this statement. But the question still remains whether, for a boy twenty years of age, and therefore still a minor, or, indeed, for a criminal of any age, punishment by death is the best way for society to deal with the crime, terrible as it is. Capital punishment certainly does not solve the problem, and never will, as a deterrent measure. It has been abolished in several countries, because it has proved to be ineffectual and, in many cases, dangerous to the application of justice. The crime of murder, like many other crimes, is something which cannot be corrected after it is committed. For the cure we must look rather to real preventive measures and influences.

THERE are two classes of debts which, in the eyes of many people, are not considered so binding as other financial obligations. These are debts to doctors and to ministers. Perhaps there is no class of professional men who lose so much from bad debts as doctors; and this results, not from fraud, rascality, or business failure on the part of the creditors, but simply because of a weak individual as well as public sentiment concerning the financial part of the obligation. There is a difference, it is assumed, between a lot of groceries or merchandise received and consumed and the services rendered by the doctor. The latter, it is assumed, does not really lose any property if he is not paid. He has simply lost so much time, nothing more. Or it is assumed that the doctor ought to give his services freely to charitable purposes, and it is surprising how many people consider themselves poor after recovering from a fit of sickness. It is hardly necessary to call the attention of thinking and conscientious people to the fallacy and moral weakness of this mode of argument. It appears also, sometimes, in the obligation which parishes have assumed to their ministers. There are many people who do not regard these obligations as at all serious, though they may be exceedingly serious for the minister. They have, apparently, made business contracts with their ministers which ought to be as binding as any other contract; but they assume that, after all, the minister must simply take what he can get, and this is very often a large discount from what they have promised. We have known cases in which debts to ministers were allowed to run for years without parishes paying even the interest on the amount. The expectation, in many cases, is that the minister will eventually make the society a present of the amount of a debt which he is unable to collect. Protestants do not exact a vow of poverty from their ministers, but they sometimes act as if they meant to enforce it. Yet, on the whole, we believe there has been a general improvement in recognizing the seriousness of such obligations.

A SHEAF OF TRIBUTES.

The sheaf of tributes which we gather this week and offer to Dr. Martineau in celebration of his ninetieth birthday springs from seed which he himself has planted. As the gardener gathers his flowers and his fruit, and the farmer his grain, so this honored patriarch may find here fruitage and harvest of his own life and labor.

Dr. Martineau has wrought in a field, the field of theology, ethics, and religion, which is plotted off into sects and schools, and divided by denominational fence lines. But his influence, like his sympathies, could not be limited by sectarian or partisan boundaries. On this remarkable occasion it is not only the friends of his own immediate household of faith who do him honor. Distinguished writers and thinkers of all schools and all branches of the Church, Jewish as well as Christian, join in expressions of respect, affection, and admiration. These tributes do not mean that Dr. Martineau has become the founder of a new school of thought, and that he has secured assent to his authority and acceptance of his opinions. On the contrary, not a few of these tributes are written by men who do not accept his theological views and the conclusions based on them. They appear not as disciples, but occasionally as antagonists. Their tributes are evidences of the generosity which may appear in the field of controversy. Not the least service that Dr. Martineau has rendered is to illustrate the dignity, fairness, and reverence with which controversial questions may be treated. He has touched no question without carrying it up to the highest plane of discussion. We all know what his influence has been in the Old World. These tributes will show how greatly he is appreciated in the new. We add our greetings to those of our contributors to the man who unites the lofty vision of Plato with the devotional spirit of A Kempis, the imagination of Shakspeare with the trust and sweetness of the man of Nazareth.

COST OF INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE.

In our editorial on "Child Life Insurance" we referred to the enormous expenses involved "which are met by these lapsed policies." It would have been more accurate to say "which are largely met by the lapsed policies." We do not mean to state that the premium charged by the companies includes no specific allowance for expenses. On the contrary, we suspect that a very large percentage is thus provided for. But, in questioning our statement that, of nearly $1,900,000 received monthly, nearly $1,100,000 is absorbed by expenses, Mr. Long fails to observe that we do not refer to the entire receipts of the companies, but to so much as is actually applied to the payment of claims and expenses. How much that is, and how considerable a part the profits of lapse must play in the transactions of these companies, may be judged by a review of the figures of the Metropolitan Company for 1893, on which the figures in our previous article were based.

Here we find actual payments on account of lapsed and surrendered policies of only $212,813.62, largely, moreover, on non-industrial policies: whereas the full net reserve alone is $14,998,083, and it is admitted that hundreds of thousands of this company's industrial policies lapse every year. In 1894 the number was 1,637,030. It is evident that, if the payments on lapses and surrenders were increased only fivefold, by giving full credit for reserve on all lapses the company's surplus, which is shown to be only $661,744.72 in excess of the guarantee capital, would be wiped out, which is equivalent to saying that the lapses go to help pay the expenses or make their payment possible. Thus we see no reason to retract the substance of our remarks. The companies of other States are not legally limited at all as to forfeitures, and the John Hancock is so limited only after two years: whereas the entire average duration of industrial policies probably does not exceed, if it equals, four years. Since Gov. Long's reply was written we have taken pains to verify again the statements and figures there quoted by reference to the reports of the Insurance Commissioners of New York and Massachusetts. The statement we made that, of nearly $1,900,000 received monthly, nearly $1,100,000 monthly, or nearly 60 per cent., is absorbed in the cost of the business, is substantiated. Gov. Long's defence that this includes the amount required to be held as reserve is incorrect. The totals referred to are made up chiefly of agents' commissions, salaries, medical examiners' fees, and similar items.

Setting aside the whole question of the neglect of children alleged by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, it seems to us that the enormous cost of industrial insurance compared with the returns which the insured obtain from it is one of the greatest objections to the system. We believe in encouraging thrift among the poor, but by some better method than this enormously expensive way; and, if the State has the right, which it now freely exercises, to protect the insured and assure to them a fair return for what they invest, it certainly has a right to extend this protection here.

HOME LEAVING AND HOME MAKING.

About the time that the birds begin to fly northward to make for themselves new homes among the trees or hidden away in humble nooks, scores of young people loosen the ties that bind them to the old home, and in happy pairs go forth to begin life where their fathers and mothers began years ago.

The American method of starting homes gives far greater independence and chance for the development of individuality than the Oriental fashion of family colonies, where under one roof half a dozen cradles may be seen rocking together. The parents are the head of such a household, and thither the sons bring their wives; and there is no breaking up of the little kingdom while the old folks live. After that there may be a fitting, each son starting a new colony of his own. But here custom allows every son, as he marries, to take his bride where he will, or rather where they will; for his young wife has quite as much to say on the subject as he does. In the East marriages are made at such an early age that the association with older and more experienced persons in the same family is necessary. In this country the young woman who marries is usually able to assume the responsibility of a home.

So the bride goes out with her husband from the old shelter, from the presence of her father, the comfort of her mother, the companionship of brothers and sisters, to sit by her own fireside, to worship at her own family altar, and to minister and be ministered unto, with little heed of the great throng outside her little world of two.

The very ease with which this great step is taken too often prevents a full appreciation of the importance of the change, or a realization of what it means to found a new home and family. Few of those beginning such a life can look forward to leaving the record of a young couple in London who were married not so very many years ago, and who have become the parents of twenty children and nearly a hundred grandchildren. But, even without the widely radiating influence of children and children's children, each home becomes a centre for good or ill, which depends upon the ideal of those uniting to form it. It may be a castle of indolence or a hive of industry. It may be an abode of selfish seclusion, or it may be a home of hospitality with the door to the "prophet's chamber" always ajar. The atmosphere of public spirit, of domestic purity, of tender charity breathes through it, or it may yield dank and unhealthy influences.

Young people need not wait till they are married to form the ideals about which they will build when they "swarm" from the parent hive. If the old home is what it should be, that may be their fairest example. If not, they may dream of fashioning better than they have known.

Nor need one always wait for marriage to establish a home. Every American city can show scores of homes in the best sense, where a brother and sister live, or two friends. Boston, for instance, is dotted with cosy and charming places where the sole occupants are two congenial women. One misses perhaps the manly voice and the ringing notes of children; but in every other respect they are true homes, centres of light and intelligence, and shedding their comforting and cheering rays into all the neighborhood. Such a life is far better for the inmates and for the community than the barrack life of the boarding-house or the caravansary of the great hotel. The home is the most sacred spot in any nation; and, if it consists of but one room, if the spirit of love and consecration be there, it stands for all that is best in that nation's life. Happy, therefore, are the many young men and women who in the spring-tide of the year are fitting from the old homes, with the glad opportunity of establishing new ones on the ideals of affection and fidelity to each other, loyalty to their country, and allegiance to their God.

THE WORK AND EXTENSION OF UNITARIANISM.

Rev. George Putnam of Roxbury, Mass., did not identify himself very closely with organized Unitarianism. He was in a better position to appreciate its work and the need of its extension, perhaps, than if he had been a more pronounced adherent. In a sermon preached in 1860 we find him using the language quoted below. Unitarianism in the last thirty-five years has entered a stage of organic activity which could hardly have been expected then; but the need of its extension is just as evident, and the words of Dr. Putnam may well be heeded by those who have not given their personal aid to the cause:—

My oldest parishioners, those who have listened to me through all these thirty years, will bear me witness that I have done and said almost nothing to identify them or myself with any denomination; that I have hardly ever spoken so much as the word "Unitarian," or expressed or sought to enlist anything like sectarian sympathies. If my people had no other means of information, they would hardly have learned from anything I have ever said here or done anywhere that there was any particular body of Christians or class of congregations that we were in any way connected with. Many a friendly rebuke has reached me, objecting to this stand-along policy as unsocial, as an excess of independence, and a throwing away of influence. I can hardly say that I regret the course that I have pursued. Indeed, it has hardly been in my nature to pursue any other. I do not remember the time when I have not felt an extreme repugnance to being yoked in with anything like a sect. I have loved to regard what is called Unitarianism not so much as a body of opinions as the principle of liberty of opinion, not so much a distinct organization of men and of churches as an assertion of the independence of churches and of individual intellectual freedom,—in a word, that perfect liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free,—no yoke of bondage, no entangling alliances, calling none to account, and giving account to none. But, not caring now to vindicate myself on this point, I can at least claim that I have not wearied my people with sectarian drill, nor fed them on the husks and bitter roots of sectarian strife; and it is not likely that now, so late in life, I shall ever change much in this respect, or ever become an efficient promoter of a distinctive Unitarian doctrine or organization. There is just now, however, something in the circumstances of the time that inclines me to use that word "Unitarianism" more freely, with a view to considering it as an historical fact,—what it has done, and what it has yet to do, and what are its claims to the gratitude and respect of the Christian world. I am the more moved to this, because it seems to be thought by some, outside and inside, that Unitarianism is not just at this moment in its state of highest prosperity, but is rather undergoing a season of adversity. I hear it intimated that there are signs of its decline; that the tide of fashion does not set in its direction in the metropolitan churches. Some say it is dying out at both ends, at top and at bottom; that from one end many are passing off out of reach, into all kinds of ultraism, and at the other as many are slipping away into some of the various folds of orthodoxy; in short, that it is a falling house which the prudent and timid have left or are preparing to leave.

I suppose all this is a mere state of the tide for the hour, the accident of a day, a transient turn that belongs to the variable fortunes of all earthly things. But, if it be a season of apparent adversity with Unitarianism, I, for one, and as one of those who have never blown its trumpet, nor glorified it, nor championed its cause in the days of its prosperity, will at least, now, when many think that the edge of the cloud is over it, hasten to pay it a just tribute of honor and grateful love; to do justice to the purity of its purposes, the magnitude of its achievements, and to consider what the world has even yet to hope from the extension of its principles, and to assume my share of whatever odium may be attached to its name and fortunes. If those who have sunned themselves in its light, and have worn its honors in its palmier days, betray and forsake it in the moment when its visible prosperity is diminished, it is time for outside friends of liberty and truth and right to step forward and do justice to what is great and noble in its principles and indestructible in its influence.

WHITTIER AND UNITARIANISM.

An interesting discussion has been going on in the Outlook lately concerning the religious views of John G. Whittier. We have received the following letter from Rev. George W. Cutter of Newport, R.I., giving some interesting testimony on this subject:

While there is so general an interest in Mr. Whittier's religious views, it may not be inappropriate for me to refer to a very pleasant visit which a few friends made to the poet in October, 1891, at his summer home near Danvers. He seemed quite willing to speak to us upon the deeper themes of religion, and freely answered any questions which we were disposed to put. As his words were taken down almost verbatim by one of the party, the report of the conversation is entirely trustworthy. I shall only give that which related to Christ and the dogma of the Trinity:—

"The real claims of Christ are based upon the perfection of his life and character, and not upon his authority. His highest authority is his perfect life. Jesus was no common or ordinary man, but a special and peculiar manifestation of the Divine. There is none equal to Christ. He stands apart from the general order of humanity. Yet his superiority was a difference in degree only, not an essential difference in kind. Christ forever leads us on; but he, like ourselves, is always subject to the Father."

In regard to the Trinity, Mr. Whittier never accepted the dogma as declared in the creeds. His beautiful poem, "Trinitas," written to solve the "dark riddle of Three in One and One in Three," so far from affirming the tri-personality of the God-head, explains it away, and shows us three forms of divine goodness,—the Father, whose equal mercy sends rain and sun upon the evil and the good; the Christ, who, in an innocent woman, stoops to lift and save a fallen sister; and the Holy Spirit, the still, small voice which speaks in every soul. He believed profoundly in the "Eternal Goodness," both in this world and in the life hereafter. He thought that annihilation were better than eternal punishment, and trusted that, at last, all souls would be saved.

To an intimate friend of his, a Hicksite Quaker, he said, "They would call thee and me Unitarians."

Musings.

I HAVE long since put by arithmetic as a useless art, except for school children and professional accountants. When, therefore, I had the curiosity to know how many days, hours, minutes, and seconds Dr. Martineau had lived in the ninety years which were completed last Sunday, I referred the problem to a young school-boy who has not lived one ninth as long. He was at first disposed to disregard the 5 hours 48 minutes and 46 seconds to be added to the 365 days of each year, but I insisted that Dr. Martineau's life was too valuable to have even a single minute or second of it overlooked. They were therefore included in the calculation. The result, I am told, is as follows. In these 90 years he has lived 32,871 days 19 hours and 9 minutes, which is equal to 788,923 hours, or 47,335,389 minutes, or 2,840,123,340 seconds. I suppose that, taking childhood and old age together, 60 beats a minute would be a low enough average for the pulsations of the heart. So that the number of seconds may represent at least as many heart-beats, and probably there have been a good many more in that time. For a pump to keep working so long and so faithfully without breaking down or being laid up for repairs is sufficiently remarkable. I have not verified these figures. If any school boy or girl can prove or disprove them, he is welcome to do so. I asked my young friend how old Dr. Martineau would have been if he had lived in Mars, Mercury, or Venus; but he refused to consider him as belonging to any other planet but ours, and I did not blame him. If, now, somebody wanted to know what use Dr. Martineau had made of all this time, they might count the pages of his printed volumes, or of his unprinted sermons, lectures, and manuscripts, and multiply it by the number of words on a page. They might count the number of words he has spoken, the steps he has taken, the books he has read, the languages he has learned; and the record would be a pretty large one. But that would only be the expressible side and product: there would still be a mysterious, inexpressible combination of elements, making up and exhaling from the personality, not to be computed in words, pen-strokes, or foot-pounds. The power of such a life cannot be expressed in terms of quantity or in mechanical equivalents of energy. There may be some way of measuring soul-force, but the psychometer has not yet been invented; and a life like that of Dr. Martineau is in its radiating force and influence immeasurable.

Brevities.

Much matter now standing in type must be left over until next week. But it is good, and will not spoil by any change of the weather.

The American girl who pays her tribute to Dr. Martineau sailed for England last Saturday, and we doubt if she would find any greater happiness than to make another pilgrimage to the same domestic shrine.

Mr. Chadwick's poem is, a musician might say, a graceful bit of poetic counterpoint. He happily blends two melodious and accordant themes into harmony in his double tribute to Furness and Martineau.

The biographical sketch by Rev. A. W. Jackson gives us an excellent outline of the life of Dr. Martineau. Mr. Jackson has enough matter for a book, which, we trust, will be given to the world before a great while, on this same saint, scholar, and philosopher.

Unitarians have Dr. Martineau in England, Dr. Furness in America, and Rev. Thomas T. Stone among their patriarchs; and Universalists have Rev. Thomas J. Sawyer, D.D. He is ninety-one years of age, but preached April 7 in the Church of the Divine Paternity of New York, of which he was pastor sixty-six years ago.

In Mr. Chadwick's sermon last week it should have been seven million Armenians, not Americans, whom Senator Morton of
